This section is a "road map" of the types of actions authorized by UIFSA. Although such a section may be unusual for a uniform act, it is especially justified in this instance because the majority of those persons administering the Act are not attorneys and will doubtless find such assistance to be useful.

Subsection (a) [(1)] mandates application of the general provisions of this article to all UIFSA actions.

Generally, subsection (b) [(2)] identifies the fact that orders for spousal support and child support are to be dealt with identically under the Act. However, subsection (b)(5) [(2)(e)] announces that the modification provisions are limited to child support orders; the Act does not provide for a second state to modify a spousal support order.

Subsection (c) [(4)] establishes the basic two-state procedure contemplated by the Act. The initiating responding procedure is derived from the two-state procedure under RURESA; the direct filing by either an individual or a support enforcement agency is new to this Act.

(a) establishment of an order for spousal support or child support pursuant to 40-5-179;

(b) enforcement of a support order and income-withholding order of another state without registration;

(c) registration of an order for spousal support or child support of another state for enforcement pursuant to 40-5-184 through 40-5-195;

(d) modification of an order for child support or spousal support issued by a tribunal of this state pursuant to 40-5-147 through 40-5-150;

(e) registration of an order for child support of another state for modification pursuant to 40-5-184 through 40-5-195;

(f) determination of parentage pursuant to 40-5-196; and

(g) assertion of jurisdiction over nonresidents pursuant to 40-5-145 and 40-5-146"; in (2) after "individual" inserted "petitioner", substituted "initiate" for "commence", before "initiating" deleted "appropriate", and after "state" inserted "or a foreign country"; and made minor changes in style. DECISIONS UNDER FORMER LAW (URESA)

Earnings Exempt From Execution on Unpaid Alimony Judgment: Section 25-13-614, exempting earnings of a judgment debtor from execution, does not differentiate between different types of judgments, plainly provides an exemption of earnings against execution regardless of the nature of the underlying claim, and the Supreme Court cannot insert an exception for delinquent alimony payment judgments. Earnings are exempt from execution on a judgment for unpaid alimony, and though an alimony claim is not strictly a debt, when reduced to judgment it becomes merged in the judgment, loses its underlying character, and the judgment creates a debt the same as any other money judgment. White v. White, 195 M 470, 636 P2d 844, 38 St. Rep. 2041 (1981) (case of first impression).

Inaction by State as Voluntary Waiver: Where wife initiated proceedings under Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (URESA) (replaced by UIFSA) and claim was settled by agreement with former husband, it was error to allow state to recover claim, as this section only gives state right to initiate or join in URESA proceedings initiated by individual obligee but not an action against individual obligee over sums recovered. Since state did not choose to initiate or join in proceedings, it voluntarily waived rights granted under this section. St. v. Hultgren, 168 M 257, 541 P2d 1211 (1975).

40-5-1022. Proceeding by minor parent.

Official Comments

This section is derived from RURESA § 13 [40-5-114, now repealed]. A minor parent may maintain an action under UIFSA without the appointment of a guardian ad litem, even if the law of the jurisdiction requires a guardian for an in-state case. If a guardian or legal representative has been appointed, however, he or she may act on behalf of the minor's child in seeking support.

40-5-1023. Application of law of this state.

Official Comments

Historically states have insisted on application of forum law to support cases whenever possible. A key principle of UIFSA is that a tribunal will have the same powers in an action involving interstate parties as it has in an intrastate case. This inevitably means that the Act is not self-contained; rather, it is supplemented by the support law of the forum. To insure the efficient processing of the huge number of interstate support cases, it is vital that decision-makers apply familiar rules of substantive and procedural law to those cases.

40-5-1024. Duties of initiating tribunal.

Official Comments

Under RURESA § 14 [this section prior to 1993 amendment], the initiating tribunal is required to make a preliminary finding of the existence of a support obligation, but in fact, observance of this obligation is erratic across the nation. Under UIFSA, by contrast, the role of the initiating tribunal consists merely of the ministerial function of forwarding the documents. See Mossburg v. Coffman, 6 Kan. App. 2d 428, 629 P.2d 745 (1981); Neff v. Johnson, 391 S.W.2d 760 (Tex. Civ. App. 1965).

2015 Amendment: Chapter 174 in (1) in introductory clause after "tribunal" inserted "of this state" and after "forward" deleted "three copies of"; and in (2) substituted current text providing duties of state tribunal if request made by responding tribunal for former text that read: "(2) If a responding state has not enacted the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act or another law or procedure substantially similar to that act, a tribunal of this state may issue a certificate or other documents and make findings required by the law or procedure of the responding state. If the responding state is a foreign jurisdiction, the tribunal may specify the amount of support sought and provide other documents necessary to satisfy the requirements of the responding state." Amendment effective July 1, 2015.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 352 deleted former (2) providing that the department of public health and human services is the initiating tribunal for any action or proceeding under Title 40, chapter 5, parts 2, 4, and 6, and the district court is the initiating tribunal in all other cases; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 23, 2001.

1997 Amendments: Chapter 42 in (2), at end of first sentence, substituted reference to part 6 for reference to part 5. Amendment effective March 12, 1997.

Chapter 552 inserted (3) stating when a tribunal of this state may issue a certificate and make findings and what the tribunal may do if the responding state is a foreign jurisdiction. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 546 in (2) substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 328 substituted language regarding duties of initiating tribunal for former section that read: "If the initiating court finds that the petition sets forth facts from which it may be determined that the obligor owes a duty of support and that a court of the responding state may obtain jurisdiction of the obligor or his property, it shall so certify and cause three copies of the petition and its certificate and one copy of this part to be sent to the responding court. Certification shall be in accordance with the requirements of the initiating state. If the name and address of the responding court is unknown and the responding state has an information agency comparable to that established in the initiating state, it shall cause the copies to be sent to the state information agency or other proper official of the responding state, with a request that the agency or official forward them to the proper court and that the court of the responding state acknowledge their receipt to the initiating court."

40-5-1025. Duties and powers of responding tribunal.

Official Comments

This section revises RURESA §§ 9 [40-5-110, now repealed], 18 [40-5-119, renumbered 40-5-1028], 19 [40-5-120, now repealed], 24 [40-5-125, now repealed], 25 [40-5-126, now repealed], and 26 [40-5-127, now repealed]. It contains both mechanical functions, such as those in subsection (a) [(1)]; judicial functions, as in subsection (b) [(2)], and substantive rules applicable to interstate cases, subsections (c)-(e) [(3) through (5)]. For example, subsection (b) [(2)] supplies much more detail than RURESA §§ 24 [40-5-125, now repealed] and 26 [40-5-127, now repealed] to make explicit the wide range of specific powers of the responding tribunal. Because a responding tribunal may be an administrative agency rather than a court, the Act explicitly states that a tribunal is not granted powers that it does not otherwise possess under state law. For example, often authority to enforce orders by contempt is limited to courts.

Subsection (b)(7) [(2)(g)] purposefully avoids mention of the priority of liens issued under UIFSA. As is generally true under the Act, that priority will be determined by the otherwise applicable state law concerning support liens.

Subsection (b)(9) [(2)(i)] replaces RURESA § 16 [40-5-117, now repealed] (Jurisdiction By Arrest), which authorizes the responding tribunal "to obtain the body of the obligor" if the tribunal "believes that the obligor may flee ...." Under UIFSA, the physical seizure of an obligor is left to the procedures available under state law in other civil cases.

Subsection (c) [(3)] clarifies that calculation sheets are to be included with the order in conjunction with the application of support guidelines. Local law generally requires that variation from the child support guidelines must be explained, see 42 U.S.C. § 667; this requirement is extended to all interstate cases.

Under subsection (d) [(4)], an interstate support order may not be conditioned on compliance with a visitation order. While this may be at variance from state law governing intrastate cases, under a UIFSA action the petitioner generally is not present in the tribunal. This distinction justifies prohibiting visitation issues from being litigated in the context of a support proceeding.

Subsection (e) [(5)] introduces the policy determination that the petitioner, the respondent, and the initiating tribunal, if any, shall be kept informed about actions taken by the responding tribunal. First class mail is sufficient for this purpose.

In all other cases, the district court is the responding tribunal"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2015.

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER FORMER LAW (URESA)

No Equitable Modification of Child Support Decree Upon Agreement of Parties: Wife and husband were divorced after several years of marriage, and the District Court awarded custody of the couple's two children to the wife, with visitation awarded to the husband. The wife remarried a year later and shortly thereafter moved to Nebraska. At all times, the wife kept the Missoula County Attorney's Office informed of her whereabouts and brought a URESA (replaced by UIFSA) action against her former husband for back child support. Husband made few attempts to contact his children, even though he knew where they were living. Wife's new husband later adopted the children, and wife sought back child support for those payments up until the time the children were adopted, which payments the District Court awarded. The Supreme Court distinguished the case from State ex rel. Blakeslee v. Horton, 222 M 351, 722 P2d 1148 (1986), stating that there was no implicit agreement between the parties for one parent to give up child support in exchange for the other parent giving up visitation. Wife always sought to enforce her right to child support and made no attempt to discourage her former husband from exercising his right to visitation. Husband gave up visitation on his own, but the right to visitation is legally separate and distinct from the husband's enforceable duty to provide child support pursuant to the District Court's previous decree. In re Marriage of Bronzynski, 246 M 200, 806 P2d 8, 47 St. Rep. 1853 (1990).

Equity to Override Legally Correct Claim: The parties were divorced in 1970, and the father was ordered to pay $50 a month in child support through the Clerk of Court. No payments were ever made, and no visitation was ever sought. In 1984, the mother filed a URESA (replaced by UIFSA) action for back support. In defending the action, the father contended that the mother took the position that if he would stay out of her life and the child's life, they would stay out of his. He had no contact with either party during the ensuing 14 years. The District Court denied enforcement of the petition for child support. The Supreme Court on appeal upheld the District Court. Recognizing that the law is clear that an arrearage in child support payment cannot be modified on any retroactive basis and that child support and child visitation are separate incidents, neither being dependent or conditioned upon the other, the court found these legal principles rendered impotent when the parties mutually agreed that they be ignored and carried out the agreement in fact for 14 years. The court stated that equity could not allow the mother to participate in nullification of the purpose of the law in fact and, at the same time, allow her to claim the benefit of it in theory simply because there was a meter running which could total a dollar loss in child support but nothing to total the loss of a father-son association. The court stated that the principles of equity applied in this case did not reverse or modify any previous case law. State of Wash. ex rel. Blakeslee v. Horton, 222 M 351, 722 P2d 1148, 43 St. Rep. 1321 (1986), distinguished in In re Marriage of Bronzynski, 246 M 200, 806 P2d 8, 47 St. Rep. 1853 (1990).

Child Support Action — Affidavit of Officer of State Seeking Reimbursement: In North Dakota's action for a declaration of paternity and to obtain child support, it was proper to exclude the affidavit of a North Dakota welfare administrator setting forth what North Dakota had paid for public assistance to the mother, the child's medical costs, and blood tests to establish paternity, for which North Dakota sought reimbursement. The affidavit was hearsay, was made by a person not available for cross-examination, and did not fit within any of the hearsay exceptions. However, under 40-5-121 (now repealed) the welfare administrator's deposition as to his state's pleaded costs could be taken and the case was remanded to allow a deposition to be taken. Because North Dakota did not plead its expenditures for the child's medical costs, they could not be recovered and the deposition could not cover those costs. State of N. Dak. ex rel. B.J.D. v. S.P.R., 219 M 26, 710 P2d 702, 42 St. Rep. 1817 (1985).

District Court Adjudicating Action — No Authority to Modify Original Support Order: Even though the URESA (replaced by UIFSA) responding court and the court that issued the original child support order are the same, a request for modification of the divorce decree is separate from an enforcement action. State of Oregon ex rel. Worden v. Drinkwalter, 216 M 9, 700 P2d 150, 42 St. Rep. 599 (1985).

Evidence of Emancipation of Minor Child: When evidence in a URESA (replaced by UIFSA) action indicated that the minor child lived away from the obligee but was not earning enough money to support herself, the District Court's determination that the minor child was not emancipated was not clearly erroneous. State of Oregon ex rel. Worden v. Drinkwalter, 216 M 9, 700 P2d 150, 42 St. Rep. 599 (1985).

Payments Made Directly to Children: The obligation to pay child support is not discharged by payment to the children themselves when the support order directs that payment be made to the children's mother. State of Oregon ex rel. Worden v. Drinkwalter, 216 M 9, 700 P2d 150, 42 St. Rep. 599 (1985).

Scope of Responding Court's Authority — Undetermined: Because it was unnecessary in this action, the Supreme Court refused to decide whether to follow the majority rule that a URESA (replaced by UIFSA) responding court may make an independent review of the duty and amount of support due from an alleged obligor, or to follow the minority rule that the responding court is limited to examining the foreign court's order to see if it, on its face, states that the alleged obligor has a duty to support. State of Oregon ex rel. Worden v. Drinkwalter, 216 M 9, 700 P2d 150, 42 St. Rep. 599 (1985).

Obligation to Support Independent of Visitation Rights: A child's right to support and the parent's support obligation are not affected by misconduct of the parent or violations of visitation provisions of a custody decree. The District Court therefore was in error in making the enforcement of the child support payments, under a Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (URESA) (replaced by UIFSA) action, contingent upon visitation compliance by the custodial parent. State ex rel. Dewyea v. Knapp, 208 M 19, 674 P2d 1104, 41 St. Rep. 143 (1984), affirmed in In re Adoption of K.L.J.K., 224 M 418, 730 P2d 1135, 43 St. Rep. 2297 (1986).

Superseding Order: Nevada child support award was not modified by child support order of Idaho court entered at time the Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (replaced by UIFSA) in effect in Idaho specifically provided that no order of support issued by court of that state, when acting as responding state, should supersede any other order of support. Campbell v. Jenne, 172 M 219, 563 P2d 574 (1977).

Subsequent Order: Nevada child support award was not modified by child support order of Montana court. The Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (replaced by UIFSA) provided that support order entered by Montana court did not nullify support order made by court of any other state, unless specifically provided for. In absence of Montana support order referring to Nevada support award, the Nevada award was not modified. Campbell v. Jenne, 172 M 219, 563 P2d 574 (1977).

Order to Refer to Prior Orders: Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (replaced by UIFSA) court orders that do not refer to prior support awards do not modify them. Campbell v. Jenne, 172 M 219, 563 P2d 574 (1977).

OPINIONS UNDER FORMER LAW (URESA)

County Attorney Not Authorized to Compromise Support Order on Behalf of Obligee: A County Attorney, in carrying out his responsibility under URESA (replaced by UIFSA) to represent obligees, may not enter into an agreement with an obligor or his agent to compromise a support order or to allow the sale of property on which a support order is a lien, since under 40-4-208 a support order may only be modified by a court. Further, 40-4-208 provides that a modification of a court support decree may affect only amounts that accrue subsequent to the motion for modification. 41 A.G. Op. 7 (1985).

40-5-1026. Inappropriate tribunal.

Official Comments

This section directs a tribunal that receives UIFSA documents in error to forward them to the appropriate tribunal, whether located in the enacting state or elsewhere. This section is intended to apply both to initiating and responding tribunals which receive petitions which should be sent to other tribunals. Thus, if a tribunal is inappropriately designated as the initiating tribunal it shall forward the petition to the appropriate initiating tribunal either in the enacting state or elsewhere. Likewise, if a tribunal is inappropriate as the responding tribunal it shall forward the petition to the appropriate responding tribunal either in the enacting state or elsewhere.

40-5-1027. Duties of support enforcement agency.

Official Comments

This section is derived from RURESA §§ 12 [40-5-113, now repealed], 18 [40-5-119, renumbered 40-5-1028], and 19 [40-5-120, now repealed].

Subsection (a) [(1)] changes the focus of RURESA § 12 [40-5-113, now repealed] (Officials to Represent Obligee) from representation of an obligee to providing services to a [petitioner]. Care should be exercised in the use of terminology given this substantial alteration of past practice under RURESA. Not only may either the obligee or the obligor request services, but that request may be in the context of the establishment of an order, enforcement or review of an existing order, or a modification of that order (upwards or downwards). Thus, those states that use the term "petitioner" to refer to the "plaintiff" or "complainant" in the original caption of the case may wish to substitute the term "movant" in proceedings initiated after the establishment of a support order.

Subsection (b) [(2)] responds to the complaint of many RURESA petitioners that they are not properly kept informed about the progress of their requests for services.

Subsection (c) [(3)] neither creates nor rejects the establishment of an attorney-client or fiduciary relationship between the support enforcement agency and a petitioner receiving services from that agency. This controversial issue is left to otherwise applicable state law.

This section continues the principle of RURESA § 18(c) [40-5-119(3), renumbered 40-5-1028], under which the Attorney General of the State, or an alternative designated by the individual state statute, is given oversight responsibility for the diligent provision of services by the support enforcement agency and the power to seek compliance with the Act.

(2) The prosecuting attorney shall prosecute the case diligently. He shall take all action necessary in accordance with the laws of this state to enable the court to obtain jurisdiction over the obligor or his property and shall request the court to set a time and place for a hearing and give notice thereof to the obligor in accordance with law.

Official Comments

This section, based on RURESA § 17 [40-5-118, renumbered 40-5-1030] (State Information Agency), continues the information-gathering duties of the central agency.

Subsection (b)(4) [(2)(d)] does not provide independent access to the information sources or to the governmental documents listed. 1995 Amendment: Chapter 546 in (1) substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 328 substituted language regarding duties of state information agency for former section that read: "(1) The state department of social and rehabilitation services is designated as the state information agency under this part.

(2) It shall:

(a) compile a list of the courts and their addresses in this state having jurisdiction under this part and transmit it to the state information agency of every other state which has adopted this or a substantially similar law. Upon the adjournment of each session of the legislature the agency shall distribute copies of any amendments to this part and a statement of their effective date to all other state information agencies.

(b) maintain a register of lists of courts received from other states and transmit copies thereof promptly to every court in this state having jurisdiction under this part; and

(c) forward to the court in this state which has jurisdiction over the obligor or his property petitions, certificates, and copies of the reciprocal enforcement of support act it receives from courts or information agencies of other states.

(3) If the state information agency does not know the location of the obligor or his property in the state and no state location service is available, it shall use all means at its disposal to obtain this information, including the examination of official records in the state and other sources such as telephone directories, real property records, vital statistics records, police records, requests for the name and address from employers who are able or willing to cooperate, records of motor vehicle license offices, requests made to the tax offices both state and federal where such offices are able to cooperate, and requests made to the social security administration as permitted by the Social Security Act, as amended.

(4) After the deposit of three copies of the petition and certificate and one copy of the reciprocal enforcement of support act of the initiating state with the clerk of the appropriate court, if the state information agency knows or believes that the prosecuting attorney is not prosecuting the case diligently, it shall inform the attorney general who may undertake the representation."

40-5-1031. Pleadings and accompanying documents.

Official Comments

This section is derived from RURESA § 11 [40-5-112, now repealed]; it establishes the basic requirements for the drafting and filing of interstate pleadings and should be read in conjunction with § 312 [40-5-172, renumbered 40-5-1032], which provides for the confidentiality of certain information if disclosure is likely to result in harm to a party or a child.

Subsection (b) [(2)] provides authorization for the use of the federally authorized forms promulgated in connection with the IV-D child support enforcement program and mandates substantial compliance with those forms. Although the use of other forms is not prohibited, statutory preapproval of forms that substantially conform to those mandated by federal law will help to standardize documents, with a concomitant improvement in the efficient processing of UIFSA actions.

2015 Amendment: Chapter 174 in (1) substituted current text concerning requirements for filing petition for former text that read: "(1) A petitioner who seeks to establish or modify a support order or to determine parentage in a proceeding under this part shall verify the petition.

Unless otherwise ordered under 40-5-172, the petition or accompanying documents must provide, so far as known, the name, residential address, and social security numbers of the obligor and the obligee and the name, sex, residential address, social security number, and date of birth of each child for whom support is sought. The petition must be accompanied by a certified copy of any support order in effect. The petition may include any other information that may assist in locating or identifying the respondent." 40-5-1032. Nondisclosure of information in exceptional circumstances.

Official Comments

Public awareness of and sensitivity to the dangers of domestic violence has significantly increased since the promulgation of RURESA. This section authorizes confidentiality in instances where there is a serious risk of domestic violence or child abduction. Although local law generally governs the conduct of the forum tribunal, state law may not provide for maintaining secrecy about the exact whereabouts of a litigant or other information ordinarily required to be disclosed under state law, e.g., Social Security number of the parties or the child. If so, this provision creates a confidentiality provision which is particularly appropriate in the light of the intractable problems associated with interstate (as opposed to intrastate) childnapping.

2015 Amendment: Chapter 174 substituted current text for former text that read: "Upon a finding, which may be made ex parte, that the health, safety, or liberty of a party or child would be unreasonably put at risk by the disclosure of identifying information or if an existing order so provides, a tribunal shall order that the address of the child or party or other identifying information not be disclosed in a pleading or other document filed in a proceeding under this part." 40-5-1033. Costs and fees.

Official Comments

This section is derived from RURESA § 15 [40-5-116, now repealed] (Costs and Fees), which authorizes fees and costs to be assessed against "the obligor." In recognition of the fact that under UIFSA either the obligor or the obligee may file suit, subsection (a) [(1)] permits either to file without payment of a filing fee or other costs. Subsection (b) [(2)], however, continues the RURESA rule that only the support obligor may be assessed the specified costs and fees.

Subsection (c) [(3)] provides a sanction to deal with a frivolous contest regarding compliance with an interstate withholding order, registration of a support order, or comparable delaying tactics regarding an appropriate enforcement remedy.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 352 deleted former (4) providing that the standardized schedule of fees established by the department of public health and human services under 40-5-210 is conclusive in an action under this section and that fees or costs recoverable under subsection (2) that are not included in the schedule are recoverable under subsection (2). DECISIONS UNDER FORMER LAW (URESA)

Child Support Action — Affidavit of Officer of State Seeking Reimbursement: In North Dakota's action for a declaration of paternity and to obtain child support, it was proper to exclude the affidavit of a North Dakota welfare administrator setting forth what North Dakota had paid for public assistance to the mother, the child's medical costs, and blood tests to establish paternity, for which North Dakota sought reimbursement. The affidavit was hearsay, was made by a person not available for cross-examination, and did not fit within any of the hearsay exceptions. However, under 40-5-121 (now repealed) the welfare administrator's deposition as to his state's pleaded costs could be taken and the case was remanded to allow a deposition to be taken. Because North Dakota did not plead its expenditures for the child's medical costs, they could not be recovered and the deposition could not cover those costs. State of N. Dak. ex rel. B.J.D. v. S.P.R., 219 M 26, 710 P2d 702, 42 St. Rep. 1817 (1985).

Denial of Costs and Attorney Fees for Claimed Frivolous Appeal: In North Dakota's action for a declaration of paternity and to obtain child support, the lower court excluded a North Dakota welfare official's affidavit as to his state's costs. Plaintiff appealed the exclusion, and defendant claimed on appeal that the lower court's disallowance of unpleaded expenses was proper. The Supreme Court held for plaintiff but remanded to allow the official's deposition to be taken on the support expenses of North Dakota. Defendant's argument that he should be awarded attorney fees and costs because the appeal was frivolous was totally without merit. State of N. Dak. ex rel. B.J.D. v. S.P.R., 219 M 26, 710 P2d 702, 42 St. Rep. 1817 (1985).

Appearance Fee Required of URESA Respondent — Affidavit Excusing Payment: The respondent in a URESA (replaced by UIFSA) action is required to pay a $40 appearance fee. However, the respondent may be excused from payment upon filing an affidavit in accordance with 25-10-404. 43 A.G. Op. 3 (1989).

40-5-1034. Limited immunity of petitioner.

Official Comments

This section significantly expands RURESA § 32 [40-5-133, renumbered 40-5-1034]. Under subsection (a) [(1)], direct or indirect participation in a UIFSA proceeding does not subject a petitioner to an assertion of personal jurisdiction over the petitioner by the forum state in other litigation between the parties. A petition for affirmative relief under UIFSA limits the jurisdiction of the tribunal to the boundaries of the support proceeding.

Similarly, subsection (b) [(2)] grants a litigant immunity from service of process during the time a party is physically present in a state for a UIFSA action. The immunity provided is limited, however, and is not comparable to diplomatic immunity. This is clear from reading subsection (c) [(3)] in conjunction with the other subsections; subsection (c) [(3)] withholds immunity from civil litigation unrelated to the support action stemming from contemporaneous acts committed by a party while present in the state for the support litigation. For example, if a petitioner is involved in an automobile accident or a contract dispute over the cost of lodging while present in the state, the immunity provided by this section is inapplicable.

DECISIONS UNDER FORMER LAW

Obligation to Support Independent of Visitation Rights: A child's right to support and the parent's support obligation are not affected by misconduct of the parent or violations of visitation provisions of a custody decree. The District Court therefore was in error in making the enforcement of the child support payments, under a Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (URESA) (replaced by UIFSA) action, contingent upon visitation compliance by the custodial parent. State ex rel. Dewyea v. Knapp, 208 M 19, 674 P2d 1104, 41 St. Rep. 143 (1984), affirmed in In re Adoption of K.L.J.K., 224 M 418, 730 P2d 1135, 43 St. Rep. 2297 (1986).

40-5-1035. Nonparentage as defense.

Official Comments

Arguably this section does no more than restate the basic principle of res judicata. However, a great variety of state laws exists regarding presumptions of parentage and available defenses after a prior determination of parentage. This section is intended neither to discourage nor encourage collateral attacks in situations in which the law of a foreign jurisdiction is at significant odds with local law. For example, this section mandates that a parentage decree rendered by another tribunal is not subject to collateral attack in a UIFSA proceeding except on a fundamental constitutional ground such as lack of jurisdiction over a party or a comparable denial of due process in the previous proceeding. If a collateral attack is permissible on a parentage decree under the law of the issuing jurisdiction, such an action must be pursued in the appropriate forum and not in the UIFSA proceeding.

Similarly, the law of the issuing state may provide for a determination of parentage based on certain specific acts of the obligor acknowledging parentage as a substitute for a decree, e.g., signing the child's birth certificate or publicly acknowledging a duty of support after receiving the child into his home. The Act also is neutral regarding a collateral attack on such a parentage determination; the responding tribunal must give the same effect to such an act of acknowledgment of parentage as it would receive in the issuing state. The consistent theme of this section is that a collateral attack cannot be made in a UIFSA proceeding.

40-5-1036. Special rules of evidence and procedure.

Official Comments

This section combines RURESA §§ 9 [40-5-110, now repealed], 19 [40-5-120, now repealed], 21 [40-5-122, now repealed], 22 [40-5-123, now repealed], and 23 [40-5-124, now repealed]; and, provides additional innovative methods for gathering evidence in interstate cases.

Subsections (b) through (f) [(2) through (6)] greatly expand on RURESA § 23 [40-5-124, now repealed] (Rules of Evidence). The intent is to eliminate as many potential hearsay problems as possible in interstate litigation because usually the out-of-state party and that party's witnesses do not appear in person at the hearing.

Subsection (d) [(4)] provides a simplified means for proving health care expenses related to the birth of the child. Because ordinarily these charges are not in dispute, this is designed to obviate the cost of having health care providers appear in person or of obtaining affidavits of business records from each provider.

Subsections (e) [(5)] and (f) [(6)] encourage tribunals and litigants to take advantage of modern methods of communication in interstate support litigation.

Subsection (g) [(7)] codifies the rule in effect in many states that in civil litigation an adverse inference may be drawn from a litigant's silence. See, e.g., In re Matter of Joseph P., 487 N.Y.S.2d 685 (Fam. Ct. 1985); Pa. Cons. Stats. Ann., Tit. 23, § 5104(c) (1991) (if "any party refuses to submit to the tests, the court may resolve the question of paternity, parentage or identity of a child against the party...."); 9 N.J. Stats. Ann. 17-51(d) (1991) ("refusal to submit to blood tests or genetic tests, or both, may be admitted into evidence and shall give rise to the presumption that the results of the tests would have been unfavorable to the interests of the party refusing"); La. 40-5-1037. Communications between tribunals.

Official Comments

This section is derived from UCCJA 7(d) [40-7-108(4)] (Inconvenient Forum), which authorizes communications between courts in order to facilitate determination under that Act. Much broader cooperation between tribunals is permitted under this Act to expedite establishment and enforcement of the support order of either the forum or of the sister state.

40-5-1038. Assistance with discovery.

Official Comments

This section takes another logical step to facilitate interstate cooperation by enlisting the power of the forum to assist a tribunal of another state with the discovery process. 40-5-1042. Establishment of support order.

Official Comments

This section authorizes a tribunal of the responding state to issue temporary and permanent support orders binding on an obligor over whom the tribunal has personal jurisdiction. It should be emphasized that UIFSA does not permit such orders to be issued when another support order exists and another tribunal has continuing, exclusive jurisdiction over the matter. See § 205 [40-5-149, renumbered 40-5-1012] (Continuing, Exclusive Jurisdiction) and § 206 [40-5-150, renumbered 40-5-1013] (Enforcement and Modification of Support Order by Tribunal Having Continuing Jurisdiction).

(a) the respondent has signed a verified statement acknowledging parentage;

(b) the respondent has been determined by or pursuant to law to be the parent; or 40-5-1043. Proceeding to determine parentage.

Official Comments

This article [This section] authorizes a "pure" parentage action in the interstate context, i.e., an action not joined with a claim for support. Either the mother or a man alleging to be the father of a child may bring such an action. More commonly, an action to determine parentage across state lines will also seek to establish a support order under the Act. See § 401 [40-5-179, renumbered 40-5-1042] ([Petition] to Establish Support Order).

Parentage actions under UIFSA are to be treated identically to such actions brought in the responding state.

DECISIONS UNDER FORMER LAW (URESA)

Paternity Contested After Adjudication of Marital Dissolution — Relitigation Barred by Collateral Estoppel: When paternity was contested in response to an action to collect past child support payments, the District Court properly ruled that the issue of paternity had previously been adjudicated during the marriage dissolution proceeding and that relitigation of the issue was barred by collateral estoppel. In re Marriage of Holland, 224 M 414, 730 P2d 410, 43 St. Rep. 2293 (1986).

Rebuttal of Paternity Presumption: The issue of paternity in a Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (URESA) (replaced by UIFSA) action must be determined according to the provisions of the Uniform Parentage Act. Failure to rebut the presumption that petitioner's husband was the natural father of the child within 5 years of the child's birth bars a paternity action against a nonpresumed person. Borchers v. McCarter, 181 M 169, 592 P2d 941 (1979), followed, as to the necessity to rebut the presumption in seeking to establish paternity in someone other than the presumed parent, in In re Paternity of Vainio, 284 M 229, 943 P2d 1282, 54 St. Rep. 858 (1997).

Paternity Determination as Final Judgment: A jury verdict determining paternity is an appealable final judgment and, in effect, an action separate from a support determination. Borchers v. McCarter, 181 M 169, 592 P2d 941 (1979).

40-5-1052. Administrative enforcement of orders.

Official Comments

This section authorizes summary enforcement of a sister state child support order through any administrative means available for local orders. Under subsection (a) [(1)], any interested party in another state, necessarily including a private attorney or a support enforcement agency, may forward a support order or income-withholding order to a support enforcement agency of the enacting state.

Subsection (b) [(2)] directs the support enforcement agency in the enacting state to employ the enacting state's regular administrative procedures to process the out-of-state order. Thus, a local employer accustomed to dealing with the local agency need not learn a new procedure in order to comply with an out-of-state order.

40-5-1055. Registration of order for enforcement.

Official Comments

Part A of Article 6 [Sections 40-5-184 through 40-5-187, renumbered 40-5-1055 through 40-5-1058] greatly expands the procedure for the registration of foreign support orders available under RURESA §§ 35-40 [40-5-136, now repealed; 40-5-137, renumbered 40-5-1055; 40-5-138, now repealed; 40-5-139, now repealed; 40-5-140, renumbered 40-5-1056; and 40-5-141, renumbered

40-5-1057]. The common practice of initiating a new suit for the establishment of a support order irrespective of the facthat there is an existing order for support will become obsolete under UIFSA. The fact that RURESA permits (really encourages) initiation of a new suit in those circumstances led to the multiple support order system that UIFSA is designed to eliminate.

Under the one-order system of UIFSA, the only existing order is to be enforced. Registration of that order in the responding state is the first step to enforcement by a tribunal of that state. Rather than being an optional device as is the case under RURESA, registration for enforcement under UIFSA is the primary method for interstate enforcement by a tribunal. If a prior support order has been validly issued, only that order is to be enforced against the obligor in the absence of very narrow strictly defined fact situations in which an existing order may be modified. See §§ 609 through 612 [40-5-192 through 40-5-195, renumbered 40-5-1063 through 40-5-1068]. Additionally, until that order is modified, it is fully enforceable in the responding state.

Registration should be employed if the purpose is enforcement. Although registration not accompanied by a request for affirmative relief is not prohibited, the Act does not contemplate registration as serving a purpose in itself.

40-5-1056. Procedure to register order for enforcement.

Official Comments

This section outlines the mechanics for registration of a sister state order. Subsection (c) [(3)] warns that if a particular enforcement remedy must be specifically sought under local law, the same is required in interstate cases. However, the authorization of a later request contemplates that interstate pleadings may be liberally amended to conform to local practice.

2015 Amendment: Chapter 174 in (1) at beginning inserted exception clause, after "state" inserted "or a foreign support order", and substituted "records" for "documents and information"; in (1)(c) substituted "person requesting" for "party seeking"; in (1)(e) inserted exception clause; in (2) after "filed" inserted "as an order of a tribunal or another state or a foreign support order"; inserted (4) concerning two or more orders in effect; inserted (5) concerning request for determination of controlling order; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2015.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 546 in (1) substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 328 substituted language concerning procedure to register order for former section that read: "(1) An obligee seeking to register a foreign support order in a court of this state shall transmit to the clerk of the court:

(a) three certified copies of the order with all modifications thereof;

(b) one copy of the reciprocal enforcement of support act of the state in which the order was made; and

(c) a statement, verified and signed by the obligee, showing the post-office address of the obligee, the last known place of residence and post-office address of the obligor, the amount of support remaining unpaid, a description and the location of any property of the obligor available upon execution, and a list of the states in which the order is registered.

(2) Upon receipt of these documents the clerk of the court, without payment of a filing fee or other cost to the obligee, shall file them in the registry of foreign support orders. The filing constitutes registration under this part.

(3) Promptly upon registration the clerk of the court shall send by certified or registered mail to the obligor at the address given a notice of the registration with a copy of the registered support order and the post-office address of the obligee. He shall also docket the case and notify the prosecuting attorney of his action. The prosecuting attorney shall proceed diligently to enforce the order."

Registration and Enforcement by County Attorney: The County Attorney shall represent an obligee in registration and enforcement of a foreign support order under the Revised Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (1968) (replaced by UIFSA) when so requested pursuant to 40-5-139. 40 A.G. Op. 72 (1984).

40-5-1057. Effect of registration for enforcement.

Official Comments

Subsection (a) [(1)] is derived from RURESA § 39(a) [40-5-140(2), renumbered 40-5-1056], which states that "filing constitutes registration ...." Although the registration procedure under UIFSA is nearly identical to that of RURESA, the underlying intent of registration is radically different. Under RURESA, once an order of State A is registered in State B, it becomes an order of the latter. Under UIFSA, the order continues to be a State A order, which is to be enforced by a tribunal of State B. Although State B's rules of evidence and procedure apply, except as supplemented or specifically superseded by the Act, the order itself remains subject to the continuing, exclusive jurisdiction of State A so long as the requirements for that authority set forth in Section 205 [40-5-149, renumbered 40-5-1012] remain intact.

Subsection (b) [(2)] is derived from RURESA § 40(a) [40-5-141(1), renumbered 40-5-1057]. Although RURESA specifically subjects a registered order to "proceedings for reopening, vacating, or staying as a support order of this State," these remedies are not authorized under UIFSA. While a foreign support order is to be enforced and satisfied in the same manner as if it had been issued by a tribunal of the registering state, the order to be enforced remains an order of the issuing state. Conceptually, the responding state is enforcing the order of another state, not its own order. Any request for relief that requires application of the continuing, exclusive jurisdiction of the issuing tribunal must be sought in the issuing forum.

Subsection (c) [(3)] mandates enforcement of the registered order. See §§ 606 through 608 [40-5-189 through 40-5-191, renumbered 40-5-1060 through 40-5-1062]. This is at sharp variance with the RURESA § 40 [40-5-141, renumbered 40-5-1057] practice, which states that "the registered foreign support order shall be treated in the same manner as a support order issued by a court of this State." This language was generally interpreted as converting the foreign order into an order of the registering state. Once the registering court concludes that it is enforcing its own order, the next logical step is the conclusion that the order may be modified, which results in another version of the multiple order system. UIFSA mandates an end to this process, except as modification is authorized in this article, see §§ 609 through 612 [40-5-192 through 40-5-195, renumbered 40-5-1063 through 40-5-1068].

Because under UIFSA there is only one order in existence at any one time, that order is enforceable in a responding state irrespective of whether such an order might be modified. That is, if neither the child nor the parties continue to reside in the issuing state, the issuing tribunal loses its continuing, exclusive jurisdiction over its child support order. Nonetheless, the order continues to be fully enforceable until the potential for modification actually occurs in accordance with the strict terms for such an action as set forth in Part C of this article, §§ 609-612 [40-5-192 through 40-5-195, renumbered 40-5-1063 through 40-5-1068].

2015 Amendment: Chapter 174 in (1) after "another state" inserted "or a foreign support order"; in (2) after "registered" inserted "support" and after "another state" inserted "or a foreign country"; in (3) substituted "this part" for "40-5-184 through 40-5-195" and after "registered" inserted "support"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2015.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 328 substituted language concerning effect of registration for former section that read: "(1) Upon registration the registered foreign support order shall be treated in the same manner as a support order issued by a court of this state. It has the same effect and is subject to the same procedures, defenses, and proceedings for reopening, vacating, or staying as a support order of this state and may be enforced and satisfied in like manner.

(2) The obligor has 20 days after the mailing of notice of the registration in which to petition the court to vacate the registration or for other relief. If he does not so petition, the registered support order is confirmed.

(3) At the hearing to enforce the registered support order, the obligor may present only matters that would be available to him as defenses in an action to enforce a foreign money judgment. If he shows to the court that an appeal from the order is pending or will be taken or that a stay of execution has been granted, the court shall stay enforcement of the order until the appeal is concluded, the time for appeal has expired, or the order is vacated, upon satisfactory proof that the obligor has furnished security for payment of the support ordered as required by the rendering state. If he shows to the court any ground upon which enforcement of a support order of this state may be stayed, the court shall stay enforcement of the order for an appropriate period if the obligor furnishes the same security for payment of the support ordered that is required for a support order of this state."

Case Notes

Refusal to Terminate Parental Rights and Grant Petition for Adoption Proper: In an adoption proceeding, the stepfather petitioned to adopt his wife's child and sought to terminate the parental rights of the natural father of the child on the sole basis that the natural father was an unfit parent because he had failed to pay child support during the year prior to the filing of the petition for adoption. The District Court refused to terminate the parental rights of the natural father based on an existing child support order that set the amount of child support due at zero. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the natural father could not be declared unfit and have his parental rights terminated and his child adopted after complying with a valid court order specifying a child support obligation, albeit one of "zero". Registration and Enforcement by Private Attorney: A private attorney may register and enforce a foreign support order under the Revised Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (1968) (replaced by UIFSA) in Montana. 40 A.G. Op. 72 (1984).

40-5-1058. Choice of law.

Official Comments

This section identifies situations in which local law is inapplicable. For example, under subsection (a) [(1)] an order for the support of a child until age 21 must be recognized and enforced in that manner in a state in which the duty of support of a child ends at age 18. See Gonzalez-Goengaga v. Gonzalez, 426 So.2d 1106 (Fla. App. 1983); Taylor v. Taylor, 122 Cal. App. 3d 209, 175 Cal. Rptr. 716 (1981).

Subsection (b) [(2)] contains a similar choice of law provision that may diverge from local law. Whichever state's statute of limitations is longer is to be applied. In interstate cases arrearages will often have accumulated over a considerable period of time before enforcement is perfected. The obligor should not gain an undue benefit from the choice of residence if the forum state has a short statute of limitations for arrearages.

2015 Amendment: Chapter 174 substituted current text for former text that read: "(1) The law of the issuing state governs the nature, extent, amount, and duration of current payments and other obligations of support and the payment of arrearages under the order.

40-5-1059. Notice of registration of order.

Official Comments

Part B of Article 6 [Sections 40-5-188 through 40-5-191, renumbered 40-5-1059 through 40-5-1062] provides the procedure for the nonregistering party to contest registration of an order, either because the order is allegedly invalid, superseded, or no longer in effect, or because the enforcement remedy being sought is opposed by the nonregistering party.

This section provides that the nonregistering party must be fully informed of the effect of registration. After such notice is given, absent a successful contest by the nonregistering party, the order will be confirmed and future contest will be precluded.

40-5-1060. Procedure to contest validity or enforcement of registered support order.

Official Comments

Subsection (a) [(1)] is derived in part from RURESA § 40(b) [40-5-141(2), renumbered 40-5-1057], under which the "obligor" is directed to contest the registration of a foreign order within a short period of time. This procedure is continued, but the terminology is changed to "nonregistering party" because either the obligor or the obligee may seek to register a foreign support order. Moreover, the subsection is philosophically very different from RURESA § 40 [40-5-141, renumbered 40-5-1057], which directs that a registered order "shall be treated in the same manner as a support order issued by a court of this state." A contest of the fundamental provisions of the registered order is not permitted "in this State." The nonregistering party must return to the issuing state to prosecute such a contest, and then only as the law of that state permits. The procedure adopted here is akin to the prohibition of the nonparentage defense found in Section 315 [40-5-174, renumbered 40-5-1035]; that is, raising the issue in a UIFSA proceeding is prohibited, but no attempt is made to preclude the issue from being litigated in another, more appropriate forum if otherwise allowable by that forum. On the other hand, the respondent may assert defenses such as "payment" or "the obligation has terminated" to allegations of past noncompliance with the registered order. Similarly, a constitutionally-based attack may always be asserted, i.e., an alleged lack of personal jurisdiction over a party by the issuing tribunal. There is no defense, however, to the registration of a valid foreign support order.

Subsection (b) [(2)] precludes an untimely contest of a registered support order. As noted above, the nonregistering party is free to seek redress in the issuing state from the tribunal with continuing, exclusive jurisdiction over the support order.

Subsection (c) [(3)] directs that a hearing be scheduled when the nonregistering party contests some aspect of the registration. At present, federal regulations govern the allowable time frames for contesting income withholding in IV-D cases. See 42 U.S.C. § 666(b). Further codification of that process is unwise.

40-5-1061. Contest of registration or enforcement.

Official Comments

Subsection (a) [(1)] places the burden on the nonregistering party to assert narrowly defined defenses to registration of a support order.

If the obligor is liable for current support, under subsection (b) [(2)] the tribunal must enter an order to enforce that obligation. Proof of arrearages must result in enforcement; under the Bradley Amendment, 42 U.S.C. § 666(a)(10), all states are required to treat child support payments as final judgments as they come due (or lose federal funding). Therefore, such arrearages are not subject to retroactive modification.

40-5-1062. Confirmed order.

Official Comments

The policy determination that foreign support orders may need to be confirmed by the forum tribunal is found in URESA § 40 [40-5-141, renumbered 40-5-1057], but the process of confirmation is not explained. Under UIFSA, confirmation of an order may be the result of operation of law because of a failure to contest or an unsuccessful contest after a hearing. Either method precludes raising any issue that could have been asserted in a hearing. Confirmation of a foreign support order validates both the terms of the order and the asserted arrearages. See Chapman v. Chapman, 205 Cal. App. 3d 253, 252 Cal. Rptr. 359 (1988).

40-5-1063. Procedure to register child support order of another state for modification.

Official Comments

Part C of Article 6 [Sections 40-5-192 through 40-5-195, renumbered 40-5-1063 through 40-5-1068] deals with situations in which it is necessary for a registering state to modify the existing child support order of another state. As long as the issuing state maintains its continuing, exclusive jurisdiction over its order, a registering sister state is precluded from modifying that order. This is a very significant departure from the multiple-order, multiple-modification system of RURESA. However, if the issuing state no longer has a sufficient interest in the modification of its order because neither the child nor the parties continue to reside there, under appropriate circumstances a registering state may assume the power to modify. Note that authority to modify is limited to child support orders; the Act does not contemplate modification of spousal support orders.

A petitioner wishing to register a support order of another state for purposes of modification must conform to the general requirements for pleadings in Section 311 [40-5-171, renumbered 40-5-1031] (Pleadings and Accompanying Documents), and follow the procedure for registration set forth in Section 602 [40-5-185, renumbered 40-5-1056] (Procedure To Register Order for Enforcement). If the tribunal has the requisite jurisdiction over the parties as established in § 611 [40-5-194, renumbered 40-5-1065, 40-5-1067, and 40-5-1068], modification may be sought in conjunction with registration and enforcement, or at a later date after the order has been registered, confirmed, and enforced.

Official Comments

An order registered for purposes of modification may be enforced in the same manner as an order registered for purposes of enforcement. But, the power of the forum tribunal to modify a child support order of another tribunal is limited by the specific factual preconditions set forth in § 611 [40-5-194, renumbered 40-5-1065, 40-5-1067, and 40-5-1068].

40-5-1065. Modification of child support order of another state.

Official Comments

When a foreign support order is enforced in a registering state under UIFSA, the rights of the parties affected have been litigated previously. Because the obligor already has had a day in court, an enforcement remedy may be summarily invoked. On the other hand, modification of an existing order presupposes a change in the rights of the parties. Therefore, even under RURESA more elaborate procedures were required by most states prior to the issuance of a modified order. These requirements are much more explicit and restrictive under UIFSA.

A support order registered under RURESA for the purpose of enforcement is treated as if originally issued by the registering tribunal. Most states have interpreted the RURESA registration provisions as also authorizing prospective modification of the registered order, see, e.g., Lagerwey v. Lagerwey, 681 P.2d 309 (Alaska 1984); In re Marriage of Aron, 224 Cal. App. 3d 1086 (1990); MacFadden v. Martini, 119 Misc. 2d 94, 463 N.Y.S.2d 674 (1983); Pinner v. Pinner, 33 N.C. App. 204, 234 S.E.2d 633 (1977). In sum, by its terms RURESA contemplates existence of multiple support orders, none of which is directly related to any of the others. Although the issuing tribunal under RURESA retains continuing jurisdiction to modify its own order, that power is not exclusive. Tribunals in other states often assume jurisdiction to enter new orders or to modify an out-of-state support order.

Under UIFSA a tribunal may modify an existing child support order of another state only if certain quite limited conditions are met. First, the tribunal must have all the prerequisites for the exercise of personal jurisdiction required for rendition of an original support order. Second, one of the restricted fact situations described in subsection (a) [(1)] must be present. This section, which is a counterpart to Section 205(b) [40-5-149(2), renumbered 40-5-1012(2)] (Continuing, Exclusive Jurisdiction), establishes the conditions under which the continuing jurisdiction of the issuing tribunal is released. The Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act §§ 12-14 [40-7-113 through 40-7-115, all now repealed] provides general principles for the judicial determination of an appropriate fact situation for subsequent modification of an existing custody order by another court. In contrast, UIFSA establishes a set of "bright line" rules for modification of an existing child support order.

Under UIFSA, registration is subdivided into distinct categories: registration for enforcement, for modification, or both. Subsection (a) [(1)] contemplates modification of an existing child support order only under the limited circumstances described, thus eliminating multiple support orders to the maximum extent possible consistent with the principle of continuing, exclusive jurisdiction that pervades the Act. The continuing, exclusive jurisdiction of the issuing tribunal remains intact so long as one party or the child continue to reside in the issuing state, or unless the parties mutually agree to the contrary. This is also the standard for recognition of sister state custody orders under the federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1738A. Once every individual party and the child leave the issuing state, the continuing, exclusive jurisdiction of the tribunal terminates, although the order remains in effect and enforceable until it is modified. If and when the order is modified by a tribunal of another state, the principle of continuing, exclusive jurisdiction is further ratified; the order of the modifying tribunal becomes the operative "only-order-in-effect."

Under subsection (a)(1) [(1)(a)], all persons affected by the initial order must have moved from the issuing state before a tribunal in a new forum may modify. In virtually all cases, the new forum will be the state of residence of either obligor or obligee. Proof of this may be made directly in the forum state; no purpose would be served by requiring the petitioner to return to the original issuing state for a document to confirm the fact that none of the relevant persons still lives there.

Note that subsection (a)(1) [(1)(a)] requires that the petitioner be a nonresident of the forum in which modification is sought and the respondent to be subject to the jurisdiction of that forum. This contemplates that the issuing state has lost continuing, exclusive jurisdiction and that the obligee may seek modification in the obligor's state of residence, or that the obligor may seek a modification in the obligee's state of residence. This restriction attempts to achieve a rough justice between the parties in the majority of cases by preventing a litigant from choosing to seek modification in a local court to the marked disadvantage of the other party. For example, an obligor visiting the children at the residence of the obligee cannot be validly served with citation accompanied by a motion to modify the support order. Even though such personal service of the obligor in the obligee's home state is consistent with the jurisdictional requisites of Burnham v. Superior Court, 495 U.S. 604 (1990), the motion to modify does not fulfill the requirement of being brought by "a [petitioner] who is a nonresident of this State ...." The obligee is required to make that motion in a state other than that of his or her residence which has personal jurisdiction over the obligor. Most typically this will be the state of residence of the obligor. Similarly, fairness requires that an obligee seeking to modify or modify and enforce the existing order in the state of residence of the obligor will not be subject to a cross-motion to modify custody or visitation merely because the issuing state has lost its continuing, exclusive jurisdiction over the support order. The obligor is required to make that motion in a state other than that of his or her residence; most likely, the obligee's state of residence. Finally, note that if both parties have left the issuing state and now reside in the same state, this section is not applicable. Such a fact situation does not present an interstate matter and UIFSA does not apply. Rather, the issuing state has lost its continuing exclusive jurisdiction and the forum state, as the residence of both parties, should apply local law without regard to the interstate Act.

Subsection (a)(2) [(1)(b)] allows the parties to terminate the continuing jurisdiction of the issuing state by agreement even though one of the parties or the child maintains a significant nexus with the issuing state. In contrast to subsection (a)(1) [(1)(a)], this must be initiated and confirmed by the issuing state and a copy of such an agreement must be filed in the issuing tribunal.

Modification of child support under subsections (a)(1) [(1)(a)] and (a)(2) [(1)(b)] is distinct from custody modification under the federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1738A, which provides that the court of continuing, exclusive jurisdiction may "decline jurisdiction." Similar provisions are found in the UCCJA, § 14 [40-7-115, now repealed]. In those statutes the methodology for the declination of jurisdiction is not spelled out, but rather is left to the discretion of possibly competing courts for case-by-case determination. The privilege of declining jurisdiction, thereby creating the potential for a vacuum, is not authorized under UIFSA. Once an initial child support order is established, at all times thereafter there is an existing order in effect to be enforced. Even if the issuing court no longer has continuing, exclusive jurisdiction, its order remains fully enforceable until a court with modification jurisdiction issues a new order in conformance with this article.

Subsection (b) [(2)] states that if the forum has modification jurisdiction because the issuing state has lost continuing jurisdiction, the proceedings will generally follow local law with regard to modification of child support orders. However, subsection (c) [(3)] prevents the modification of any final, nonmodifiable aspect of the original order. For example, if child support was ordered through age 21 in accordance with the law of the issuing state and the law of the forum state ends the support obligation at 18, modification by the forum tribunal may not affect the duration of the support order to age 21.

Subsection (d) [(4)] provides that upon modification the new order becomes the one-order to be recognized by all UIFSA states, and the issuing tribunal acquires continuing, exclusive jurisdiction.

Finally, subsection (e) [(5)] directs that the original issuing state be notified that it no longer is responsible to exercise its continuing, exclusive jurisdiction.

40-5-1066. Recognition of order modified in another state.

Official Comments

Independent support orders relating to the same parties, a hallmark of RURESA, are replaced in UIFSA by deference to the support order of a sister state. This applies not just to the original order, but also to a modified child support order issued by a second state under the standards established by Section 611 [40-5-194, renumbered 40-5-1065, 40-5-1067, and 40-5-1068] (Modification of Child Support Order of Another State). For the Act to function properly, the original issuing state must recognize and defer to such a modified order, and must regard its prior order as prospectively inoperative. Because the modifying tribunal lacks the authority to direct the original issuing state to release its continuing jurisdiction, each state must recognize this effect by enacting UIFSA.

Power is retained over post-modification by the original issuing tribunal for remedial actions directly connected to its now-modified order. A tribunal may enforce its subsequently modified order for violations of that order which occurred before the modification. Further, aspects of the original order that have become final or are not modifiable may be prospectively enforced by the issuing tribunal. For example, a contractual obligation to provide a college education trust fund for a child may be enforced under the law of the issuing state irrespective of the law of the modifying state.

2015 Amendment: Chapter 174 substituted current text for former text that read: "A tribunal of this state shall recognize a modification of its earlier child support order by a tribunal of another state that assumed jurisdiction pursuant to this part or a law substantially similar to this part. Except as otherwise provided in this part, the tribunal of this state shall, upon request:

(1) enforce the order that was modified only as to amounts accruing before the modification;

(2) enforce only nonmodifiable aspects of that order;

(3) provide other appropriate relief only for violations of the order that occurred before the effective date of the modification; and

(4) recognize the modifying order of the other state, upon registration, for the purpose of enforcement." Amendment effective July 1, 2015.

Official Comments

This section tracks RURESA § 5 [40-5-106, renumbered 40-5-1088] (Interstate Rendition) with no substantive change. Virtually no controversy has been generated regarding this portion of RURESA. Arguably application of subsection (c) [(2)] is problematical in situations in which the obligor neither was present in the demanding state at the time of the commission of the crime nor fled from the demanding state. The possibility that an individual may commit a crime in a state without ever being physically present there has elicited considerable discussion and some case law. See L. Brilmayer, "An Introduction to Jurisdiction in the American Federal System," 329-335 (1986) (discussing minimum contacts theory for criminal jurisdiction); Rotenberg, "Extraterritorial Legislative Jurisdiction and the State Criminal Law," 38 Tex. Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER FORMER LAW

Extradition for Criminal Nonsupport: Although a child support order issued by another state is a civil and not a criminal action, failure to pay the support may be a crime (felony criminal nonsupport) in that state, and the defendant is subject to extradition for criminal proceedings. Crabtree v. St., 186 M 340, 607 P2d 566 (1980).

Modification of Support Decree: When Montana and Idaho courts made child support awards without mention of original Nevada award under the Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (replaced by UIFSA), the initial decree remained valid and unmodified and was entitled to full faith and credit by the courts of Montana. Campbell v. Jenne, 172 M 219, 563 P2d 574 (1977).

Official Comments

This section tracks RURESA § 6 [40-5-107, renumbered 40-5-1089] (Conditions of Interstate Rendition) without significant change. CHAPTER 6
PARENT AND CHILD

Chapter Case Notes

Purpose and Applicability of Federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act: The federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act of 1980 (28 U.S.C. 1738A), enacted by Congress to address the problems of interstate forum shopping and child snatching, established national standards under which jurisdictions could determine whether they had jurisdiction and what effect to give the decisions made by courts of other jurisdictions by requiring that full faith and credit be accorded to decisions of a jurisdiction if the court appropriately exercised jurisdiction under the federal standards. The Act's general purposes are to promote cooperation and the exchange of information between state courts, to facilitate the enforcement of custody decisions of sister states, and to discourage continuing interstate controversies over child custody. The Act does not apply in a case in which there is no other state competing for jurisdiction. In re Marriage of Erler, 261 M 65, 862 P2d 12, 50 St. Rep. 1195 (1993).

40-6-103. Relationship not dependent on marriage.

Commissioners' Comment

Sections 1 and 2 [40-6-102, 40-6-103], the major substantive sections of the Act, establish the principles that regardless of the marital status of the parents, all children and all parents have equal rights with respect to each other...[R]ecent U.S. Supreme Court decisions and lower federal and state court decisions require equality of treatment in most areas of substantive law. See, generally, H. Krause, Illegitimacy: Law and Social Policy 59-104 (1971).

The first two cases to reach the U.S. Supreme Court concerned Louisiana's wrongful death statute and held that statute unconstitutional insofar as it (1) discriminated against illegitimate children, holding them ineligible to recover for the wrongful death of their mother (Levy v. Louisiana, 88 S.Ct. 1509, 391 U.S. 68 (1968)) and (2) denied a mother recovery for the wrongful death of her child (Glona v. American Guarantee & Liability Insurance Co., 88 S.Ct. 1515, 391 U.S. 73 (1968)).

It was a surprise when, within three years of deciding Levy and Glona, the U.S. Supreme Court reached a conclusion seemingly at odds with Levy and Glona. The Court had occasion to reconsider the question of the illegitimate child's legal position in a case involving inheritance, and refused to extend Levy v. Glona to permit an acknowledged illegitimate child to inherit from his intestate father under Louisiana law. (Labine v. Vincent, 91 S.Ct. 1017, 401 U.S. 532 (1971).)

The surprise engendered by the Labine decision was surpassed when the Supreme Court again reversed its position on this subject in 1972. In a dramatic departure from Labine, the U.S. Supreme Court held that workmen's compensation benefits related to the death of their father are due dependent, unacknowledged, illegitimate children. (Weber v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 92 S.Ct. 1400, 406 U.S. 164 (1972).) In January, 1973, the U.S. Supreme Court, finally substituting consistency for vacillation on this subject, decided that the illegitimate child is guaranteed a right of support from his father. (Gomez v. Perez, 93 S.Ct. 872 (1973).)

These decisions engendered a large number of decisions by lower federal courts and state courts at all levels which have broadly extended the legal relationship between the father and his child born out of wedlock. It should be noted, however, that several states had previously provided full (or nearly full) legal equality to illegitimates. To illustrate, Ore.Rev.Stat. § 109.060 (1969) provides:

"[t]he legal status and legal relationships and the rights and obligations between a person and his descendants, and between a person and his parents, their descendants and kindred, are the same for all persons, whether or not the parents have been married."

See, also, N.D.Cent.Code § 56-01-05 (Supp.1969); Ariz.Rev.Stat.Ann. § 14-206 (1956); Alaska Stat. 95.20.050(a) (1962).

40-6-105. Presumption of paternity.

Commissioners' Comment

In the situations described in subsection (a) [(1)], substantial evidence points to a particular man as being the father of the child and formal proceedings to establish paternity are not necessary. A presumption of paternity arises in the described circumstances. Most of the situations correspond to the instances in which current state law imposes a presumption of legitimacy.

Subsection (b)[(2)] contemplates that a presumption raised under subsection (a)[(1)] may be rebutted in appropriate circumstances. In accordance with current law in most states relating to the rebuttal of a presumption of "legitimacy", the presumption is difficult to rebut in that proof must be made by "clear and convincing evidence." Other details are covered in sections 6(a) and (b) [40-6-107(1) and (2)].

Case Notes

Speculation Insufficient to Rebut Presumption: Several years after the birth of their child, the mother claimed that the father was sterile and not the biological parent. The mother submitted personal observations, photographs, and Internet searches in support. The District Court ruled against the mother based on a DNA paternity test, the father's prior acknowledgment of paternity, and the mother's own acknowledgment of the father's paternity in a separate legal proceeding. On appeal, the mother argued that 40-6-105 does not require expert testimony to rebut the presumption of paternity. The Supreme Court ruled that while this section allows the presumption to be rebutted by a preponderance of the evidence, speculative evidence presented by the mother was insufficient to meet this standard. J.L.G. v. M.F.D., 2014 MT 114, 375 Mont. 16, 324 P.3d 355.

The couple later asserted that the District Court erred in allowing rebuttal of paternity. The Supreme Court held that the couple waived the presumption of paternity and did not preserve the issue for appeal when they failed to object at the paternity hearing that genetic testing take place. The District Court was affirmed. In re Parenting of K.P., 2005 MT 297, 329 M 337, 124 P3d 1091 (2005).

Mother Estopped From Denying Father's Paternity Also Precluded From Establishing Paternity in Another — No Equal Protection Violation Found — Standing to Establish Paternity: The Supreme Court held in In re Marriage of K.E.V. & M.L.V., 267 M 323, 883 P2d 1246 (1994), that after a common-law marriage to Kevin was dissolved, Margery, Kevin's former common-law wife, was estopped from denying Kevin's paternity of her daughter, Kathryn. After that decision, Margery brought a petition to have another man, Phillip, declared the father of Kathryn. The District Court dismissed the petition with prejudice and held that Margery was estopped from bringing the action, based upon the Supreme Court's decision in Marriage of K.E.V. and that Kathryn's siblings did not have standing to bring the action. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that under Borchers v. McCarter, 181 M 169, 592 P2d 941 (1979), a person seeking to have Phillip named as the father of Kathryn must first rebut the presumption under this section that Kevin is the father. The Supreme Court held that under Marriage of K.E.V., Margery is equitably estopped from contesting the presumption of Kevin's paternity and therefore, under Borchers, Margery cannot establish Phillip's paternity. The Supreme Court noted that all of the cases raised by Margery in support of her argument that dismissal of her petition violates her right to equal protection were cases in which a parent asserted the the parent's own right to prove the parent's own paternity and not the paternity of someone else. Because Margery had shown no authority holding that one person had a fundamental right to establish the paternity of another, the Supreme Court held that Margery's right to equal protection had not been violated. Relying upon In re Estate of Goick, 275 M 13, 909 P2d 1165 (1996), the Supreme Court also held that because there was no evidence in the record showing how Kathryn's siblings would benefit from proving that Phillip is Kathryn's biological father, the siblings had no personal stake in the outcome of such a proceeding and therefore affirmed the District Court's holding that Kathryn's siblings did not have standing to petition the District Court. In re Paternity of Vainio, 284 M 229, 943 P2d 1282, 54 St. Rep. 858 (1997).

Biological Ties Not Controlling to Judicially Determine Parent/Child Relationship — "Best Interest of Child" Applied: The petitioner, who was recognized as the child's biological father, appealed from a District Court's determination that granting judicial paternity in the petitioner was not in the best interest of the child. In affirming the District Court decision denying paternity, the Supreme Court ruled that the best interest of the child test should be used in a paternity dispute under Montana's Uniform Parentage Act. The District Court correctly applied the best interest of the child test by considering the stability of the family relationship contrasted with the petitioner's failure to show any commitment in establishing a parental as opposed to a biological role. In re Paternity of "Adam", 273 M 351, 903 P2d 207, 52 St. Rep. 1026 (1995).

Equitable Estoppel of Presumption of Paternity: K.E.V. was told by M.L.V. that he was the father of her child. K.E.V. accepted his responsibilities and obligations as the child's father, purchasing maternity clothes for M.L.V., paying medical expenses related to the birth, being present at the birth, attempting to have his name listed as father on the birth certificate, and living with M.L.V. in a common-law marriage. Upon dissolution of the marriage, M.L.V. sought to deny that K.E.V. was the father of the child in order to secure sole custody, and uncontroverted medical tests in fact proved that K.E.V. was not the father. Nevertheless, the District Court properly applied the doctrine of equitable estoppel in preventing M.L.V. from contesting the presumed father-child relationship. To allow M.L.V. to assert a strict legal right in determining paternity would have allowed her to take unconscionable advantage of her own wrong. M.L.V. was properly estopped from bringing an action to rebut the presumption of paternity. In re Marriage of K.E.V. & M.L.V., 267 M 323, 883 P2d 1246, 51 St. Rep. 1055 (1994), followed in In re Paternity of Vainio, 284 M 229, 943 P2d 1282, 54 St. Rep. 858 (1997).

Paternity Contested After Adjudication of Marital Dissolution — Relitigation Barred by Collateral Estoppel: When paternity was contested in response to an action to collect past child support payments, the District Court properly ruled that the issue of paternity had previously been adjudicated during the marriage dissolution proceeding and that relitigation of the issue was barred by collateral estoppel. In re Marriage of Holland, 224 M 414, 730 P2d 410, 43 St. Rep. 2293 (1986).

Marriage After Birth — Father on Birth Certificate — Mutual Acknowledgment of Nonpaternity: The presumption that husband was the natural father of child arose when he married its mother after it was born and, with his consent, was named as the father on the birth certificate. This presumption was rebutted when, in proceeding upon mother's petition for dissolution of the marriage, she and her husband acknowledged under oath that he was not the natural father. Therefore, he could be granted custody of the child only in the capacity of a nonparent. The mother could be deprived of custody only upon a finding of unfitness, abuse, or neglect. The record supported the trial court's finding that the mother was unfit and unable to care for the child. Thus, the husband could be considered as a potential custodian and was granted custody. The trial court made no finding as to the wishes of the child because there was no evidence on this point. Though the wishes of the child would have little weight, as the child was only 4 years old, a remand was necessary for consideration of the child's wishes and a new custody determination. In re Custody of C.C., K.C., & B.C., 215 M 72, 695 P2d 816, 42 St. Rep. 190 (1985), overruled, with regard to use of marriage and divorce procedures in determination of appropriateness of custodianship for nonparent, in In re Marriage of Miller, 251 M 300, 825 P2d 189, 49 St. Rep. 36 (1992).

URESA Action — Rebuttal of Paternity Presumption: The issue of paternity in a Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (URESA) (replaced by UIFSA) action must be determined according to the provisions of the Uniform Parentage Act. Failure to rebut the presumption that petitioner's husband was the natural father of the child within 5 years of the child's birth bars a paternity action against a nonpresumed person. Borchers v. McCarter, 181 M 169, 592 P2d 941 (1979).

40-6-106. Artificial insemination.

Commissioners' Comment

This Act does not deal with many complex and serious legal problems raised by the practice of artificial insemination. It was thought useful, however, to single out and cover in this Act at least one fact situation that occurs frequently. Further consideration of other legal aspects of artificial insemination has been urged on the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform

State Laws and is recommended to state legislators. A useful reference is Wadlington, Artificial Insemination: The Danger of a Poorly Kept Secret, 64 N.W.U.L.Rev. 777 (1970).

40-6-107. Determination of father and child relationship — who may bring action.

Commissioners' Comment

This section consists of two major parts. Subsections (a) [omitted in Montana] and (b) [(1)] deal with the action to declare or dispute the existence of the father and child relationship presumed under Section 4(a) [40-6-105(1)]. Attack on the presumptions based on marriage or on a relationship between the parents that resembles marriage is restricted to a limited circle of potential contestants and in point of time. Presumptions created in other circumstances may be attacked more freely.

Subsection (c) [(2)] defines who may bring the action to ascertain paternity when no presumption applies. It is made clear that the child may bring the action. Moreover, since the Act contemplates that the principal interest involved in the action is that of the child, Subsection (d) [(3)] does not permit an agreement between the mother and an alleged or presumed father to bar an action to ascertain paternity. Cf. Comment on Section 9 [40-6-110].

Case Notes

Different Statute of Limitations Period for Illegitimate Child to Bring Paternity Action Unconstitutional: The lower court found that state law granting illegitimate children a shorter time to bring a paternity suit than legitimate children was unconstitutional. (See 1993 amendment.) The Supreme Court affirmed the decision on the basis that the state had no compelling reason to treat the two classes unequally. Ariz. v. Sasse, 245 M 340, 801 P2d 598, 47 St. Rep. 2171 (1990), affirmed, with regard to the unconstitutionality of the entire statutory discriminatory classification for all purposes, not simply limited in scope to support questions under the Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (now Uniform Interstate Family Support Act), in In re Marriage of K.E.V. & M.L.V., 267 M 323, 883 P2d 1246, 51 St. Rep. 1055 (1994).

Limitation on Action to Declare Nonexistence of Presumed Relationship — Statute Held Constitutional: Where the petitioner filed a petition based on a blood test to have the parentage of a child determined, the District Court did not err in dismissing the petition on the basis that the petitioner was barred by the 5-year Statute of Limitations from challenging the presumed father and child relationship between another man and the child in question. (See 1993 amendment.) The Statute of Limitations was not rendered unconstitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court's decisions in Mills v. Habluetzel, 456 US 91, 71 L Ed 2d 770, 102 S Ct 1549 (1982), and Pickett v. Brown, 462 US 1, 76 L Ed 2d 372, 103 S Ct 720 (1983). Those cases are inapplicable to the state Statute of Limitations and to the District Court's ruling because those cases involved the classification of legitimate and illegitimate children, which made it more difficult for illegitimate children to bring an action for support than it did for legitimate children. The Montana statutes do not differentiate between legitimate and illegitimate children and do not curtail either's right to support. In re W.C., 206 M 432, 671 P2d 621, 40 St. Rep. 1762 (1983).

Statute of Limitations — State — Child: A male child was born out of wedlock. The State obtained an assignment of the mother's claim for support from the putative father. The State brought an action against the father more than 3 years after the birth of the child. As to children born out of wedlock, the Statute of Limitations in 40-6-108 creates an unfair burden and unfairly discriminates against them and is therefore unconstitutional. Their guardian, guardian ad litem, or next friend cannot be barred access to the courts for them. However, in that the State's interest is economic, the paternal parent protection offered by the statute as against the State has a substantial relation to the intended purpose and therefore, as against the State, is constitutional. St. v. Wilson, 193 M 318, 631 P2d 1273, 38 St. Rep. 1299 (1981). See also In re W.C., 206 M 432, 671 P2d 621, 40 St. Rep. 1762 (1983), holding that Wilson did not overrule Borchers v. McCarter, 181 M 169, 592 P2d 941 (1979). (Statute amended by sec. 1, Ch. 442, L. 1985, to allow action to determine paternity to be brought by child no later than 2 years after the child attains the age of majority.)

Statute of Limitations Tolled for Minor Plaintiff: Where appellants brought suit against the respondent to establish paternity and for financial support, the District Court improperly held that 40-6-108(3) revived a claim previously barred by a Statute of Limitations. The claim of the appellants was never barred, as any Statute of Limitations was tolled during the time that the plaintiff child was a minor. Sutherland v. Hurin, 185 M 544, 605 P2d 1133 (1980).

URESA Action — Rebuttal of Paternity Presumption: The issue of paternity in a Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (URESA) (replaced by UIFSA) action must be determined according to the provisions of the Uniform Parentage Act. Failure to rebut the presumption that petitioner's husband was the natural father of the child within 5 years (see 1993 amendment) of the child's birth bars a paternity action against a nonpresumed person. Borchers v. McCarter, 181 M 169, 592 P2d 941 (1979). See also In re W.C., 206 M 432, 671 P2d 621, 40 St. Rep. 1762 (1983), holding that Borchers was not overruled by St. v. Wilson, 193 M 318, 631 P2d 1273, 38 St. Rep. 1299 (1981).

Attorney General's Opinions

No Revival of Previously Barred Paternity Actions by Adoption of New Statute of Limitations: In conformity with the general rule disfavoring retroactive application of legislation, the 1987 change in the statute of limitations for paternity actions initiated by a state agency did not revive actions barred under the previous statute of limitations. 42 A.G. Op. 99 (1988).

40-6-109. Jurisdiction — venue.

Commissioners' Comment

The court having jurisdiction over actions under this Act should be identified here. To avoid multiplicity of actions, the bracketed clause would allow joinder of the action to ascertain paternity with an action for divorce, annulment, separate maintenance, or support. This might be considered in choosing the court which is given jurisdiction over actions under this Act.

Subsection (b) [(2)] provides a novel, but not unheard of, extension of the "long arm" concept. Cf. Poindexter v. Willis, 87 Ill.App.2d 213, 23 N.E.2d 1 (5th Dist. 1967). The venue provision in Subsection (c) provides choices considered reasonable and convenient.

In addition to any other method provided by rule or statute, personal jurisdiction may be acquired by service in accordance with Rule 4B of the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure"; and made minor changes in style.

Montana Changes: Montana adds "adoption" in subsection (1), and changes the language without changing the substance of subsection (2).

Case Notes

Venue — Action for Approval of Parental Release: Section 40-6-109 does not provide significant guidance as to venue in an action to obtain court approval of a parental release. Venue in such an action was properly in Cascade County, since the child was born in Cascade County and the natural mother was a resident of Cascade County. The ends of justice would not be served by filing the petition in Missoula County, the residence of the prospective adoptive parents. In re Adoption of B.G.B., 183 M 347, 599 P2d 375 (1979).

40-6-110. Parties.

Commissioners' Comment

This Section emphasizes that the child is a party to the action. While this is a departure from the law of a number of states which have viewed the mother as the sole party in interest, this provision is considered a necessary consequence of the U.S. Supreme Court decisions establishing the child's substantive rights vis-a-vis his father. The mother or father may not represent the child in the action, since their interests may conflict with those of the child.

"Reasonableness" of Search Prerequisite to Paternity Blood Test: The appellant in this case was charged with contempt of court for failure to submit to a blood test pursuant to 40-6-112. He alleged that the section violated his civil rights. The Supreme Court declined to consider the appellant's attack on an isolated section of the Uniform Parentage Act as adopted in Montana. The Act must be construed as a whole. The "reasonableness" requirement of the fourth amendment and of Art. II, sec. 11, Mont. Const., could be established by an affirmative showing by the movant that there existed a prima facie case against the putative father. After that, a blood test could be taken. The failure to follow the statutory procedures to establish reasonableness prior to the ordering of the "search" rendered the search a violation of the accused's rights under the fourth amendment and the Montana Constitution to be secure from "unreasonable" search. 40-6-113. Evidence relating to paternity.

Commissioners' Comment

It is expected that blood test evidence will go far toward stimulating voluntary settlements of actions to determine paternity. In this connection, proposed legislation currently pending in the U.S. Senate, should be considered. Senate Bill 2081, 93d Congress, 1st Sess. (June 27, 1973), looks toward the establishment of a national system of federally assisted child support enforcement and provides for an efficient system of blood typing:

"REGIONAL LABORATORIES TO ESTABLISH PATERNITY
THROUGH ANALYSIS AND CLASSIFICATION OF BLOOD

"Sec. 458. (a) The Secretary shall, after appropriate consultation and study of the use of blood typing as evidence in judicial proceedings to determine paternity, establish, or arrange for the establishment or designation of, in each region of the United States, a laboratory which he determines to be qualified to provide services in analyzing and classifying blood for the purpose of determining paternity, and which is prepared to provide such services to courts and public agencies in the region to be served by it.

"(b) Whenever a laboratory is established or designated for any region by the Secretary under this section, he shall take such measures as may be appropriate to notify appropriate courts and public agencies (including agencies administering any public welfare program within such region) that such laboratory has been so established or designated to provide services, in analyzing and classifying blood for the purpose of determining paternity, for courts and public agencies in such region.

"(c) The facilities of any such laboratory shall be made available without cost to courts and public agencies in the region to be served by it.

"(d) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

"SUPPORT COLLECTION SERVICES FOR OTHER INDIVIDUALS

"Sec. 459. The child support collection or paternity determination services established under this part shall be made available to any individual not otherwise eligible for such services under the preceding sections of this part upon application filed by such individual with the Attorney General or, if a State or political subdivision has a program approved under section 454, with such State or political subdivision as may be appropriate. The Attorney General (or a State or political subdivision) shall impose an application fee for furnishing such services. Any costs in excess of the fee so imposed shall be paid by such individual by deducting such costs from the amount of any recovery made."

Centralized blood typing facilities already exist in Oslo, Copenhagen and Stockholm and serve the whole of their respective countries. Over several decades, great expertise has been developed. (See generally, Henningsen, Some Aspects of Blood Grouping in Cases of Disputed Paternity in Denmark, 2 Methods of Forensic Science 209 (1963); Henningsen, On the Application of Bloodtests to Legal Cases of Disputed Paternity, 12 Revue de Transfusion 137 (1969); P. Andresen, The Human Blood Groups 73 (1952).) The Scandinavian laboratories are distinguished not only in terms of their use of complex and advanced blood typing systems, but also in terms of highly developed safety procedures which assure accuracy of the results they report. This latter point may be the most important element of blood typing. There can be little doubt that it would be better not to admit blood tests into evidence at all than to admit unreliable evidence under the halo of scientific truth—as has too often been done in the United States where a re-check of even relatively simple tests revealed about one-third of them to have been in error! (See Wiener, Foreword, L. Sussman, Blood Grouping Tests—Medicolegal Uses, ix (1968); See also Wiener, Problems and Pitfalls in Blood Grouping Tests for Non-Parentage, 15 Journal of Forensic Medicine 106, 126 (1968).) The Copenhagen laboratory (and the practice in Stockholm and Oslo is similar) employs two sets of systems in "layers", the routine blood group determination resulting in exclusion of paternity for about 70 per cent of non-fathers and an extended blood group determination which increases paternity exclusions to about 90 per cent of non-fathers. While an exclusion figure approximating 90 per cent of men falsely named as fathers is impressive, cases which do not produce an exclusion are pursued further on the basis of a "blood group paternity index" by means of which the "probability" of the named man's paternity is estimated. (See Gurtler, Principles of Blood Group Statistical Evaluation of Paternity Cases at the University Institute of Forensic Medicine, Copenhagen, 9 Acta Medicinae et Socialis 83 (1956).) That index compares the frequency of a given father-mother-child blood constellation in a sample of actual fathers with the blood constellation in a sample of non-fathers and is related to the constellation obtained in the case in question. If the resemblance exceeds 95 per cent or falls below 5 per cent, the result is reported to the court. At the outer limits, this approach produces de facto inclusions or exclusions. In less extreme cases, it produces interesting circumstantial evidence. It is of particular value, of course, when the relative likelihood of paternity of several possible fathers is to be compared. See generally, Krause, Illegitimacy: Law and Social Policy, 123-44 (1971).

Case Notes

Sufficient Evidence of Paternity to Qualify Person as Parent for Purposes of Charging Parenting Interference: A mother who appealed a parenting interference conviction contended that there was insufficient evidence of the crime because the purported father had not established paternity and therefore had no parental rights that could be interfered with. The Supreme Court disagreed. At trial, the purported father testified that: (1) he was the father; (2) the child had been conceived while the couple was living together after the couple discussed having a baby and made a deliberate decision to engage in sexual intercourse without using birth control; (3) the mother had told him that she had a surprise for him and handed him a positive pregnancy test; (4) the mother told him that he was the father; and (5) he had accompanied the mother on two prenatal visits and witnessed a sonogram revealing a baby girl and that the mother had given him the sonogram images. This testimony provided sufficient evidence of paternity under the Uniform Parentage Act. Although the state may not impose parenting obligations without a hearing, this does not necessarily mean that a natural parent possesses no parental rights without a hearing. The purported father in this case inherently possessed parental rights as a natural parent before a court had entered an order determining those rights, so the same evidence supporting paternity also established his parental rights and supported the jury's verdict that the mother interfered with those rights. St. v. Young, 2007 MT 323, 340 M 153, 174 P3d 460 (2007).

Failure to Object to Order for Paternity Testing Constituting Waiver of Presumption of Paternity and Right to Appeal: A woman had an extramarital affair and became pregnant. Her husband forgave her, and the couple asked the biological father to relinquish any paternity claim so that they could raise the baby in their family, but the father refused and petitioned for a determination of paternity. The District Court allowed the husband's presumption of paternity to be rebutted with genetic testing, and the couple did not object to the test. The couple later asserted that the District Court erred in allowing rebuttal of paternity. The Supreme Court held that the couple waived the presumption of paternity and did not preserve the issue for appeal when they failed to object at the paternity hearing that genetic testing take place. The District Court was affirmed. In re Parenting of K.P., 2005 MT 297, 329 M 337, 124 P3d 1091 (2005).

Paternity Contested After Adjudication of Marital Dissolution — Relitigation Barred by Collateral Estoppel: When paternity was contested in response to an action to collect past child support payments, the District Court properly ruled that the issue of paternity had previously been adjudicated during the marriage dissolution proceeding and that relitigation of the issue was barred by collateral estoppel. In re Marriage of Holland, 224 M 414, 730 P2d 410, 43 St. Rep. 2293 (1986).

40-6-114. Pretrial recommendations.

Commissioners' Comment

The settlement procedures contemplated by this Section are voluntary. If any party refuses to accept a settlement recommendation, the action will be set for trial. It is expected, however, that, as soon as reliable blood test evidence becomes available on a large scale, the great majority of cases will be settled consensually in the light of such evidence.

40-6-115. Civil action.

Commissioners' Comment

Subsection (a)[(1)] makes it clear that the action to establish paternity is a civil action. A number of states have continued to view the action as criminal or quasi-criminal, although a majority of states now treats the paternity action as a civil proceeding.

Subsections (b)[(2)] and (c)[(3)] deal with the problem of the exceptio plurium concumbentium and, more specifically, the problem of perjured testimony concerning alleged sexual access to the mother offered by other men on behalf of the alleged father. It is recognized that in rare cases, these provisions may result in the exclusion of "honest" evidence. However, the Committee concluded that this is outweighed by the need for closing the door to the wanton attacks on the mother's character that characterize too many paternity suits under present laws.

The use of a jury is not desirable in the emotional atmosphere of cases of this nature. The clause eliminating the jury is bracketed only because in some states constitutions may prevent elimination of a jury trial in this context.

2019 Amendment: Chapter 364 in (3), (4), and (5) substituted references to paternity test for references to blood tests; and in (5) at end substituted "paternity testing" for "blood testing". Amendment effective October 1, 2019.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 552 in (4), in second sentence, inserted "and upon the alleged father's advance payment for additional testing"; inserted (6) making bills for pregnancy, childbirth, and paternity blood tests admissible as prima facie evidence without third-party foundation testimony; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 70 inserted (4) concerning objection by a party and an additional blood test and admissibility of test results if no objection is made; inserted (5) providing that failure to answer or appear at a scheduled hearing or for a scheduled blood test results in declaring the alleged father the legal father of the child; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Standard Governing Custody and Visitation Decisions — Best Interests of Child — Whether or Not Parents Married: In an action filed under 40-6-115, the father of a child sought to establish paternity of the child and petitioned for joint custody, visitation rights, and settlement of child support. The District Court awarded sole custody to the mother and granted the father limited visitation rights. The father appealed, claiming that it was a denial of equal protection of the law to determine his parental rights under the Uniform Parentage Act, Title 40, ch. 6, part 1, rather than under Title 40, ch. 4, the chapter that would have governed the case had he and the child's mother been married. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that the standard for determination of child custody and visitation, best interests of the child, was the same in both laws, and the legally proper result was the same. 40-6-116. Judgment or order.

Commissioners' Comment

This section allows a wide range of court orders to be made relating to the child's support, custody, guardianship, visitation privileges, as well as to the payment by the father of the mother's expenses of pregnancy and confinement. Since current state law often does not provide guidelines to help the judge in setting support obligations, Subsections (d) [(4)] and (e) [(5)] provide flexible standards based on criteria now generally accepted. 2001 Amendment: Chapter 542 substituted (10) concerning modification of judgment, decree, or order establishing child support obligation for "(10) Each district court judgment, decree, or order establishing a final child support obligation under this part and each modification of a final order for child support must contain a statement that the order is subject to review and modification by the department of public health and human services upon the request of the department or a party under 40-5-271 through 40-5-273 when the department is providing services under Title IV-D of the Social Security Act for the enforcement of the order." Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 552 inserted (6)(d) subjecting child support obligations established under this section to the registration and processing provisions of chapter 5, part 9; inserted (8)(c) providing that if an obligor is excepted from income withholding, the support order must provide that if the case is receiving Title IV-D services, support must be paid through the Department; inserted (9) requiring the parties to file and keep up-to-date certain information and requiring notice and service of process by mail in certain cases for former (9) that read: "For the purposes of income withholding as provided in subsection (8), whenever the district court establishes or modifies a child support obligation, the judgment, decree, or order must include a provision requiring the parent obligated to pay support to inform the court and, if the department of public health and human services is providing services under Title IV-D of the Social Security Act for the enforcement of the judgment, decree, or order, the department, of the following:

(a) the name and address of the parent's current employer;

(b) whether the parent has access to health insurance through an employer or other group; and

(c) if insurance coverage is available, the health insurance policy information"; inserted (11) requiring the Social Security number of a person subject to a paternity determination to be in the records and requiring the recordkeeper to keep the number from this source confidential except for providing it to the Department for Title IV-D purposes; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Contingent Termination — Request for Federal Exemptions: Section 104, Ch. 552, L. 1997, contained the following contingent termination provisions and order that the Department of Public Health and Human Services seek federal exemptions:

"(1) [Sections 9, 11, 22 through 24, 93, and 95] [37-1-307, 40-1-107, 40-4-105, 40-5-922, 40-5-924, 50-15-403, and 61-5-107] and the bracketed language in [sections 1 through 3, 10, 25, 45, and 89] [40-4-204, 40-5-226, 40-5-901, 40-5-906, 40-5-907, 40-5-923, and 40-6-116] terminate on the date of the suspension if the federal government suspends federal payments to this state for this state's child support enforcement program and for this state's program relating to temporary assistance to needy families because of this state's failure to enact law as required by the federal Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996.

(2) [Sections 9, 11, 22 through 24, 93, and 95] [37-1-307, 40-1-107, 40-4-105, 40-5-922, 40-5-924, 50-15-403, and 61-5-107] and the bracketed language in [sections 1 through 3, 10, 25, 45, and 89] [40-4-204, 40-5-226, 40-5-901, 40-5-906, 40-5-907, 40-5-923, and 40-6-116] terminate on the date that a final decision is rendered in federal court invalidating the child support provisions of the federal Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996.

(3) If the director of the department of public health and human services certifies to the governor and the secretary of state in writing that one of the following provisions is no longer required by federal law because of repeal of or amendment to federal statutes that require that provision, the provision terminates on the date the certification takes effect:

(a) [section 9] [40-5-922];

(b) [section 11] [40-5-924];

(c) [sections 22 through 24] [37-1-307, 40-1-107, and 40-4-105];

(d) [section 93] [50-15-403];

(e) [section 95] [61-5-107];

(f) the bracketed provisions in [sections 1 through 3, 10, 25, 45, and 89] [40-4-204, 40-5-226, 40-5-901, 40-5-906, 40-5-907, 40-5-923, and 40-6-116].

(4) If the director of the department of public health and human services certifies to the governor and the secretary of state in writing that the federal government has granted this state an exemption from one of the following provisions, the provision terminates on the date the exemption takes effect:

(a) [section 9] [40-5-922];

(b) [section 11] [40-5-924];

(c) [sections 22 through 24] [37-1-307, 40-1-107, and 40-4-105];

(d) [section 93] [50-15-403, certification filed April 24, 1998];

(e) [section 95] [61-5-107];

(f) the bracketed provisions in [sections 1 through 3, 10, 25, 45, and 89] [40-4-204, 40-5-226, 40-5-901, 40-5-906, 40-5-907, 40-5-923, and 40-6-116].

(5) (a) The department of public health and human services shall do everything reasonably within its power to obtain, as soon as possible, federal government exemptions from the provisions listed in subsection (4).

(b) Because section 395(c) of the federal Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act of 1996 (PRWORA) allows a grace period for states to amend their constitutions in order to comply with PRWORA and because the Montana legislature believes that the section of PRWORA prohibiting a jury trial in a paternity proceeding violates Article II, section 26, of the Montana constitution and is therefore rejected, the department of public health and human services shall seek a federal government exemption from the jury trial prohibition in PRWORA as the first exemption it seeks under subsection (5)(a). [This exemption was received on December 8, 1997.]

(6) [Sections 9, 11, 22 through 24, 93, and 95] [37-1-307, 40-1-107, 40-4-105, 40-5-922, 40-5-924, 50-15-403, and 61-5-107] and the bracketed language in [sections 1 through 3, 10, 25, 45, and 89] [40-4-204, 40-5-226, 40-5-901, 40-5-906, 40-5-907, 40-5-923, and 40-6-116] terminate July 1, 1999.

(7) If the bracketed language in [sections 1 through 3, 10, 25, 45, and 89] [40-4-204, 40-5-226, 40-5-901, 40-5-906, 40-5-907, 40-5-923, and 40-6-116] terminates, the code commissioner is instructed to renumber subsections, adjust internal references, and correct grammar and arrangement."

1995 Amendments: Chapter 504 in (7), after "or order", inserted "whether temporary or final" and after "include" substituted "a medical support order as defined in 40-5-804" for "a provision addressing health insurance coverage in the following cases:

(a) If either party has available through an employer or other organization health insurance coverage for the child or children for which the premium is partially or entirely paid by the employer or organization, the judgment or order may contain a provision requiring that coverage for the child or children be continued or obtained.

(b) In the event that health insurance required in a child support judgment or order becomes unavailable to the party who is to provide it, through loss or change of employment or otherwise, that party shall, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, obtain comparable insurance or request that the court modify the requirement.

(c) The parties may by written agreement provide for the health care coverage required by this section, subject to the approval of the court.

(d) Unless otherwise provided in the decree, the health care coverage required by this section is in addition to and not in substitution, in whole or in part, for the child support obligation"; deleted former (10) that read: "(10) If the department of social and rehabilitation services is providing or later provides support enforcement services under Title IV-D of the Social Security Act, each district court order or modification of an order must contain a statement providing that the noncustodial parent, without further order of the court, is required to obtain and maintain health insurance coverage as provided in 40-5-208. Failure to include a warning statement in the judgment or order does not preclude the imposition of sanctions under 40-5-208"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Chapter 546 in (6)(a), (9), and (10) substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services"; and at beginning of (8)(b) deleted "After October 1, 1993". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 504, L. 1995, provided: "WHEREAS, it is appropriate to draft a bill specifically to present proposed program improvements for medical support enforcement in a single, comprehensive bill that promotes the needs of legislative energy, efficiency, and economy by limiting the number of possible bills and by reducing the need for hearings and readings on those bills; and

WHEREAS, parents should be held responsible for providing medical care for their children, whether or not the parents voluntarily do so."

1995 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 504, L. 1995, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because it grants rulemaking authority to the department of social and rehabilitation services to adopt rules for expedited procedures."

Severability: Section 33, Ch. 504, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendments: Chapter 294 in (6)(a), near middle, inserted second sentence requiring use of guidelines in all cases, inserted third sentence concerning verified representation of income, and in fourth sentence inserted first clause concerning presumption of adequate and reasonable support; in (6)(b), in first sentence, substituted "finds that the guideline amount is unjust or inappropriate in a particular case" for "does not apply these standards and guidelines to determine child support" and inserted last two sentences concerning agreement on support amount and statement of ordinary support amount when varied; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 9, 1993.

Chapter 631 inserted (8)(b) regarding withholding on weekly or biweekly basis; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendments: Chapter 266 inserted (11) requiring statement relating to review and modification of orders by Department.

Chapter 635 deleted former (8) that read: "(8) (a) Except as provided in subsection (8)(b), each district court judgment or order establishing a child support obligation under this part, whether temporary or final, and each modification of an existing child support order must:

(i) provide that the amount of child support must be withheld from the obligor's income and paid to the department pursuant to procedures established by the department under Title 40, chapter 5, part 4; and

(ii) include the obligor's social security number and the name and address of the obligor's employer and of any other payor of income to the obligor.

(b) Income is not subject to automatic withholding if:

(i) the obligee or obligor demonstrates and the court finds that there is good cause not to require automatic income withholding; or

(ii) the obligee and obligor agree in writing to an alternative arrangement regarding the payment of child support that provides sufficient security to ensure compliance with their agreement. The security is in addition to the child support obligation.

(c) When a judgment or order for child support is entered or modified and automatic income withholding is ordered, an obligee who is not a recipient of public assistance shall apply for the support enforcement services of the department pursuant to Title IV-D of the Social Security Act for the collection of support through automatic income withholding under Title 40, chapter 5, part 4. The department shall accept the application. Pending an application, the department shall immediately implement automatic income withholding and hold any amounts collected in trust for the obligee until the obligee makes application.

(d) When automatic income withholding is ordered under subsection (8)(a), the clerk of court shall immediately forward a copy of the order to the department"; inserted (8) providing for enforcement of support obligation by immediate or delinquency income withholding; and inserted (9) requiring court to require an obligated parent to provide certain information. Amendment effective April 24, 1991.

Severability: Section 24, Ch. 635, L. 1991, was a severability section.

1989 Amendment: In (3)(a), after "concerning", deleted "the duty of support"; inserted (3)(b) requiring that judgment or order refer to child support; in (5)(a) inserted "including his medical needs"; inserted (5)(j) relating to cost of day care; inserted (5)(k) relating to custody arrangements; inserted (6) requiring application of standards and guidelines, stating that finding is required for nonapplication of standards and guidelines, and requiring court to state reasons for not ordering child support; inserted (7) relating to health insurance coverage; inserted (8) requiring automatic income withholding, stating circumstances when income is not subject to automatic withholding, and requiring application for and immediate implementation of automatic income withholding; inserted (9) relating to a warning statement concerning required health insurance coverage; and made minor changes in punctuation and form.

Applicability: Section 32, Ch. 702, L. 1989, provided: "[This act] applies to child support orders and modifications of child support orders issued after September 30, 1989."

Guidelines for Determining Child Support: On January 13, 1987, the Supreme Court adopted A Uniform District Court Rule on Child Support Guidelines proposed by the Montana Child Support Advisory Council as the result of a study prompted by the 1984 enactment of 42 U.S.C. 667. The federal statute required establishment of guidelines by each state as a condition for having the state plan approved for participation in Public Health and Welfare programs of the federal government. The guidelines may be found in the State Reporter, Vol. 44, pp. 828-842 (1987). See also 1989 amendment that provides the court shall apply the guidelines in determining the child support obligation.

Case Notes

Order Vacating Initial Parental Rights Order — Abuse of Discretion: In an initial order, the District Court refused to grant parental rights to the biological father of a minor child, but in a second order, the District Court, relying upon former Rule 59(g), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), or, alternatively, 40-6-118, vacated the initial order and granted parental rights to the biological father. The biological mother and her husband appealed. The Supreme Court reversed, concluding the District Court erred in vacating the initial order under former Rule 59(g), as the biological father's argument constituted an improper "second bite at the apple". The District Court lacked jurisdiction to vacate the initial order under 40-6-118 because 40-6-118 does not authorize modifications to 40-6-116(1), which provides that a court's determination regarding the existence of the parent-child relationship is determinative for all purposes. In re Marriage of Johnson, 2011 MT 255, 362 Mont. 236, 262 P.3d 1105.

Recognition of Paternity in Child's Best Interests: A woman had an extramarital affair and became pregnant. After the biological father's paternity was determined, the District Court held that a father-child relationship was in the child's best interests and devised a parenting plan for the biological father's visitation and support. The mother and putative father disagreed and appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court properly applied the best interest of the child standard and did not abuse its discretion in extending to the biological father the opportunity uniquely afforded him by biology to parent his child. In re Parenting of K.P., 2005 MT 297, 329 M 337, 124 P3d 1091 (2005). See also In re Paternity of "Adam", 273 M 351, 903 P2d 207 (1995).

Findings of District Court Regarding Custody of Child With Mother Not Erroneous Despite Evidence of Inappropriate Physical Contact Between Child and Mother's Relative: As part of a paternity action, the mother was awarded primary physical custody, and the father appealed.

An amended parenting plan arrived at during mediation gave each parent physical custody of the child during alternating months. Near the end of one month's visit with the father, the child divulged that inappropriate physical contact with her stepgrandfather had occurred while in the mother's custody. The father moved for modification of the parenting plan. The District Court was faced with conflicting evidence in the case, receiving testimony from the stepgrandfather that no inappropriate touching occurred, as well as testimony from professionals who opined that sexual abuse had occurred. Additional expert testimony suggested that the child's constant travel was a possible cause of her troubling behavior and that the experts who suggested that sexual abuse occurred had not followed standard protocols when interviewing the child. Lay testimony indicated that it was unlikely that the stepgrandfather had an opportunity to commit the alleged abuse. The court ultimately determined that sexual abuse had not been proved. The father appealed on grounds that the court's findings were insufficient, that the court erred in not giving the father custody based on the evidence presented, and that the court erred by apparently rejecting the testimony of the child's clinical psychologist and the disclosures made by the child relating to sexual abuse. The Supreme Court noted that credibility determinations are within the province of the trier of fact and held that, in light of the conflicting testimony, the trial court's findings and conclusions were sufficient to support the court's decision. Although the trial court did not specifically articulate the elements of 40-4-212, it clearly made determinations that it considered to be in the child's best interests. Failure to list the contentions of a particular witness, such as the child's clinical psychologist, was not sufficient to determine a per se abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court. Without a clear showing of abuse of discretion, the Supreme Court declined to disturb the decision and affirmed the denial of the father's motion to modify the parenting plan. In re Paternity & Custody of A.D.V., 2001 MT 74, 305 M 62, 22 P3d 1124 (2001).

Waiver of Back Child Support — Court Retains Discretion Under Guidelines — Constitutional Challenge Raised for First Time on Appeal Not Considered: Following remand from the Supreme Court, the District Court recalculated a child support award but did not order the father to pay any back child support. When the District Court was presented with abundant evidence on the proper amount of past child support due under child support guidelines and the amount of additional back support (none) was within the range of the evidence presented, the District Court did not err in waiving past child support. When the mother's argument that child support statutes discriminate between legitimate and illegitimate children was raised for the first time on appeal, the Supreme Court did not consider argument. In re Paternity of W.L., 270 M 484, 893 P2d 332, 52 St. Rep. 301 (1995).

Application of Child Support Guidelines in Effect at Time of Decision: As set out in In re Marriage of Johnston & Turrin, 255 M 421, 843 P2d 760, 49 St. Rep. 1047 (1992), District Courts are to determine child support obligations according to the guidelines in effect at the time that the court makes its decision. The court has considerable discretion to deviate from the child support guidelines if it finds by clear and convincing evidence that application of the standards and guidelines is unjust to the child or any of the parties or is inappropriate to a particular case. If the court decides to apply an older version of the guidelines, it must state its reasons for finding that the guidelines are not applicable. Lost Wages Not Reasonable Expense of Pregnancy and Confinement: This section may not be interpreted so broadly as to include lost wages as a reasonable expense of the mother's pregnancy and confinement. In re Paternity of W.L., 259 M 187, 855 P2d 521, 50 St. Rep. 751 (1993).

Calculation of Support Obligation — "Carlson" Formula as Guideline Only: As in proceedings for the determination of support under 40-4-204, the formula set out in Carlson v. Carlson, 214 M 209, 693 P2d 496, 41 St. Rep. 2419 (1984), is only a guideline for determination of support in paternity actions. It was not an abuse of District Court discretion, considering the exigencies of the case, to fail to follow the formula. (See 1989 amendment that provides the court shall apply the Uniform Child Support Guidelines adopted by the Supreme Court in 1987 at 44 St. Rep. 828.) State ex rel. Sorenson v. Roske, 229 M 151, 745 P2d 365, 44 St. Rep. 1854 (1987).

Standard Governing Custody and Visitation Decisions — Best Interests of Child — Whether or Not Parents Married: In an action filed under 40-6-115, the father of a child sought to establish paternity of the child and petitioned for joint custody, visitation rights, and settlement of child support. The District Court awarded sole custody to the mother and granted the father limited visitation rights. The father appealed, claiming that it was a denial of equal protection of the law to determine his parental rights under the Uniform Parentage Act, Title 40, ch. 6, part 1, rather than under Title 40, ch. 4, the chapter that would have governed the case had he and the child's mother been married. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that the standard for determination of child custody and visitation, best interests of the child, was the same in both laws, and the legally proper result was the same. Schuman v. Bestrom, 214 M 410, 693 P2d 536, 42 St. Rep. 54 (1985).

Case Notes

Recognition of Paternity in Child's Best Interests: A woman had an extramarital affair and became pregnant. After the biological father's paternity was determined, the District Court held that a father-child relationship was in the child's best interests and devised a parenting plan for the biological father's visitation and support. The mother and putative father disagreed and appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court properly applied the best interest of the child standard and did not abuse its discretion in extending to the biological father the opportunity uniquely afforded him by biology to parent his child. Case Notes

Order Vacating Initial Parental Rights Order — Abuse of Discretion: In an initial order, the District Court refused to grant parental rights to the biological father of a minor child, but in a second order, the District Court, relying upon former Rule 59(g), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), or, alternatively, 40-6-118, vacated the initial order and granted parental rights to the biological father. The biological mother and her husband appealed. The Supreme Court reversed, concluding the District Court erred in vacating the initial order under former Rule 59(g), as the biological father's argument constituted an improper "second bite at the apple". The District Court lacked jurisdiction to vacate the initial order under 40-6-118 because 40-6-118 does not authorize modifications to 40-6-116(1), which provides that a court's determination regarding the existence of the parent-child relationship is determinative for all purposes. In re Marriage of Johnson, 2011 MT 255, 362 Mont. 236, 262 P.3d 1105.

Findings of District Court Regarding Custody of Child With Mother Not Erroneous Despite Evidence of Inappropriate Physical Contact Between Child and Mother's Relative: As part of a paternity action, the mother was awarded primary physical custody, and the father appealed. An amended parenting plan arrived at during mediation gave each parent physical custody of the child during alternating months. Near the end of one month's visit with the father, the child divulged that inappropriate physical contact with her stepgrandfather had occurred while in the mother's custody. The father moved for modification of the parenting plan. The District Court was faced with conflicting evidence in the case, receiving testimony from the stepgrandfather that no inappropriate touching occurred, as well as testimony from professionals who opined that sexual abuse had occurred. Additional expert testimony suggested that the child's constant travel was a possible cause of her troubling behavior and that the experts who suggested that sexual abuse occurred had not followed standard protocols when interviewing the child. Lay testimony indicated that it was unlikely that the stepgrandfather had an opportunity to commit the alleged abuse. The court ultimately determined that sexual abuse had not been proved. The father appealed on grounds that the court's findings were insufficient, that the court erred in not giving the father custody based on the evidence presented, and that the court erred by apparently rejecting the testimony of the child's clinical psychologist and the disclosures made by the child relating to sexual abuse. The Supreme Court noted that credibility determinations are within the province of the trier of fact and held that, in light of the conflicting testimony, the trial court's findings and conclusions were sufficient to support the court's decision. Although the trial court did not specifically articulate the elements of 40-4-212, it clearly made determinations that it considered to be in the child's best interests. Failure to list the contentions of a particular witness, such as the child's clinical psychologist, was not sufficient to determine a per se abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court. Without a clear showing of abuse of discretion, the Supreme Court declined to disturb the decision and affirmed the denial of the father's motion to modify the parenting plan. In re Paternity & Custody of A.D.V., 2001 MT 74, 305 M 62, 22 P3d 1124 (2001).

Failure to Provide Child Support for College Education — Continuing Jurisdiction Under Uniform Parentage Act: Mother contended that the District Court erred in failing to order father to pay child support for the child's college education, maintaining that the court could not later modify support to extend beyond the child's emancipation because it was not provided in an original decree. However, the case was brought under the Uniform Parentage Act; therefore, this section rather than 40-4-208 applies. Under this section, the court retains jurisdiction to modify its initial support order to provide for the child's educational needs, and failure to do so as part of the initial order was not error. 40-6-121. Action to declare mother and child relationship.

Commissioners' Comment

This Section permits the declaration of the mother and child relationship where that is in dispute. Since it is not believed that cases of this nature will arise frequently, Sections 4 to 20 [40-6-105 to 40-6-121] are written principally in terms of the ascertainment of paternity. While it is obvious that certain provisions in these Sections would not apply in an action to establish the mother and child relationship, the Committee decided not to burden these—already complex—provisions with references to the ascertainment of maternity. In any given case, a judge facing a claim for the determination of the mother and child relationship should have little difficulty deciding which portions of Sections 4 to 20 [40-6-105 to 40-6-121] should be applied.

40-6-122. Promise to render support.

Commissioners' Comment

This permits any written promise to furnish support for a child based on a supposed or alleged father and child relationship to be enforced in accordance with its terms, with the exception of stipulations that seek to bar a paternity action. Since existing law adequately covers this area, it was considered unnecessary to spell out that the agreement may be avoided if it is shown that the agreement was based on a mutual mistake or fraud relating to the existence of the father and the child relationship. In view of the possibly sensitive nature of such a promise, the provision relating to confidentiality is considered useful.

Part 2
Obligations of Parents

Part Case Notes

No Standing by Former Parent to Object to Child's Placement or Assert Child's Rights: Once the parent-child relationship is terminated by the District Court, a former parent has no standing to object to the court's subsequent placement of the child with the Department or by adoption.

Similarly, a former parent has no standing to assert a violation of the child's rights as guardian ad litem because the former parent no longer represents the child. In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999).

No Liability of Parent Guardian for Paternity by Minor Child: Defendants were sued in their capacity as guardians of their minor son for the expenses incurred in connection with the birth of an illegitimate child fathered by their son. A default judgment was rendered against the defendants. The Supreme Court reversed and vacated the default judgment, holding that the guardians' duty to safeguard the rights of their son during the legal proceeding did not subject them to personal liability for their son's allegedly wrongful acts. The Supreme Court also held that because the title of the case, the allegations in the complaint, and all motions at trial addressed the defendants in their capacity as guardians, they had insufficient notice of any likelihood of personal liability. Breuer v. Poe, 245 M 22, 797 P2d 944, 47 St. Rep. 1812 (1990).

Restitution of Child Support Overpayments: There can be no restitution where it was just that the payment should have been made and where, as between the parties, it would be inequitable to require any repayment. Here, however, restitution of overpayment of child support cannot be considered inequitable as between the parties since the defendant has apparently received more child support money than the divorce decree considered adequate. There is no allegation that the amounts decreed were inadequate, and the defendant has never attempted to modify the decree to increase the child support payments. Hereford v. Hereford, 183 M 104, 598 P2d 600 (1979).

Legitimacy Presumed: A child is presumed to be legitimate if the mother and father were married. Spradlin v. U.S., 262 F. Supp. 502 (D.C. Mont. 1967).

Rebuttable Presumption May Be Overcome by a Preponderance of Conflicting Evidence: Disputable presumption that a child born in lawful wedlock is legitimate is successfully controverted by other evidence when the preponderance of the evidence is contrary thereto. In re Wray's Estate, 93 M 525, 19 P2d 1051 (1933).

Evidence Sufficient to Rebut Presumption to Be Strong, Distinct, and Wholly Satisfactory: A child conceived prior to marriage of mother but born in wedlock is presumed legitimate, as presumption cannot be overcome by circumstances which only create doubt or suspicion; to overcome it, the evidence must be strong, distinct, and wholly satisfactory. Case Notes

Sufficient Evidence of Paternity to Qualify Person as Parent for Purposes of Charging Parenting Interference: A mother who appealed a parenting interference conviction contended that there was insufficient evidence of the crime because the purported father had not established paternity and therefore had no parental rights that could be interfered with. The Supreme Court disagreed. At trial, the purported father testified that: (1) he was the father; (2) the child had been conceived while the couple was living together after the couple discussed having a baby and made a deliberate decision to engage in sexual intercourse without using birth control; (3) the mother had told him that she had a surprise for him and handed him a positive pregnancy test; (4) the mother told him that he was the father; and (5) he had accompanied the mother on two prenatal visits and witnessed a sonogram revealing a baby girl and that the mother had given him the sonogram images. This testimony provided sufficient evidence of paternity under the Uniform Parentage Act. Although the state may not impose parenting obligations without a hearing, this does not necessarily mean that a natural parent possesses no parental rights without a hearing. The purported father in this case inherently possessed parental rights as a natural parent before a court had entered an order determining those rights, so the same evidence supporting paternity also established his parental rights and supported the jury's verdict that the mother interfered with those rights. St. v. Young, 2007 MT 323, 340 M 153, 174 P3d 460 (2007).

Elements Necessary for Minor Child to Establish Claim for Loss of Parental Consortium: In Montana, the elements necessary for a minor child to establish a claim for loss of parental consortium are: (1) a third party tortiously causes the parent to suffer a serious, permanent, and disabling mental or physical injury compensable under Montana law; and (2) the parent's ultimate condition of mental or physical impairment must be so overwhelming and severe that it causes the parent-child relationship to be destroyed or nearly destroyed. If the tortfeasor is not subject to liability to the parent under tort principles, the child cannot sustain a cause of action for loss of parental consortium. If the parent could not recover from the tortfeasor for purely mental or emotional injury absent a physical component, the child cannot bring an action for consortium loss resulting from that injury. The destruction or near destruction of the parent-child relationship is a necessary element in establishing the cause of action, not merely a factor in computing damages. Keele v. St. Vincent Hosp. & Health Care Center, 258 M 158, 852 P2d 574, 50 St. Rep. 475 (1993), following Villareal v. Dept. of Transportation, 774 P2d 213 (Ariz. 1989). In North Pacific Ins. Co. v. Stucky, 2014 MT 299, 377 Mont. 25, 338 P.3d 56, the Supreme Court held that the elements necessary for an adult child to establish a claim for loss of parental consortium are the same as those for a minor child as adopted in Keele.

Right of Child to Cause of Action for Loss of Parental Consortium — Injury by Third Party: Minor children are entitled to the support, aid, protection, affection, society, discipline, guidance, and training of their parents. Therefore, a minor child who has been deprived of these rights by the tortious injury to a parent by a third party has a separate cause of action for loss of parental consortium. However, any one element of damages for the injury may be recovered only once. Pence v. Fox, 248 M 521, 813 P2d 429, 48 St. Rep. 550 (1991).

Noncustodial Parent Not Relieved of Support Obligation: Father argued that this section precluded relief for children seeking prospective child support unless there was a showing that the mother, as custodial parent, could no longer provide the minor children with support and education suitable to their circumstances. However, this statute does not relieve a noncustodial parent of obligations of support under Montana's child support laws. In re Support of Krug, 231 M 78, 751 P2d 171, 45 St. Rep. 446 (1988).

Interpretation of Decree Provision on Termination of Support Obligation: In the decree of dissolution, the paragraph immediately following the paragraph concerning payment of child support provided that "Upon termination of the child support obligation" the appellant must pay the respondent maintenance until her death or remarriage. A dispute arose over the meaning of "termination of the child support obligation". The Supreme Court held that the District Court's ruling that the obligation terminated when the appellant stopped making monthly child support payments, rather than when the youngest child turned 18, was not clearly erroneous. In re Marriage of Jones, 218 M 441, 709 P2d 158, 42 St. Rep. 1722 (1985).

Payments Made Directly to Children: The obligation to pay child support is not discharged by payment to the children themselves when the support order directs that payment be made to the children's mother. State of Oregon ex rel. Worden v. Drinkwalter, 216 M 9, 700 P2d 150, 42 St. Rep. 599 (1985).

"Child" Defined — Majority Age: Upon attaining the age of 18 a person is an adult and is no longer a "child" within the purview of 40-6-211 of whom parents are entitled to custody or to whom parents are obligated for support, despite the fact that at the time of the decree the legal age was 21. Chrestenson v. Chrestenson, 180 M 96, 589 P2d 148 (1979).

Child Support Money Decreed by District Court to Be Kept Current Until Final Determination of Appeal: Where husband was in arrears of child support payments, court held it will not sanction nonpayment of support money decreed in District Court on appeal where need for such funds are shown, but will require that such support payments be kept current until final determination of appeal. Court ordered appeal to be dismissed, unless payment of arrears was made within 10 days. Woolverton v. Woolverton, 169 M 490, 549 P2d 458 (1976).

Compliance With Section Need Only Be Reasonable: While this section would require a high school education, it is doubtful if the parent could be required to pay tuition at a parochial school. Certainly a parent is not required to provide a Scout automobile for his children, buy musical instruments, or give them music lessons in the name of education. Brooke v. U.S., 292 F. Supp. 571 (D.C. Mont. 1968), modified in 300 F. Supp. 465 (D.C. Mont. 1969), affirmed in 468 F2d 1155 (9th Cir. 1972).

Reasonable Compliance Required: This section clearly requires support for a high school education. Compliance need only be reasonable however, and parochial school and extravagances are not required. Brooke v. U.S., 292 F. Supp. 571 (D.C. Mont. 1968), modified in 300 F. Supp. 465 (D.C. Mont. 1969), affirmed in 468 F2d 1155 (9th Cir. 1972).

Omission to Perform Act of Support: Evidence that child, 5 months old, died due to starvation, that his weight at death was only 10 ounces over birthweight, and that father and mother had means with which to care for child was sufficient to support conviction of manslaughter. St. v. Bischert, 131 M 152, 308 P2d 969 (1957), distinguished in St. v. Rivers, 133 M 129, 320 P2d 1004 (1958).

Enforcement of Child Support Order: Divorce court possesses power to compel ex-husband to support his minor children. State ex rel. Lay v. District Court, 122 M 61, 198 P2d 761 (1948).

Father's Duty When Mother Has Custody: When mother has custody of children but cannot alone carry the burden of education and support, the burden must, at least in part, be borne by the father, and this may extend to expense of college education for the children. Refer v. Refer, 102 M 121, 56 P2d 750 (1936).

Agreement Between Husband and Wife: While agreement between husband and wife as to custody and child support will be enforced, it cannot, as against the children, divest either parent of the duty to support and educate them as the interest of the children is paramount. Brice v. Brice, 50 M 388, 147 P 164 (1915), explained in Refer v. Refer, 102 M 121, 56 P2d 750 (1936), and State ex rel. Tong v. District Court, 109 M 418, 96 P2d 918 (1939).

The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that 40-6-214 imposes a duty on the father to support the twins to the extent of his ability. The father's duty ran directly to the twins, not to the mother under the marital dissolution decree, and was properly enforced under the guardianship statutes. Wife Not Neglectful Parent: Where wife initiated proceedings under Uniform Reciprocal Enforcement of Support Act (now Uniform Interstate Family Support Act) and claim was settled by agreement with former husband, State cannot recover under this section from wife for reasonable value of necessaries supplied through payments by Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) as husband, not wife, was a neglectful parent in not making his child support payments. Case Notes

Parent's Venture Into Temporarily Unprofitable Self-Employment Insufficient to Warrant Reduction in Child Support Payments: While the mother was employed as a trust officer, she was ordered to pay $544 a month in child support payments. She lost the job when the company closed the local office, decided to begin self-employment as an interior designer with substantial financial help from her new husband, and then moved for a reduction in support because the new business did not show a profit the first year, even though it gained over $92,000 in revenue and she anticipated making a profit the second year. In order to modify a child support obligation, the person seeking the modification must establish changed circumstances so substantial and continuing that to keep the existing obligation intact would be unconscionable. The District Court erred in annualizing the mother's previous trust-related salary in calculating her income because she did not return to customary self-employment as contemplated in ARM 37.62.108(3). The temporarily unprofitable state of her business was not of such a continuing nature as to warrant a change in support. The Supreme Court recognized that this section does not require a supporting parent's new spouse to contribute to the supporting parent's support obligations; however, when a supporting parent remarries and is in a position in which a contribution to the new family's finances is not required, the supporting parent is still required to do whatever is necessary to ensure that child support payments are made. In re Marriage of McDermott, 2003 MT 283, 318 M 13, 79 P3d 245 (2003).

Consideration of Support of Stepchildren in Divorce Proceeding: In an appeal of a decree of dissolution of marriage, the husband claimed District Court error in that the court did not find that the wife made a negative contribution to the marriage because the wife and her two sons consumed three-fourths of the marital income while she contributed only one-third of that income. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that evidence presented by the husband did not rebut the presumption set forth in 40-6-217 that his support of the wife's sons was given as a parent. In re Marriage of Peterson, 211 M 118, 683 P2d 1304, 41 St. Rep. 1252 (1984).

Child Support — Assets of Present Spouse Unavailable: In an action to increase child support payments, the trial court considered the income of the father's present wife in its determination of the father's ability to pay increased child support. The clear effect of the court's order is to make the father's present spouse's property or income indirectly available to pay child support for her husband's children by a previous marriage. This cannot be done. Duffey v. Duffey, 193 M 241, 631 P2d 697, 38 St. Rep. 1105 (1981).

Consideration of Support of Stepchildren in Divorce Proceeding: A stepparent who receives stepchildren into his family and supports them is presumed to do so as a parent. A parent is not bound to compensate the other parent for the voluntary support of his child without an agreement for compensation. Since no agreement was made, the husband's support of his stepchildren during the marriage could not properly be considered in the disposition of the marital estate. Schultz v. Schultz, 183 M 20, 597 P2d 1174 (1979).

Unreasonable Refusal to Return Home as Constituting Abandonment: Where for 4 years wife refused to return to home provided by husband because he declined to also receive into the family her son by a former marriage who was capable of caring for himself, which husband is not legally obligated to do, her refusal was unreasonable and constituted desertion on her part, and under this section husband was not liable for her support. Goodwin v. Elm Orlu Min. Co., 83 M 152, 269 P 403 (1928).

Separate Maintenance: In an action for separate maintenance court cannot under this section make provision for children of plaintiff by former marriage. Decker v. Decker, 56 M 338, 185 P 168 (1919).

Case Notes

Presumption That Services Provided by Relative Rendered Gratuitously — Compensation for Personal Care Services Provided by Decedent's Daughters Properly Denied: Following their father's death, three daughters presented a claim against the estate for personal care services that they provided to their father. Their claims were disallowed, and the daughters appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Generally, when services are provided to one person by another and the services are knowingly and voluntarily accepted, the law presumes that the services were provided in expectation of payment. However, a generally acknowledged exception applies when a relative seeks payment for services, and the presumption in those cases is that the services were rendered gratuitously unless there was an express agreement for payment or unless such an agreement can be inferred. In this case, the decedent determined prior to death how he wished his assets to be distributed and, despite several opportunities to do so, made no provision for compensation for the personal services that his daughters provided. The daughters were unable to rebut the general presumption of gratuity, and the Supreme Court declined to disturb the District Court's denial of their claims for services. Lack of Consideration When Services Are Gratuitous: Law regards personal services rendered by near relatives or members of the same family living together as one household in the conduct of the home and board or lodging or other necessaries or comforts furnished as gratuitous, and in absence of express or implied agreement to pay for same there can be no recovery therefor. San Antonio v. Spencer, 82 M 9, 264 P 944 (1928).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Termination of Parental Rights Improper — Remand for Consideration of Placement with Father: Although the out-of-state father had been the primary parent of the children, they were removed from the mother's care after she refused to return them to the father. The father's court-appointed attorney advised him to stipulate to the state's petitions, failed to object to the children being placed with their maternal grandparents, and never requested a placement hearing. Ultimately, the father's parental rights were terminated and the father appealed. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the father's attorney had provided ineffective counsel, and remanded the matter to the District Court to consider the father as the first placement option for the children. In re B.H., 2020 MT 4, 398 Mont. 275, 456 P.3d 233.

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: In protracted litigation, the Department of Public Health and Human Services would not give an out-of-state father, who was not unfit, custody of his child and the father's appointed counsel failed in many ways to advocate effectively for him. The District Court ultimately terminated the father's parental rights. Reviewing the case on the father's appeal, the Supreme Court laid out the course of actions the Department should have taken and found that the father's counsel had been ineffective, which prejudiced his case and violated the father's due process rights. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded. In re E.Y.R., 2019 MT 189, 396 Mont. 515, 446 P.3d 1117.

Best Interest of Child Standard Unconstitutional in Custody Award to Nonparent Over Natural Parent Absent Finding of Abuse, Neglect, or Dependency: The best interest of the child standard incorporated into 40-4-221 in determining the custody of a child whose custodial parent dies is unconstitutional to the extent that it allows the grant of a petition prior to the termination of the noncustodial parent's constitutional right to custody. Use of the standard is improper in that any showing that a nonparent may be able to provide a better environment than a natural parent is irrelevant to the question of custody between the two in view of the constitutional right of a parent to custody. Although 40-4-221 gives a nonparent standing to request a custody hearing, it does not give the District Court authority to deprive a natural parent of the right to custody absent a finding of abuse, neglect, or dependency on the part of the natural parent. In re A.R.A., 277 M 66, 919 P2d 388, 53 St. Rep. 543 (1996), following In re Doney, 174 M 282, 570 P2d 575 (1977), and overruling Brost v. Jurisdiction to Terminate Parental Right to Custody — Error to Grant Custody to Great Aunt as Opposed to Father: Lisa and John were an unmarried couple who separated after the birth of their son, B.B. A court order established paternity and granted legal and physical custody to Lisa, with visitation by John. After Lisa was convicted of forgery and sentenced to the state prison, John petitioned the District Court for an order granting him physical full custody. At the hearing on the petition, a great aunt introduced substantial evidence of her ability to care for the child and temporary custody was awarded to the aunt. The Supreme Court found that under this section, John had an equal right with Lisa to the custody of B.B. and that before the District Court had jurisdiction to award custody to a great aunt, it must make a finding of abuse or neglect to terminate John's right of custody. Babcock v. Wonnacott, 268 M 149, 885 P2d 522, 51 St. Rep. 1224 (1994). See also In re J.B., 278 M 160, 923 P2d 1096, 53 St. Rep. 901 (1996).

Parent Generally Preferred to Nonparent in Award of Custody: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in finding that a parent was generally preferred to a nonparent in award of custody, given evidence of the parent's good character. Weber v. Van De Kop, 228 M 118, 740 P2d 1139, 44 St. Rep. 1388 (1987).

Providing Alternative Custody Not Considered Abandonment: Upon dissolution of marriage the father was awarded custody of the child. The father, a member of the United States Army, was reassigned to Oklahoma where he lived with the child. Upon discharge, he and the child returned to Great Falls. In May, 1978, the father transferred custody of the child to his brother and sister-in-law in Minnesota in order that he might attend vocational school and become employed. At that time, the father signed and delivered a custodial care authorization to his brother and later requested that his brother adopt the child. The mother contends that this action constituted abandonment and that she was therefore entitled to custody. The trial court held that the father's purpose was to provide a healthy environment for the child rather than to relinquish his parental duties, as his job as a truck driver required extended absences from the child. It was not error to find that no abandonment had occurred under this situation. McLean v. Seright, 187 M 194, 609 P2d 282 (1980).

Basis for Depriving Natural Parent of Custody: The father automatically assumes the right to custody of the children at the moment of the mother's death and a judicial hearing and finding of dependency and neglect under Title 41, ch. 3, part 4, or a judicial finding of willful abandonment or nonsupport under 40-8-111 (now repealed) are the exclusive means by which a natural parent may be involuntarily deprived of custody. Schultz v. Schultz, 184 M 245, 602 P2d 595 (1979), following Henderson v. Henderson, 174 M 1, 568 P2d 177 (1977); In re Guardianship of Doney, 174 M 282, 570 P2d 575 (1977).

Custody of Younger Children Awarded to Father: District Court did not abuse its discretion in awarding custody of two younger children to father who had moved to California, as they have a good home with their father and paternal grandparents, are well cared for and happy, their educational and religious training is being more than adequately fulfilled, and they have lived with their father for more than 5 years. Anderson v. Anderson, 145 M 244, 400 P2d 632 (1965).

"Waiver" as Defense to Habeas Corpus Proceeding: When decree of divorce was rendered in Utah and custody of children was granted to mother, she then had preference right. She waived this right when she offered to give up their custody and father took them to his home in Montana, and she could not deprive father of custody by habeas corpus proceedings in Montana unless he was an unfit person to have custody or unless it was shown that best welfare of children required that they be taken from him. State ex rel. Lessley v. District Court, 132 M 357, 318 P2d 571 (1957).

Presumption in Favor of Parent as Rebuttable: Where custody is in dispute, presumption that best interests of child require that it be awarded to parent is rebuttable; each case must be decided upon its own peculiar facts and circumstances. Haynes v. Fillner, 106 M 59, 75 P2d 802 (1938).

Right of Appeal on Writ of Habeas Corpus: There are two kinds of Writs of Habeas Corpus involving an infant: one directed toward freeing the infant from imprisonment, and the other to exercise powers of court of general equity jurisdiction over custody of person of infant; in the latter class the unsuccessful claimant has right of appeal to Supreme Court. Ex parte Reinhardt, 88 M 282, 292 P 582 (1930).

Favored Position of District Judge's Discretion in Custody Cases on Appeal: Decision of District Judge in a controversy affecting rights to custody of child of tender years ought not be overturned on appeal except upon clear showing of abuse of judicial discretion. Ex parte Bourquin, 88 M 118, 290 P 250 (1930).

Important Consideration as to Custody Preference: A mother who had two infant children sought to regain custody of one by habeas corpus. In determining custody, the court should not overlook the advantage flowing from the companionship of the two, which is important in the development of character and unselfish disposition. Ex parte Bourquin, 88 M 118, 290 P 250 (1930).

Preference of Infant Child as to Custody Between Parent and Grandparent: The law prefers the parent as custodian of an infant child unless parent is incompetent or unfit because of poverty or depravity to provide physical comforts and moral training essential to life and well-being of child. Ex parte Bourquin, 88 M 118, 290 P 250 (1930).

Conduct Which Constitutes Estoppel to Claim Earnings of Minor: While parent is entitled to earnings of minor resulting from obligation of support, privilege may be waived either expressly or by conduct, such as making no objection to employment or where parent testifies in support of claim presented by minor and assigned to and sued upon by another; by so doing parent estops himself from thereafter claiming minor's earnings. Schwab v. Peterson, 80 M 214, 260 P 711 (1927).

Surviving Parent Preferred Over Stranger and Child's Wish: While welfare of child is of paramount interest in determining custody, neither such interest nor the child's wish will justify denial of custody to surviving parent and award of custody to a stranger in absence of showing of unfitness or inability to support child. August v. Burns, 79 M 198, 255 P 737 (1927), followed in Girard v. Williams, 1998 MT 231, 291 M 49, 966 P2d 1155, 55 St. Rep. 965 (1998).

Rights of Custodial Agent in Habeas Corpus Proceeding — Same as Parent: Under this section, father and mother of legitimate, unmarried child are equally entitled to its custody; where father, considering mother unfit to have charge of child, had placed it in care of his sister and her husband, the latter were his agents empowered to resist attempts of mother to regain its custody by habeas corpus, and court could properly permit an investigation into facts which would have been available to father if attempt had been made to take child from him. Child's Action for Personal Injuries as a Property Right Which Is Unaffected by Parents' Neglect of Notice: Neglect of parents of injured child to give required 60-day notice to city may not be imputed to child, and since statute provides a child is incapable of appointing an agent for any purpose, it is questionable whether statute can be complied with in that respect by anyone as agent. A child's cause of action for damages for personal injuries is a property right over which, under this section, a parent has no control. Lazich v. Belanger, 111 M 48, 105 P2d 738 (1940).

Mistake of Law — Aunt and Uncle Lack Standing to Petition for Termination of Parental Rights: In a case involving termination of parental rights, the Supreme Court assumed supervisory control to determine whether G.R. and P.R., the child's aunt and uncle, had standing to bring the amended petition to terminate parental rights and for adoption. A child's aunt and uncle are not parties authorized by 42-1-107 to place a child for adoption. A child may not be placed for adoption until the parental rights of the birth parents have been terminated by a court as provided in Title 41, chapter 3, or Title 42. G.R. and P.R. did not have standing to file a petition for termination of parental rights under 42-2-603(2). Under Title 41, chapter 3, a petition for the termination of parental right based upon abuse or neglect of a child may only be brought by the County Attorney, the Attorney General, or an attorney hired by the county. Section 40-6-233 refers to the abuse of parental authority for making decisions regarding the support and education of a child and is not the basis for terminating parental rights. Therefore, G.R. and P.R. do not have standing to petition for the termination of parental rights based upon abuse or neglect. J.C. v. Eleventh Judicial District Court, 2008 MT 358, 346 M 357, 197 P3d 907 (2008).

Child Custody — Remedy for Abuse — Jurisdiction: When a child was present in Montana, having been abandoned by both her natural parents, having been subjected to mistreatment and abuse, and having been threatened with further mistreatment and abuse, her situation met the test for jurisdiction expressed in 40-4-211. Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).

Custody Action as Remedy: Section 40-7-108 describes several criteria by which a District Court may consider whether it is an inconvenient forum but does not create a mandatory duty on the court to dismiss the action upon such grounds. The section is entirely discretionary. The trial court, knowing that the child in question, apparently abandoned by her parents living in California, had been living with relatives in Montana for some time, did not abuse its full discretion in determining it was not an inconvenient forum. Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).

Procedures to Be Rigorously Followed: While there is some overlap in the various statutory schemes governing the termination of parental rights and the custody of children as to general subject matter, each is used for a distinct purpose and sets forth specific procedures which must be rigorously followed before a valid judgment or order may be issued, to insure that the minors involved receive the full protection of these laws. Only Methods by Which a Parent May Be Deprived of Custody — Statutory: Where a Sheriff without writ, warrant, or order of court took into custody a 17-year-old girl whose father and brother were charged with incest committed upon her person, his return alleging, inter alia, unfitness of mother to have custody was no defense to Writ of Habeas Corpus sued out by mother, as it is only by one of the methods provided by statute that parents may be deprived of right to custody of children, i.e., this section and 40-6-234. Severance of Parental Rights — Counsel Not Absolutely Required at In-Chambers Interview of Children: In the trial court, a mother's parental rights to her two children were terminated and custody granted to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). On appeal, the issue was whether the court had erred by interviewing the children in chambers without the presence of the mother and counsel. When the trial court announced to counsel and the mother that it wished to interview both children in chambers, neither counsel nor the mother objected. The mother claimed that the interview of the children without the presence of her counsel violated her rights to due process. She relied on a case in which it was stated that a child may testify out of the parents' presence in abuse and neglect cases subject to the cross-examination by the parents' attorney. The reviewing court noted that nothing in that opinion suggested that it was the duty of the trial judge to assert a parent's right to cross-examination if counsel for the parent does not. Here, in any event, there was no testimony in chambers, just an inquiry into the children's desires regarding custody. A record of the interviews was made and any claimed right of cross-examination was waived by failing to assert that right at the trial level. Therefore, when multiple acts occur at substantially the same time and to substantially the same property, the parents' maximum liability is $2,500, plus costs not to exceed $100, for each child of the parents. UNIFORM CHILD CUSTODY JURISDICTION AND ENFORCEMENT ACT

Chapter Compiler's Comments

Application and Construction: Section 42, Ch. 91, L. 1999, provided: "In applying and construing this chapter, consideration must be given to the need to promote uniformity of the law with respect to its subject matter among states that enact it."

Transitional Provision: Section 44, Ch. 91, L. 1999, provided: "A motion or other request for relief made in a child custody proceeding or to enforce a child custody determination that was commenced before [the effective date of this act] [October 1, 1999] is governed by the law in effect at the time the motion or other request was made."

Chapter Case Notes

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJEA

Continuing Jurisdiction Under UCCJEA: Although full faith and credit may be acquired for the purpose of enforcing a child custody determination in any state that has adopted the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA), a motion for full faith and credit does not automatically transfer jurisdiction over the matter. The District Court properly determined that Montana was the child's "home state" under UCCJEA and did not abuse its discretion in finding that the child had a significant connection to Montana and that Kentucky would not be a more convenient forum. In re Marriage of Lloyd, 2011 MT 133, 361 Mont. 22, 255 P.3d 166.

Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act Not to Govern Statutory Grandparent-Grandchild Contact Proceedings: The Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA), codified in this chapter, is directed toward parties acting as parents and contains no directive that applies its jurisdictional provisions to grandparent-grandchild contact proceedings conducted under Title 40, ch. 9., nor does Title 40, ch. 9., include any textual indication that grandparent-grandchild contact proceedings are subject to the procedural or jurisdictional requirements of the UCCJEA. Therefore, the provisions of this chapter do not govern jurisdictional matters relating to grandparent-grandchild contact proceedings conducted under Title 40, ch. 9. In re Grandparent-Grandchild Contact of Stewart v. Evans, 2006 MT 102, 332 M 148, 136 P3d 524 (2006).

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJA

Full Faith and Credit Afforded Out-of-State Renewable Child Support Judgment — Res Judicata Applicable: Article IV, sec. 1, U.S. Const., provides that full faith and credit be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state. As restated in Baker v. Gen. Motors Corp., 522 US 222, 139 L Ed 2d 580, 118 S Ct 657 (1998), a final judgment in one state, if rendered by a court with adjudicatory authority over the subject matter and persons governed by the judgment, qualifies for recognition throughout the land. When issues of jurisdiction have been determined by one court, the doctrine of res judicata precludes a second court from considering jurisdiction as long as the first court fully and fairly considered the issue, and that judgment, as to jurisdiction, is entitled to full faith and credit in the second court. In the present case, a Utah renewable child support judgment, in which the Utah court established jurisdiction of the parties, was entitled to full faith and credit in Montana, despite contentions by the husband that he no longer had minimum contacts with Utah after moving to Montana. The jurisdiction arguments raised before the Montana Supreme Court were identical to the arguments that were previously raised, fairly considered, and finally decided in Utah, precluding relitigation by the Montana court under res judicata. In re Child Support of Mason, 1998 MT 192, 290 M 253, 964 P2d 743, 55 St. Rep. 803 (1998), followed with regard to full faith and credit of a judgment by an out-of-state court following full and fair consideration of jurisdiction in Genuine Parts Co. v. Rascal's Auto Parts, Inc., 2008 MT 313, 346 M 56, 192 P3d 1153 (2008).

Indians — Subject Matter Jurisdiction Over Dissolution of Marriage — Different Residences of Parties — Factors to Be Considered — Bertelson Followed: Stacey, an enrolled member of the Fort Peck Tribes, married Shane, a non-Indian. After the marriage ceremony, Stacey returned to the Fort Peck Indian Reservation and Shane went to Forsyth, where his parents lived and where he worked. Some time later, Stacey had a child who also became an enrolled member and lived with Stacey on the Fort Peck Indian Reservation. Still later, Shane filed a dissolution action in a state District Court. The District Court ordered joint custody and ordered that Shane would be the primary residential custodian. Approximately 1 month later, the Fort Peck Tribal Court awarded temporary custody to Stacey. She then filed a motion in District Court under former Rules 12(h) and 60, M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), to dismiss Shane's dissolution action for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The District Court held that it had subject matter jurisdiction over the case and issued a final decree of dissolution. In that decree, the District Court held that the parties' child had significant contacts both off and on the reservation, held that the District Court shared concurrent jurisdiction with the tribal court, and therefore denied Stacey's motion to dismiss. The Supreme Court reviewed its previous holdings regarding tribal jurisdiction and child custody jurisdiction under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act. The Supreme Court also reviewed the purposes of the Indian Child Welfare Act, which, while not strictly applicable to the case before it, cautions that state courts should be careful not to erode the sovereignty of tribes and tribal courts. In reliance upon In re Bertelson, 189 M 524, 617 P2d 121 (1980), the Supreme Court held that the best interests of the child should be determined and followed in deciding whether a state or tribal court has jurisdiction for the purposes of awarding custody but that when an Indian child resides off the reservation, state courts and tribal courts share concurrent jurisdiction. The Supreme Court then held, in further reliance upon Bertelson, that even when jurisdiction is concurrent, it does not mean that states courts should exercise jurisdiction and that in deciding whether to exercise concurrent jurisdiction, the state courts should consider: (1) 40-4-102, 40-4-107, 40-4-211, and 40-7-108; (2) certain policy issues; and (3) the residence of the parties pursuant to 1-1-215. For this reason, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court for a determination of the residence of Stacey and her child, saying that if the District Court determines that both reside on the reservation, the District Court must dismiss the case. However, if the District Court finds that Stacey's child is not a resident of the reservation and that the District Court shares jurisdiction with the tribal court, the District Court must then consider factors from Bertelson, previously discussed by the Supreme Court, to determine whether the District Court or the tribal court is better able to determine the best interests of the child. In re Marriage of Skillen, 1998 MT 43, 287 M 399, 956 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 147 (1998).

Jurisdictional Requirements Not Met — Inapplicability of Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act: The Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act does not apply unless the jurisdictional conditions of 40-4-211 are met, including whether: (1) a determination of the child's home state has been made; (2) the child and parents or at least one contestant has a significant connection with Montana and substantial evidence is available in Montana concerning the child's present or future care, training, and personal relationships; (3) the child is physically present in this state and has been abandoned or an emergency situation necessitates the child's protection; or (4) another state has jurisdiction or has declined jurisdiction because Montana is a more appropriate forum and it is in the child's best interest that Montana assume jurisdiction. In re Marriage of Erler, 261 M 65, 862 P2d 12, 50 St. Rep. 1195 (1993).

Lack of Montana Residency and Significant Connections — No Montana Jurisdiction: The statutory considerations of 40-7-104 (now repealed) were not met and thus a Montana court had no jurisdiction over a child custody case when: (1) prior to commencement of the proceeding, the child lived in Pennsylvania for about 8 years, visiting Montana only briefly; (2) the child's significant connections were with Pennsylvania, with only minimal Montana connections; (3) Pennsylvania, under its version of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act, had subject matter jurisdiction and, absent evidence that Pennsylvania had declined to exercise that jurisdiction, jurisdiction did not confer to Montana; and (4) the facts of the case did not constitute such an extraordinary or emergency situation as to confer custody jurisdiction to Montana. In re Marriage of Miller/Beam, 259 M 424, 856 P2d 1378, 50 St. Rep. 863 (1993).

Child Custody Jurisdiction: According to 40-7-104 (now repealed), the provisions of 40-4-211 determine whether a state has a sufficient interest in a child custody dispute to assume jurisdiction. In the present case, Montana does not have the authority under any of the provisions of 40-4-211 to hear the present custody proceeding. Even if Montana had such authority, several provisions of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (UCCJA), including 40-7-107 and 40-7-108, would confer jurisdiction in the Arizona court. In re Marriage of Brown, 218 M 14, 706 P2d 116, 42 St. Rep. 1360 (1985).

"Forum Non Conveniens" — "Clean Hands": In a proceeding to modify a Kentucky child custody decree, the "forum non conveniens" and "clean hands" provisions come into play only after the following findings are made: (1) Kentucky no longer has jurisdiction; (2) Montana has jurisdiction under 40-4-211; and (3) under 28 U.S.C. § 1738A(f), 40-4-211, and 40-7-114 (now repealed), Montana has jurisdiction to modify the Kentucky decree. Pierce v. Pierce, 197 M 16, 640 P2d 899, 39 St. Rep. 315 (1982).

Custody of Indian Children — Appropriate Forum: The District Court ordered Mr. and Mrs. Stanley, members of the Chippewa Cree Tribe, to return their grandchildren to Bertelson, the natural mother. On appeal, the Supreme Court remanded the case to develop a complete evidentiary record and to determine whether the tribal court is the appropriate forum. In re Bertelson, 189 M 524, 617 P2d 121, 37 St. Rep. 1682 (1980), followed in In re Marriage of Skillen, 1998 MT 43, 287 M 399, 956 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 147 (1998).

Notice Requirements for Enforcement of Out-of-State Decree: Before the recognition and enforcement provisions of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (UCCJA) can be applied, the initial decree must be entered in conformity with strict notice requirements. If there is not compliance with the notice requirements of the UCCJA by the state entering the initial decree, Montana courts are not required to recognize and enforce the out-of-state decree. (Following Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).) Here notice of the Wyoming hearing was not given to the Raws, the persons in physical custody of Katherine, and the District Court therefore was not required to recognize or enforce the Wyoming order. Application of Pierce, 184 M 82, 601 P2d 1179 (1979).

Custody — Jurisdiction — Recognition of Foreign Decree: When a custody decree of another state is in force, a question of the applicability of the Full Faith and Credit Clause to custody decrees arises. When the California court heard no testimony on the best interests of the child, the precise question at issue in the Montana action, the Montana court was not bound to follow the California court's decree. Similarly, the Montana court was not prevented by the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act from modifying the California decree. Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).

Jurisdiction to Modify a Foreign Custody Decree: There is no requirement that the Montana court recognize or enforce a foreign court's decree when the foreign court failed to give notice to the person in physical custody of the child as required by the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act. Further, the foreign state did not retain the jurisdiction it had at the time of initial custody proceedings because the foreign state had long since ceased to be the home of the child. Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).

Punitive Order Subject to Modification: Where Montana modification order in custody case was made without any evidence as to circumstances of the children, and solely on the basis of the nonresident father's allegations of interference by the mother with his legal rights of visitation and periodic custody, the order was punitive and therefore subject to appropriate judicial inquiry and modification by court in state in which children were physically present. Brooks v. Brooks, 20 Or. App. 43, 530 P2d 547 (1975).

Part Case Notes

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJEA

Jurisdiction Over Modification of Child Support — UIFSA, not UCCJEA, Controls: In a matter involving only child support issues, jurisdiction is controlled by the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA), not the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA). The District Court erred in concluding it did not have jurisdiction over the matter based on Montana being an inconvenient forum under UCCJEA when the only issue before the court involved child support. Because the UIFSA, unlike the UCCJEA, does not provide an inconvenient forum provision, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the matter to the District Court. Ervin v. Ervin, 2011 MT 309, 363 Mont. 80, 265 P.3d 1272.

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJA

No Conflict Between UCCJA and "Best Interests of Child" Test: Under the provisions of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (UCCJA) and 40-4-211, the Montana court properly declined to exercise its jurisdiction. The custody proceedings in Arizona, the children's residence, were filed prior to those in Montana, and Arizona had not stayed its proceedings. The provisions of the UCCJA which are rules for determining jurisdiction do not conflict with this state's rules for determining custody. The former is a procedural determination as to the proper forum, made prior to any substantive inquiry, and the latter is the application of substantive rules. No evidentiary hearing is required in a procedural determination as to the proper forum. In re Marriage of Brown, 218 M 14, 706 P2d 116, 42 St. Rep. 1360 (1985).

Custody — Jurisdiction — Recognition of Foreign Decree: When a custody decree of another state is in force, a question of the applicability of the Full Faith and Credit Clause to custody decrees arises. When the California court heard no testimony on the best interests of the child, the precise question at issue in the Montana action, the Montana court was not bound to follow the California court's decree. Similarly, the Montana court was not prevented by the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act from modifying the California decree. Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).

No Retroactive Application of UCCJA: Absent a clear expression of legislative purpose, retrospective application of even a procedural statute so as to affect prior proceedings of a pending action cannot be justified. Therefore, jurisdictional rulings entered before the effective date of the UCCJA (Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act) are not subject to the UCCJA. Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).

40-7-101. Short title.

Commissioners' Note

Section 1 [former 40-7-102] of the UCCJA was a statement of the purposes of the Act [chapter]. Although extensively cited by courts, it was eliminated because Uniform Acts no longer contain such a section. Nonetheless, this Act [chapter] should be interpreted according to its purposes which are to:

(1) Avoid jurisdictional competition and conflict with courts of other States in matters of child custody which have in the past resulted in the shifting of children from State to State with harmful effects on their well-being;

(2) Promote cooperation with the courts of other States to the end that a custody decree is rendered in that State which can best decide the case in the interest of the child;

(3) Discourage the use of the interstate system for continuing controversies over child custody;

(4) Deter abductions of children;

40-7-103. Definitions.

Commissioners' Note

The UCCJA did not contain a definition of "child." The definition here is taken from the PKPA.

The definition of "child-custody determination" now closely tracks the PKPA definition. It encompasses any judgment, decree or other order which provides for the custody of, or visitation with, a child, regardless of local terminology, including such labels as "managing conservatorship" or "parenting plan."

The definition of "child-custody proceeding" has been expanded from the comparable definition in the UCCJA. These listed proceedings have generally been determined to be the type of proceeding to which the UCCJA and PKPA are applicable. The list of examples removes any controversy about the types of proceedings where a custody determination can occur. Proceedings that affect access to the child are subject to this Act [chapter]. The inclusion of proceedings related to protection from domestic violence is necessary because in some States domestic violence proceedings may affect custody of and visitation with a child. Juvenile delinquency or proceedings to confer contractual rights are not "custody proceedings" because they do not relate to civil aspects of access to a child. While a determination of paternity is covered under the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act, the custody and visitation aspects of paternity cases are custody proceedings. Cases involving the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction have not been included at this point because custody of the child is not determined in a proceeding under the International Child Abductions Remedies Act. Those proceedings are specially included in the Article 3 [part 3] enforcement process.

"Commencement" has been included in the definitions as a replacement for the term "pending" found in the UCCJA. Its inclusion simplifies some of the simultaneous proceedings provisions of this Act [chapter].

The definition of "home State" has been reworded slightly. No substantive change is intended from the UCCJA.

The term "issuing State" is borrowed from UIFSA. In UIFSA, it refers to the court that issued the support or parentage order. Here, it refers to the State, or the court, which made the custody determination that is sought to be enforced. It is used primarily in Article 3 [part 3].

The term "person" has been added to ensure that the provisions of this Act [chapter] apply when the State is the moving party in a custody proceeding or has legal custody of a child. The definition of "person" is the one that is mandated for all Uniform Acts.

The term "person acting as a parent" has been slightly redefined. It has been broadened from the definition in the UCCJA to include a person who has acted as a parent for a significant period of time prior to the filing of the custody proceeding as well as a person who currently has physical custody of the child. In addition, a person acting as a parent must either have legal custody or claim a right to legal custody under the law of this State. The reference to the law of this State means that a court determines the issue of whether someone is a "person acting as a parent" under its own law. This reaffirms the traditional view that a court in a child custody case applies its own substantive law. The court does not have to undertake a choice-of-law analysis to determine whether the individual who is claiming to be a person acting as a parent has standing to seek custody of the child.

The definition of "tribe" is the one mandated for use in Uniform Acts. Should a State choose to apply this Act [chapter] to tribal adjudications, this definition should be enacted as well as the entirety of Section 104 [40-7-135].

The term "contestant" as has been omitted from this revision. It was defined in the UCCJA § 2(1) [former 40-7-103(1)] as "a person, including a parent, who claims a right to custody or visitation rights with respect to a child." It seems to have served little purpose over the years, and whatever function it once had has been subsumed by state laws on who has standing to seek custody of or visitation with a child. In addition UCCJA § 2(5) [former 40-7-103(4)] of the which [sic] defined "decree" and "custody decree" has been eliminated as duplicative of the definition of "custody determination."

Compiler's Comments

1999 Amendment: Chapter 91 inserted definitions of abandoned, child, child custody determination, child custody proceeding, commencement, court, issuing court, issuing state, person, tribe, and warrant; deleted definition of contestant that read: ""Contestant" means a person, including a parent, who claims a right to custody or visitation rights with respect to a child"; deleted definition of custody determination that read: ""Custody determination" means a court decision and court orders and instructions providing for the custody of a child, including visitation rights. It does not include a decision relating to child support or any other monetary obligation of any person"; deleted definition of custody proceeding that read: ""Custody proceeding" includes proceedings in which a custody determination is one of several issues, such as an action for divorce or separation, and includes issues of custody in adoption proceedings. A "custody proceeding" is not a proceeding pursuant to Title 41, chapter 3 or 5"; deleted definition of decree or custody decree that read: ""Decree" or "custody decree" means a custody determination contained in a judicial decree or order made in a custody proceeding and includes an initial decree and a modification decree"; in definition of home state in first sentence after "child" deleted "immediately preceding the time involved" and at end inserted "immediately before the commencement of a child custody proceeding" and in third sentence at beginning substituted "A period" for "Periods" and at end before "period" deleted "6-month or other"; substituted definition of initial determination for definition of initial decree that read: ""Initial decree" means the first custody decree concerning a particular child"; substituted definition of modification for definition of modification decree that read: ""Modification decree" means a custody decree which modifies or replaces a prior decree, whether made by the court which rendered the prior decree or by another court"; substituted definition of person acting as a parent for definition of person acting as parent that read: ""Person acting as parent" means a person other than a parent who has physical custody of a child and who has either been awarded custody by a court or claims a right to custody"; in definition of physical custody substituted "means the physical care and supervision of a child" for "means actual possession and control of a child"; substituted present definition of state for former definition that read: ""State" means any state, territory, or possession of the United States, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJEA

Montana Home State Despite Several-Month Absence of Child From State: The father appealed the District Court's conclusion that it had jurisdiction over a child custody proceeding filed by the mother in Montana. The child had been born in Montana in 2013 and had resided in Montana until the mother moved to Minnesota in late 2015 to live with the father during a temporary reconciliation. At the end of 8 to 9 months in Minnesota, the mother returned to Montana with the child. Shortly thereafter, the mother agreed to let the child vacation with the father's parents and visit the father with the expectation the child would be returned to Montana shortly. After the father told the mother he was not returning the child to her, the mother filed a petition for a parenting plan in Montana. Over the father's objection, the District Court ruled that Montana was the child's home state and, therefore, it had jurisdiction over the matter. The father appealed to the Supreme Court, which affirmed the ruling, finding that the totality of circumstances supported jurisdiction in the state. In re Parenting of B.K., 2018 MT 217, 392 Mont. 426, 425 P.3d 703.

Short Amount of Time Spent in Montana Not Enough for Jurisdiction — Meaning of Home State Under UCCJEA — Legislative Intent Analyzed — Totality of Circumstances Approach Adopted: A child moved to Montana with both of his parents toward the end of September 2013, but the mother and the child departed to Canada in October 2013. The child never returned. In February 2014, the mother traveled to Montana to retrieve her and her son's belongings and returned to Canada without the father's knowledge. In May 2014, the father sought resolution of parenting and custody in Montana, but the District Court determined that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction on the grounds that Montana was not the home state of the child. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed after determining that the Legislature's intent in adopting the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA) was to create a bright-line rule. Using a totality of the circumstances approach, the court concluded that an absence is not temporary if the character of the absence would make it unreasonable to assume a child would integrate into a community of Montana during the portions of the 6-month period when the child is not absent from the state. Consequently, the child did not live in Montana for the timeframe required by 40-7-201. In re Marriage of Sampley, 2015 MT 121, 379 Mont. 131, 347 P.3d 1281.

Retention of Parenting Plan Proceedings by State Making Initial Custody Determination: The state of Idaho dissolved the parties' marriage and granted residential custody of the parties' child to the mother, who subsequently moved to Montana. The mother later petitioned a Montana District Court to change jurisdiction of the parties' child custody proceedings to Montana and to modify the parenting plan. The Montana court denied the petition, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Except in cases involving temporary emergency jurisdiction, a Montana court may not modify a foreign court's child custody jurisdiction unless the Montana court has jurisdiction to make an initial child custody determination and either: (1) the court in the other state determines that it no longer has exclusive continuing jurisdiction or that Montana would be a more convenient forum; or (2) either court determines that all parties and the child no longer reside in the other state. In this case no emergency existed, and neither of the two conditions for modification of a parenting plan by a Montana court existed. The Idaho court did not relinquish jurisdiction, and the father continued to live in Idaho. Thus, the Idaho court that issued the existing parenting plan retained exclusive continuing jurisdiction. Koeplin v. Crandall, 2010 MT 70, 355 Mont. 510, 230 P.3d 797.

Parties No Longer Resident in Montana — Relinquishment of Montana Jurisdiction Proper: In 2000, a Montana District Court established child custody with the father, who lived in California, and held that the mother, a Montana resident, was not to have contact with the children until she addressed her psychological disorders. The father subsequently registered the Montana decision with the California courts to allow enforcement of the Montana decision in California, if necessary, and the mother moved to Minnesota. In 2007, the mother petitioned the Montana court to relinquish jurisdiction because none of the parties lived in Montana, but the court decided to retain jurisdiction and denied the petition, so the mother appealed. The father cited 41-3-103 in support of his contention that the Montana court retained jurisdiction because the case was a child abuse and neglect proceeding. However, Montana later adopted the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA), which applies to and provides greater protections in child abuse and neglect proceedings, so the provisions of 40-7-103 prevail over 41-3-103. Under 40-7-202 of the UCCJEA, a Montana District Court retains exclusive, continuing jurisdiction of child custody proceedings until one of two specific events occurs, the second of which is a determination that none of the relevant parties presently reside in Montana. Thus, it was an abuse of discretion for the District Court to fail to make a determination whether the relevant parties lived in Montana. The Supreme Court reversed with instructions to relinquish jurisdiction over the Montana custody order. In re B.P. & A.P., 2008 MT 166, 343 M 345, 184 P3d 334 (2008).

Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act Not to Govern Statutory Grandparent-Grandchild Contact Proceedings: The Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA), Title 40, ch. 7, is directed toward parties acting as parents and contains no directive that applies its jurisdictional provisions to grandparent-grandchild contact proceedings conducted under Title 40, ch. 9., nor does Title 40, ch. 9., include any textual indication that grandparent-grandchild contact proceedings are subject to the procedural or jurisdictional requirements of the UCCJEA. Therefore, the provisions of Title 40, ch. 7, do not govern jurisdictional matters relating to grandparent-grandchild contact proceedings conducted under Title 40, ch. 9. In re Grandparent-Grandchild Contact of Stewart v. Evans, 2006 MT 102, 332 M 148, 136 P3d 524 (2006).

Analysis of Child's Home State for Purposes of Determining Jurisdiction: A child's home state, for purposes of determining jurisdiction under 40-7-201, is not limited to the time period of 6 months immediately before the commencement of a child custody proceeding. The applicable time period should be within 6 months before commencement of a child custody proceeding. In the present case, the mother moved the children back to Arkansas 4 months after moving to Montana, thereby stopping the clock for the time needed to establish Montana as the home state for jurisdictional purposes. The children had not lived in Montana for at least 6 months before the father began child custody proceedings, so Montana could not acquire home state status. Stephens v. District Court, 2006 MT 21, 331 M 40, 128 P3d 1026 (2006).

Error in Montana Court's Declination of Jurisdiction to Washington Court — Inconvenient Forum: Following several incidents of partner abuse over the years, the mother moved to Washington state and then requested that the Montana court decline jurisdiction as an inconvenient forum in order to allow the Washington court to assume jurisdiction. The request was denied, and the mother appealed. Under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, a Montana court has jurisdiction to make child custody determinations if Montana is the child's home state, as defined in this section, and Montana will continue to have exclusive continuing jurisdiction unless the Montana court declines to exercise its jurisdiction. In this case, the parties conceded that Montana was the home state. Jurisdiction may be declined at any time if the Montana court determines that it is an inconvenient forum and that a court of another state is a more appropriate forum to make custody determinations. The factors in 40-7-108 must be considered when evaluating a motion to decline jurisdiction, and the Act places domestic violence at the top of the list of factors to be considered. Although this factor alone is not dispositive, the Supreme Court held that, given the high propensity for recidivism in domestic violence, when a court finds that partner abuse or child abuse has occurred or that a party has fled Montana to avoid further violence or abuse, the court is authorized to consider whether the party and the child might be better protected if further custody proceedings are held in another state. Here, the District Court abused its discretion by failing to consider which forum would best protect the mother and children. The Supreme Court then went on to discuss the other statutory factors and concluded that the protection of the parties, the years that the children have resided in Washington, the significant distance between the courts, the parties' disparate financial circumstances, the location of evidence and convenience of witnesses, and the familiarity factors all supported the Montana court declining jurisdiction. None of the jurisdictional factors mitigated against declination, and no factor outweighed the concern for safety raised by the history of domestic violence. Thus, the Supreme Court ordered the District Court to decline jurisdiction as an inconvenient forum and arrange to transfer the case to Washington. In re Marriage of Stoneman v. Drollinger, 2003 MT 25, 314 M 139, 64 P3d 997 (2003).

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJA

Adoption Proceeding in Foreign Jurisdiction — Applicability of Habeas Corpus: A child was born to petitioner in Wyoming in 1980. She relinquished custody to a couple and moved to Montana. Petitioner executed handwritten instruments that were notarized relinquishing custody to the couple and stating she did not know the natural father. The couple began adoption proceedings in Wyoming. Petitioner then executed a written revocation of custody and petitioned for a Writ of Habeas Corpus for the child in Yellowstone County. The District Court deferred jurisdiction to the Wyoming court having jurisdiction of the adoption proceeding. The habeas corpus petition was properly filed in Yellowstone County because the child was currently located there. The District Court properly deferred jurisdiction because although petitioner contended she executed the written instruments under fraud and duress, those issues were equally triable in Wyoming. Under 40-7-108, the District Court could not determine whether Wyoming was an inconvenient forum, only whether the court itself was. The Supreme Court in upholding the District Court's action said in cases of simultaneous proceedings, the provisions of 40-7-107(3) should be followed. In re Application of Peterson, 203 M 305, 661 P2d 40, 40 St. Rep. 465 (1983).

Custody Jurisdiction Under UCCJA and Interstate Compact on Juveniles: Wyoming had jurisdiction over the runaway juvenile as it was her home state. The District Court in Montana therefore did not have jurisdiction to modify the Wyoming court's custody decree. The interaction of the Interstate Compact on Juveniles and the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (UCCJA) placed the District Court in the following position: (1) under the Compact, it had the authority to deny Wyoming's requisition ordering the juvenile's return to Wyoming and to place her in the custody of her grandparents; and (2) under the UCCJA it was not required to recognize or enforce the Wyoming custody decree but was precluded from modifying the decree. The District Court concluded that the juvenile's best interest would be served by having her in the custody of her grandparents and denied the Wyoming requisition. The court did not modify the Wyoming custody order. This procedure appears to be allowed under the interaction of the Compact and the UCCJA. Application of Pierce, 184 M 82, 601 P2d 1179 (1979).

Notice Requirements for Enforcement of Out-of-State Decree: Before the recognition and enforcement provisions of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (UCCJA) can be applied, the initial decree must be entered in conformity with strict notice requirements. If there is no compliance with the notice requirements of the UCCJA by the state entering the initial decree, Montana courts are not required to recognize and enforce the out-of-state decree. (Following Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).) Here notice of the Wyoming hearing was not given to the Raws, the persons in physical custody of Katherine, and the District Court therefore was not required to recognize or enforce the Wyoming order. Application of Pierce, 184 M 82, 601 P2d 1179 (1979).

Child Custody — Home State — Jurisdiction: When a child was present in Montana, having been abandoned by both of her natural parents, having been subjected to mistreatment and abuse, and having been threatened with further mistreatment and abuse, her situation met the test for jurisdiction expressed in 40-4-211. Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).

Attorney General's Opinions

Commencement Filing Fee Not Chargeable for Certain Postdissolution Proceedings: The Attorney General relied on the holding in In re Marriage of Billings, 189 M 520, 616 P2d 1104 (1980), in finding that a District Court Clerk may not charge a commencement filing fee for postdissolution of marriage action that is brought under the same cause number as the marital dissolution proceeding and that remains under the continuing jurisdiction of the District Court. 43 A.G. Op. 72 (1990).

40-7-105. Notice — opportunity to be heard — joinder.

Commissioners' Note

This section generally continues the notice provisions of the UCCJA. However, it does not attempt to dictate who is entitled to notice. Local rules vary with regard to persons entitled to seek custody of a child. Therefore, this section simply indicates that persons entitled to seek custody should receive notice but leaves the rest of the determination to local law. Parents whose parental rights have not been previously terminated and persons having physical custody of the child are specifically mentioned as persons who must be given notice. The PKPA, § 1738A(e), requires that they be given notice in order for the custody determination to be entitled to full faith and credit under that Act.

State laws also vary with regard to whether a court has the power to issue an enforceable temporary custody order without notice and hearing in a case without any interstate element. Such temporary orders may be enforceable, as against due process objections, for a short period of time if issued as a protective order or a temporary restraining order to protect a child from harm. Whether such orders are enforceable locally is beyond the scope of this Act [chapter]. Subsection (b) [(2)] clearly provides that the validity of such orders and the enforceability of such orders is governed by the law which authorizes them and not by this Act [chapter]. An order is entitled to interstate enforcement and nonmodification under this Act [chapter] only if there has been notice and an opportunity to be heard. The PKPA, § 1738A(e), also requires that a custody determination is entitled to full faith and credit only if there has been notice and an opportunity to be heard.

Rules requiring joinder of people with an interest in the custody of and visitation with a child also vary widely throughout the country. The UCCJA has a separate section on joinder of parties which has been eliminated. The issue of who is entitled to intervene and who must be joined in a custody proceeding is to be determined by local state law.

A sentence of the UCCJA § 4 [40-7-105] which indicated that persons outside the State were to be given notice and an opportunity to be heard in accordance with the provision of that Act has been eliminated as redundant.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 91 in (1) substituted present language concerning notice in a child custody determination for former language that read: "Before making a decree under this chapter, reasonable notice and opportunity to be heard shall be given to the contestants, any parent whose parental rights have not been previously terminated, and any person who has physical custody of the child. If any of these persons are outside this state, notice and opportunity to be heard shall be given pursuant to 40-7-106"; inserted (2) regarding the enforceability of a child custody determination made without notice; and inserted (3) concerning the law governing the obligation or right of a person to intervene in a child custody determination. CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJA

Jurisdiction to Modify a Foreign Custody Decree: There is no requirement that the Montana court recognize or enforce a foreign court's decree when the foreign court failed to give notice to the person in physical custody of the child as required by the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act. Further, the foreign state did not retain the jurisdiction it had at the time of initial custody proceedings because the foreign state had long since ceased to be the home of the child. Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).

40-7-106. Notice to persons outside state.

Commissioners' Note

This section authorizes notice and proof of service to be made by any method allowed by either the State which issues the notice or the State where the notice is received. This eliminates the need to specify the type of notice in the Act [chapter] and therefore the provisions of Section 5 of the UCCJA [see language of this section prior to 1999 amendment] which specified how notice was to be accomplished were eliminated. The change reflects an approach in this Act [chapter] to use local law to determine many procedural issues. Thus, service by facsimile is permissible if allowed by local rule in either State. In addition, where special service or notice rules are available for some procedures, in either jurisdiction, they could be utilized under this Act [chapter]. For example, if a case involves domestic violence and the statute of either State would authorize notice to be served by a peace officer, such service could be used under this Act [chapter].

Although Section 105 [40-7-136] requires foreign countries to be treated as States for purposes of this Act [chapter], attorneys should be cautioned about service and notice in foreign countries. Countries have their own rules on service which must usually be followed. Attorneys should consult the Hague Convention on the Service Abroad of Judicial and Extrajudicial Documents in Civil or Commercial Matters, 20 U.S.T. 36, T.I.A.S. 6638 (1965).

1999 Amendment: Chapter 91 in (1) substituted present language concerning the manner of giving notice for former language that read: "(1) Notice required for the exercise of jurisdiction over a person outside this state shall be given in a manner reasonably calculated to give actual notice and may be:

(a) by personal delivery outside this state in the manner prescribed for service of process within this state;

(b) in the manner prescribed by the law of the place in which the service is made for service of process in that place in an action in any of its courts of general jurisdiction;

(c) by any form of mail addressed to the person to be served and requesting a receipt; or

(d) as directed by the court, including publication, if other means of notification are ineffective"; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) Notice under this section shall be served, mailed, or delivered or last published at least 10 days before any hearing in this state"; in (3) substituted language concerning proof of service for former (3) that read: "(3) Proof of service outside this state may be made by affidavit of the individual who made the service or in the manner prescribed by the law of this state, the order pursuant to which the service is made, or the law of the place in which the service is made. If service is made by mail, proof may be a receipt signed by the addressee or other evidence of delivery to the addressee"; in (3) substituted "required for the exercise of jurisdiction with respect to a person who" for "required if a person"; and made minor changes in style. Custody — Jurisdiction: When a father who could not be served in California appeared voluntarily in Montana for a custody hearing involving his daughter then living in Montana, the Montana court obtained personal jurisdiction over him. Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).

Custody — Personal Jurisdiction Unnecessary: Personal jurisdiction over a parent is not necessary to the termination of his parental rights to a minor child so long as the parent has actual notice of the termination or the District Court makes an effort reasonably calculated to provide notice to the parent. Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).

Estoppel Effect of Res Judicata: Where mother of child born out of wedlock joined in and agreed to petition allowing father and his wife to adopt child, mother was estopped to later attack decree on grounds that father did not fit specifically any of the categories provided by this section, since the proceedings and resulting decree were res judicata as to her attack of the adoption. In re Adoption of Curtis, 143 M 330, 390 P2d 209 (1964).

40-7-107. Simultaneous proceedings.

Commissioners' Note

This section represents the remnants of the simultaneous proceedings provision of the UCCJA § 6 [see language of this section prior to 1999 amendment]. The problem of simultaneous proceedings is no longer a significant issue. Most of the problems have been resolved by the prioritization of home state jurisdiction under Section 201 [40-7-201]; the exclusive, continuing jurisdiction provisions of Section 202 [40-7-202]; and the prohibitions on modification of Section 203 [40-7-203]. If there is a home State, there can be no exercise of significant connection jurisdiction in an initial child custody determination and, therefore, no simultaneous proceedings. If there is a State of exclusive, continuing jurisdiction, there cannot be another State with concurrent jurisdiction and, therefore, no simultaneous proceedings. Of course, the home State, as well as the State with exclusive, continuing jurisdiction, could defer to another State under Section 207 [40-7-108]. However, that decision is left entirely to the home State or the State with exclusive, continuing jurisdiction.

Under this Act [chapter], the simultaneous proceedings problem will arise only when there is no home State, no State with exclusive, continuing jurisdiction and more than one significant connection State. For those cases, this section retains the "first in time" rule of the UCCJA.

Subsection (b) [(2)] retains the UCCJA's policy favoring judicial communication. Communication between courts is required when it is determined that a proceeding has been commenced in another State.

Subsection (c) [(3)] concerns the problem of simultaneous proceedings in the State with modification jurisdiction and enforcement proceedings under Article 3 [part 3]. This section authorizes the court with exclusive, continuing jurisdiction to stay the modification proceeding pending the outcome of the enforcement proceeding, to enjoin the parties from continuing with the enforcement proceeding, or to continue the modification proceeding under such conditions as it determines are appropriate. The court may wish to communicate with the enforcement court. However, communication is not mandatory. Although the enforcement State is required by the PKPA to enforce according to its terms a custody determination made consistently with the PKPA, that duty is subject to the decree being modified by a State with the power to do so under the PKPA. An order to enjoin the parties from enforcing the decree is the equivalent of a temporary modification by a State with the authority to do so. The concomitant provision addressed to the enforcement court is Section 306 of this Act [40-7-306]. That section requires the enforcement court to communicate with the modification court in order to determine what action the modification court wishes the enforcement court to take.

The term "pending" that was utilized in the UCCJA section on simultaneous proceeding has been replaced. It has caused considerable confusion in the case law. It has been replaced with the term "commencement of the proceeding" as more accurately reflecting the policy behind this section. The latter term is defined in Section 102(5) [40-7-103(5)].

1999 Amendment: Chapter 91 substituted present language concerning the exercise of jurisdiction by a court of this state if a proceeding concerning the custody of the child has been previously commenced in another state for former language that read: "(1) A court of this state may not exercise its jurisdiction under this chapter if at the time of filing the petition a proceeding concerning the custody of the child was pending in a court of another state exercising jurisdiction substantially in conformity with this chapter unless the proceeding is stayed by the court of the other state because this state is a more appropriate forum or for other reasons.

(2) Before hearing the petition in a custody proceeding, the court shall examine the pleadings and other information supplied by the parties under 40-7-110 and shall consult the child custody registry established under 40-7-117 concerning the pendency of proceedings with respect to the child in other states. If the court has reason to believe that proceedings may be pending in another state, it shall direct an inquiry to the state court administrator or other appropriate official of the other state.

(3) If the court is informed during the course of the proceeding that a proceeding concerning the custody of the child was pending in another state before the court assumed jurisdiction, it shall stay the proceeding and communicate with the court in which the other proceeding is pending to the end that the issue may be litigated in the more appropriate forum and that information be exchanged in accordance with 40-7-120 through 40-7-123. If a court of this state has made a custody decree before being informed of a pending proceeding in a court of another state, it shall immediately inform that court of the fact. If the court is informed that a proceeding was commenced in another state after it assumed jurisdiction, it shall likewise inform the other court to the end that the issues may be litigated in the more appropriate forum." Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJEA

Retention of Parenting Plan Proceedings by State Making Initial Custody Determination: The state of Idaho dissolved the parties' marriage and granted residential custody of the parties' child to the mother, who subsequently moved to Montana. The mother later petitioned a Montana District Court to change jurisdiction of the parties' child custody proceedings to Montana and to modify the parenting plan. The Montana court denied the petition, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Except in cases involving temporary emergency jurisdiction, a Montana court may not modify a foreign court's child custody jurisdiction unless the Montana court has jurisdiction to make an initial child custody determination and either: (1) the court in the other state determines that it no longer has exclusive continuing jurisdiction or that Montana would be a more convenient forum; or (2) either court determines that all parties and the child no longer reside in the other state. In this case no emergency existed, and neither of the two conditions for modification of a parenting plan by a Montana court existed. The Idaho court did not relinquish jurisdiction, and the father continued to live in Idaho. Thus, the Idaho court that issued the existing parenting plan retained exclusive continuing jurisdiction. Koeplin v. Crandall, 2010 MT 70, 355 Mont. 510, 230 P.3d 797.

Assumption of Child Custody and Parenting Case by Court of Another State Proper — Neither Parent Living in Montana When Proceeding Commenced: A child was born to the parties in Montana, and a parenting plan was adopted in Montana. However, when the father sought to enforce the plan, the mother was living in Pennsylvania and the father was living in Washington. The Pennsylvania court concluded that it had jurisdiction. The Montana court disagreed, but ceded temporary emergency jurisdiction to the Pennsylvania court while refusing to cede jurisdiction. The mother appealed. The Supreme Court concluded that because 40-7-202 allows either a Montana court or a court of another state to determine that neither parents nor the child reside in the original state, the Pennsylvania court had jurisdiction to make that determination.

Once that determination was made, on the basis of ample, credible, and essentially undisputed evidence, the Montana court no longer had exclusive continuing jurisdiction, and the Montana court therefore erred in retaining jurisdiction. In re Parenting of A.B.A.M., 2004 MT 222, 322 M 406, 96 P3d 1139 (2004). See also Vannatta v. Boulds, 2003 MT 343, 318 M 472, 81 P3d 480 (2003).

Continuing Custody Jurisdiction in North Dakota Court — Modification by Montana Court Improper: When the parties were divorced in North Dakota, that state properly exercised jurisdiction in entering divorce and custody decrees. A Montana District Court subsequently modified the custody decree. The Supreme Court reversed. Under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act and the Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act of 1980 (PKPA), full faith and credit must ordinarily be given to child custody determinations made by another state's court if that court appropriately exercised jurisdiction under PKPA standards. Further, under Thompson v. Thompson, 484 US 174 (1988), once a state exercises appropriate PKPA jurisdiction, no other state may exercise concurrent jurisdiction even if it would have been empowered to exercise original jurisdiction. Absent a determination by the North Dakota court that it no longer had exclusive and continuing jurisdiction or that a Montana court would be a more convenient forum, the Montana court had no jurisdiction to modify the North Dakota decree. Vannatta v. Boulds, 2003 MT 343, 318 M 472, 81 P3d 480 (2003), following In re Marriage of Shupe, 276 M 409, 916 P2d 744 (1996).

Improper Use of Best Interest of Child Standard in Determining Jurisdiction Under UCCJEA — Hearing Required to Determine Jurisdiction Between States Based on Inconvenient Forum: As part of a dissolution action, both parties filed for child custody. The mother filed in Montana where she resided, and the father filed in Louisiana where he resided. The Louisiana court took jurisdiction based on the assumption that an emergency situation existed. The Montana District Court applied the best interest of the child standard and transferred custody to Louisiana. The mother appealed to the Montana Supreme Court, which noted that the best interest standard was eliminated from the inconvenient forum statutes when Montana adopted the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA) in 1999. Rather than the best interest standard, the UCCJEA provides that a Montana court may decline to exercise its jurisdiction if the court determines that Montana is an inconvenient forum under the circumstances and a court of another state is a more appropriate forum based on various factors, including: (1) whether domestic violence has occurred; (2) the length of time the child has resided outside Montana; (3) the distance between the Montana court and the court in the state that would assume jurisdiction; (4) the relative financial circumstances of the parties; (5) any agreement of the parties as to which state would assume jurisdiction; (6) the nature and location of any evidence regarding the issues; (7) the ability of the court of each state to decide the issues expeditiously; and (8) the familiarity of each state with the facts and issues. Further, a hearing is required under 40-7-108 to allow the parties to submit information regarding the factors and for the court to make determinations of fact and law. The husband's argument that this section required no hearing or input from the parties before the Montana court communicated with Louisiana also failed because this section specifically excludes a temporary emergency jurisdiction proceeding, which was the basis for the Louisiana action, and because this section addresses simultaneous custody proceedings in Montana and another state. However, Louisiana had not adopted the UCCJEA as of the date of this action and still operated under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (UCCJA). Thus, the Montana court erred by applying the former best interest standard rather than the current inconvenient forum standard, and by failing to hold a hearing to consider the jurisdictional factors. The case was remanded for further proceedings. In re Marriage of Fontenot, 2003 MT 242, 317 M 298, 77 P3d 206 (2003).

Following remand of the 2003 Fontenot case (Fontenot I), the District Court determined that under Fontenot I, the Louisiana court could not divest the Montana court of jurisdiction because the Louisiana court was not operating under the UCCJEA. The District Court then concluded that it had jurisdiction, awarded custody to the mother, and held the father in contempt for failing to abide by the Montana ruling. The father appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed and remanded. The part of the Fontenot I decision that the District Court relied on was nonbinding dicta. In fact, Fontenot I did not determine jurisdiction, but rather held that the District Court did not conduct proper factfinding through a hearing to determine whether Montana had jurisdiction and noted that Louisiana applies the best interests of the child standard of the UCCJA, while Montana does not apply that standard under the UCCJEA. The Supreme Court noted that the federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act of 1980 (PKPA), 28 U.S.C. 1738A, sets forth the jurisdictional guidelines to be applied in the face of competing decisions by sister states, and the District Court was directed to apply the PKPA standards on remand to determine which state had jurisdiction. In addition, because no determination was made establishing Montana jurisdiction, the contempt charges against the father were dismissed. In re Marriage of Fontenot, 2006 MT 324, 335 M 79, 149 P3d 28 (2006). See also In re Marriage of Stoneman v. Drollinger, 2003 MT 25, 314 M 139, 64 P3d 997 (2003), and In re Custody of N.G.H., 2004 MT 162, 322 M 20, 92 P3d 1215 (2004).

On a third appeal of this jurisdictional issue, the Supreme Court affirmed that even if Montana was a more appropriate forum in 2004, Louisiana was the more appropriate forum in 2010. Louisiana previously held hearings on the merits of the custody issue, while Montana had addressed only jurisdictional issues. The court agreed with the District Court that it was in the child's best interests to litigate the proceedings in Louisiana, given the child's home, school, community, and developmental needs and the continuity and stability of care in Louisiana. In re Marriage of Fontenot, 2010 MT 86, 356 Mont. 123, 232 P.3d 358.

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJA

Concurrent State Jurisdiction Under UCCJA Determined by PKPA: Pamela Shupe obtained a divorce decree from Utah granting her sole custody of the couple's child. The father, Yancy, petitioned for a change of custody in Montana. The Supreme Court determined that each state had adopted the UCCJA and therefore each state had jurisdiction to make a custody determination. The Supreme Court stated that the PKPA had been enacted to remedy problems of concurrent state jurisdiction under the UCCJA. The Supreme Court held that because Utah had jurisdiction and had not declined to exercise its jurisdiction, then under the PKPA, Montana was not authorized to modify the original custody determination of Utah. In re Marriage of Shupe, 276 M 409, 916 P2d 744, 53 St. Rep. 447 (1996), followed in Vannatta v. Boulds, 2003 MT 343, 318 M 472, 81 P3d 480 (2003).

Child Custody Proceeding Pending in Other State: Proceedings for a child custody action were filed in Arizona, the children's state of residence, prior to those filed in Montana. Arizona had not stayed its proceedings. Therefore, under 40-7-107 the Montana District Court properly declined to exercise its jurisdiction. In re Marriage of Brown, 218 M 14, 706 P2d 116, 42 St. Rep. 1360 (1985).

Adoption Proceeding in Foreign Jurisdiction — Applicability of Habeas Corpus: A child was born to petitioner in Wyoming in 1980. She relinquished custody to a couple and moved to Montana. Petitioner executed handwritten instruments that were notarized relinquishing custody to the couple and stating she did not know the natural father. The couple began adoption proceedings in Wyoming. Petitioner then executed a written revocation of custody and petitioned for a Writ of Habeas Corpus for the child in Yellowstone County. The District Court deferred jurisdiction to the Wyoming court having jurisdiction of the adoption proceeding. The habeas corpus petition was properly filed in Yellowstone County because the child was currently located there. The District Court properly deferred jurisdiction because although petitioner contended she executed the written instruments under fraud and duress, those issues were equally triable in Wyoming. Under 40-7-108, the District Court could not determine whether Wyoming was an inconvenient forum, only whether the court itself was. The Supreme Court in upholding the District Court's action said in cases of simultaneous proceedings, the provisions of 40-7-107(3) should be followed. In re Application of Peterson, 203 M 305, 661 P2d 40, 40 St. Rep. 465 (1983).

Improper Venue as Not Affecting Jurisdiction: This section relates to venue and not jurisdiction; even though only one of joint petitioners in an adoption proceeding was resident of county in which proceeding was held, that was sufficient to confer jurisdiction. In re Adoption of Curtis, 143 M 330, 390 P2d 209 (1964).

40-7-108. Inconvenient forum.

Commissioners' Note

This section retains the focus of Section 7 of the UCCJA [see language of this section prior to 1999 amendment]. It authorizes courts to decide that another State is in a better position to make the custody determination, taking into consideration the relative circumstances of the parties. If so, the court may defer to the other State.

The list of factors that the court may consider has been updated from the UCCJA. The list is not meant to be exclusive. Several provisions require comment. Subparagraph (1) [subsection (2)(a)] is concerned specifically with domestic violence and other matters affecting the health and safety of the parties. For this purpose, the court should determine whether the parties are located in different States because one party is a victim of domestic violence or child abuse. If domestic violence or child abuse has occurred, this factor authorizes the court to consider which State can best protect the victim from further violence or abuse.

In applying subparagraph (3) [subsection (2)(c)], courts should realize that distance concerns can be alleviated by applying the communication and cooperation provisions of Sections 111 and 112 [40-7-119 and 40-7-140].

In applying subsection (7) [(2)(g)] on expeditious resolution of the controversy, the court could consider the different procedural and evidentiary laws of the two States, as well as the flexibility of the court dockets. It also should consider the ability of a court to arrive at a solution to all the legal issues surrounding the family. If one State has jurisdiction to decide both the custody and support issues, it would be desirable to determine that State to be the most convenient forum. The same is true when children of the same family live in different States. It would be inappropriate to require parents to have custody proceedings in several States when one State could resolve the custody of all the children.

Before determining whether to decline or retain jurisdiction, the court of this State may communicate, in accordance with Section 110 [40-7-139], with a court of another State and exchange information pertinent to the assumption of jurisdiction by either court.

There are two departures from Section 7 of the UCCJA [see language of this section prior to 1999 amendment]. First, the court may not simply dismiss the action. To do so would leave the case in limbo. Rather the court shall stay the case and direct the parties to file in the State that has been found to be the more convenient forum. The court is also authorized to impose any other conditions it considers appropriate. This might include the issuance of temporary custody orders during the time necessary to commence a proceeding in the designated State, dismissing the case if the custody proceeding is not commenced in the other State or resuming jurisdiction if a court of the other State refuses to take the case.

Second, UCCJA, § 7(g) [former subsection (7)] which allowed the court to assess fees and costs if it was a clearly inappropriate court, has been eliminated. If a court has jurisdiction under this Act [chapter], it could not be a clearly inappropriate court.

Compiler's Comments

1999 Amendment: Chapter 91 substituted present language pertaining to the determination by a court of this state of whether it is an inconvenient forum for former language that read: "(1) A court which has jurisdiction under this chapter to make an initial or modification decree may decline to exercise its jurisdiction any time before making a decree if it finds that it is an inconvenient forum to make a custody determination under the circumstances of the case and that a court of another state is a more appropriate forum.

(2) A finding of inconvenient forum may be made upon the court's own motion or upon motion of a party or a guardian ad litem or other representative of the child.

(3) In determining if it is an inconvenient forum, the court shall consider if it is in the interest of the child that another state assume jurisdiction. For this purpose it may take into account the following factors, among others:

(a) if another state is or recently was the child's home state;

(b) if another state has a closer connection with the child and his family or with the child and one or more of the contestants;

(c) if substantial evidence concerning the child's present or future care, protection, training, and personal relationships is more readily available in another state;

(d) if the parties have agreed on another forum which is no less appropriate; and

(e) if the exercise of jurisdiction by a court of this state would contravene any of the purposes stated in 40-7-102.

(4) Before determining whether to decline or retain jurisdiction, the court may communicate with a court of another state and exchange information pertinent to the assumption of jurisdiction by either court with a view to assuring that jurisdiction will be exercised by the more appropriate court and that a forum will be available to the parties.

(5) If the court finds that it is an inconvenient forum and that a court of another state is a more appropriate forum, it may dismiss the proceedings or it may stay the proceedings upon condition that a custody proceeding be promptly commenced in another named state or upon any other conditions which may be just and proper, including the condition that a moving party stipulate his consent and submission to the jurisdiction of the other forum.

(6) The court may decline to exercise its jurisdiction under this chapter if a custody determination is incidental to an action for divorce or another proceeding while retaining jurisdiction over the divorce or other proceeding.

(7) If it appears to the court that it is clearly an inappropriate forum, it may require the party who commenced the proceedings to pay, in addition to the costs of the proceedings in this state, necessary travel and other expenses, including attorneys' fees, incurred by other parties or their witnesses. Payment is to be made to the clerk of the court for remittance to the proper party.

(8) Upon dismissal or stay of proceedings under this section the court shall inform the court found to be the more appropriate forum of this fact or, if the court which would have jurisdiction in the other state is not certainly known, transmit the information to the court administrator or other appropriate official for forwarding to the appropriate court.

(9) Any communication received from another state informing this state of a finding of inconvenient forum because a court of this state is the more appropriate forum shall be filed in the custody registry of the appropriate court. Upon assuming jurisdiction, the court of this state shall inform the original court of this fact." Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJEA

State Subject Matter Jurisdiction Relationship to Tribal Court Jurisdiction — No Abuse of Discretion for District Court Amendment of Parenting Plan — Mother Failed to Establish Definite Fixed Residence on Reservation — Proper Exercise of Jurisdiction Despite Allegation of Inconvenient Forum — Concurrent State Jurisdiction Proper. In re Parenting of L.D.C., 2022 MT 161, 409 Mont. 439, 516 P.3d 631.

Determination of Parental Interest — Montana as Inconvenient Forum: A mother allowed the petitioner to care for her 1-year-old child for a 6-month period. At the end of the period, the petitioner refused to return the child. Nearly a year later, the child was returned to her mother, who then moved to Oklahoma. The petitioner filed a petition requesting a parental interest determination and interim custody. Ultimately, a District Court concluded that Montana was an inconvenient forum. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that although Montana could exercise jurisdiction over the matter because the petition had been filed while the child was still living in Montana, proceedings in Montana would place a heavy burden of time, travel, and dislocation on the mother and her family. In re Parenting of M.M.K., 2016 MT 81, 383 Mont. 161, 369 P.3d 344.

Jurisdiction Over Termination of Parental Rights Proper: A mother appealed the termination of her parental rights, arguing that the District Court erred in not staying the proceedings because once the mother left Montana for Utah and the child was placed with a Utah foster family, Montana was an inconvenient forum and no longer held exclusive and continuing jurisdiction over the proceedings. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that Montana was not an inconvenient forum under 40-7-108 because the evidence required for the proceeding was not located in Utah and did not require any evidence from Utah and that because there was not an ongoing proceeding in Utah, the District Court did not err in refusing to relinquish jurisdiction under the continuing jurisdiction provision of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, 40-7-202, which requires a pending proceeding in another state. In addition, absent any pending Utah proceeding, Article V of the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children, codified at 41-4-101, dictated that Montana retain jurisdiction after the child was placed in Utah in order to adjudicate the proceeding. In re A.R.B., 2013 MT 310, 372 Mont. 274, 312 P.3d 425.

Jurisdiction Over Modification of Child Support — UIFSA, not UCCJEA, Controls: In a matter involving only child support issues, jurisdiction is controlled by the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act (UIFSA), not the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA). The District Court erred in concluding it did not have jurisdiction over the matter based on Montana being an inconvenient forum under UCCJEA when the only issue before the court involved child support. Because the UIFSA, unlike the UCCJEA, does not provide an inconvenient forum provision, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the matter to the District Court. Ervin v. Ervin, 2011 MT 309, 363 Mont. 80, 265 P.3d 1272.

Determination of Inconvenient Forum — Consideration of Statutory Factors Required: The District Court determined, based on the best interests of the child standard in the 1977 Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (UCCJA), that Montana was not a convenient forum for a child custody proceeding. The Supreme Court noted that the proper standard under the 1999 Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, which replaced the UCCJA, is whether Montana is the child's home state, in which case Montana has continuing jurisdiction unless a Montana court determines that this state is an inconvenient forum and another state is a more appropriate forum. To determine whether Montana is an inconvenient forum, the Montana court must apply the factors in subsection (2) of this section. Thus, the District Court erred by applying the old UCCJA standard, and the Supreme Court reversed for a hearing under present law to address the factors in subsection (2) of this section regarding jurisdiction. In re Custody of N.G.H., 2004 MT 162, 322 M 20, 92 P3d 1215 (2004), following In re Marriage of Fontenot, 2003 MT 242, 317 M 298, 77 P3d 206 (2003), and followed in In re Marriage of Myrland, 2010 MT 286, 359 Mont. 1, 248 P.3d 290.

Improper Use of Best Interest of Child Standard in Determining Jurisdiction Under UCCJEA — Hearing Required to Determine Jurisdiction Between States Based on Inconvenient Forum: As part of a dissolution action, both parties filed for child custody. The mother filed in Montana where she resided, and the father filed in Louisiana where he resided. The Louisiana court took jurisdiction based on the assumption that an emergency situation existed. The Montana District Court applied the best interest of the child standard and transferred custody to Louisiana. The mother appealed to the Montana Supreme Court, which noted that the best interest standard was eliminated from the inconvenient forum statutes when Montana adopted the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA) in 1999. Rather than the best interest standard, the UCCJEA provides that a Montana court may decline to exercise its jurisdiction if the court determines that Montana is an inconvenient forum under the circumstances and a court of another state is a more appropriate forum based on various factors, including: (1) whether domestic violence has occurred; (2) the length of time the child has resided outside Montana; (3) the distance between the Montana court and the court in the state that would assume jurisdiction; (4) the relative financial circumstances of the parties; (5) any agreement of the parties as to which state would assume jurisdiction; (6) the nature and location of any evidence regarding the issues; (7) the ability of the court of each state to decide the issues expeditiously; and (8) the familiarity of each state with the facts and issues. Further, a hearing is required under this section to allow the parties to submit information regarding the factors and for the court to make determinations of fact and law. The husband's argument that 40-7-107 required no hearing or input from the parties before the Montana court communicated with Louisiana also failed because 40-7-107 specifically excludes a temporary emergency jurisdiction proceeding, which was the basis for the Louisiana action, and because 40-7-107 addresses simultaneous custody proceedings in Montana and another state. However, Louisiana had not adopted the UCCJEA as of the date of this action and still operated under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (UCCJA). Thus, the Montana court erred by applying the former best interest standard rather than the current inconvenient forum standard, and by failing to hold a hearing to consider the jurisdictional factors. The case was remanded for further proceedings. In re Marriage of Fontenot, 2003 MT 242, 317 M 298, 77 P3d 206 (2003).

Following remand of the 2003 Fontenot case (Fontenot I), the District Court determined that under Fontenot I, the Louisiana court could not divest the Montana court of jurisdiction because the Louisiana court was not operating under the UCCJEA. The District Court then concluded that it had jurisdiction, awarded custody to the mother, and held the father in contempt for failing to abide by the Montana ruling. The father appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed and remanded. The part of the Fontenot I decision that the District Court relied on was nonbinding dicta. In fact, Fontenot I did not determine jurisdiction, but rather held that the District Court did not conduct proper factfinding through a hearing to determine whether Montana had jurisdiction and noted that Louisiana applies the best interests of the child standard of the UCCJA, while Montana does not apply that standard under the UCCJEA. The Supreme Court noted that the federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act of 1980 (PKPA), 28 U.S.C. 1738A, sets forth the jurisdictional guidelines to be applied in the face of competing decisions by sister states, and the District Court was directed to apply the PKPA standards on remand to determine which state had jurisdiction. In addition, because no determination was made establishing Montana jurisdiction, the contempt charges against the father were dismissed. In re Marriage of Fontenot, 2006 MT 324, 335 M 79, 149 P3d 28 (2006). See also In re Marriage of Stoneman v. Drollinger, 2003 MT 25, 314 M 139, 64 P3d 997 (2003), and In re Custody of N.G.H., 2004 MT 162, 322 M 20, 92 P3d 1215 (2004).

On a third appeal of this jurisdictional issue, the Supreme Court affirmed that even if Montana was a more appropriate forum in 2004, Louisiana was the more appropriate forum in 2010. Louisiana previously held hearings on the merits of the custody issue, while Montana had addressed only jurisdictional issues. The court agreed with the District Court that it was in the child's best interests to litigate the proceedings in Louisiana, given the child's home, school, community, and developmental needs and the continuity and stability of care in Louisiana. In re Marriage of Fontenot, 2010 MT 86, 356 Mont. 123, 232 P.3d 358.

Error in Montana Court's Declination of Jurisdiction to Washington Court — Inconvenient Forum: Following several incidents of partner abuse over the years, the mother moved to Washington state and then requested that the Montana court decline jurisdiction as an inconvenient forum in order to allow the Washington court to assume jurisdiction. The request was denied, and the mother appealed. Under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, a Montana court has jurisdiction to make child custody determinations if Montana is the child's home state, as defined in 40-7-103, and Montana will continue to have exclusive continuing jurisdiction unless the Montana court declines to exercise its jurisdiction. In this case, the parties conceded that Montana was the home state. Jurisdiction may be declined at any time if the Montana court determines that it is an inconvenient forum and that a court of another state is a more appropriate forum to make custody determinations. The factors in this section must be considered when evaluating a motion to decline jurisdiction, and the Act places domestic violence at the top of the list of factors to be considered. Although this factor alone is not dispositive, the Supreme Court held that, given the high propensity for recidivism in domestic violence, when a court finds that partner abuse or child abuse has occurred or that a party has fled Montana to avoid further violence or abuse, the court is authorized to consider whether the party and the child might be better protected if further custody proceedings are held in another state. Here, the District Court abused its discretion by failing to consider which forum would best protect the mother and children. The Supreme Court then went on to discuss the other statutory factors and concluded that the protection of the parties, the years that the children have resided in Washington, the significant distance between the courts, the parties' disparate financial circumstances, the location of evidence and convenience of witnesses, and the familiarity factors all supported the Montana court declining jurisdiction. None of the jurisdictional factors mitigated against declination, and no factor outweighed the concern for safety raised by the history of domestic violence. Thus, the Supreme Court ordered the District Court to decline jurisdiction as an inconvenient forum and arrange to transfer the case to Washington. In re Marriage of Stoneman v. Drollinger, 2003 MT 25, 314 M 139, 64 P3d 997 (2003).

Following remand, the District Court held that the issue of child support should be transferred to Washington state in conjunction with the custody and parenting issues. Nevertheless, the wife filed a cross-appeal in 2007 arguing that under 40-5-149 (renumbered 40-5-1012), Montana retained jurisdiction over the child support issue. However, the Supreme Court dismissed the claim as untimely. Under Rule 4, M.R.App.P., notice of appeal must be filed within 30 days of judgment or order, but the wife's notice of cross-appeal was filed more than 11 months after the District Court's order that finally settled the matter. In re Marriage of Stoneman & Drollinger, 2008 MT 448, 348 M 17, 199 P3d 232 (2008).

Jurisdictional Requirement Over Dissolution Proceeding Satisfied by Party's Residence — Inconvenient Forum Improperly Applied Absent Opportunity to Respond to Motion: After several years of a difficult relationship, the husband was charged with partner or family member assault and the wife moved to Oregon with the four children. An Oregon court determined that it had temporary emergency jurisdiction over the children, issued a restraining order against the husband, and granted residential custody to the wife. The husband subsequently filed for dissolution and a parenting plan in Montana. The District Court ordered the wife to show cause why the parenting plan should not be adopted. The wife moved to vacate the hearing, claiming that the Montana court did not have jurisdiction and that it was an inconvenient forum. The District Court vacated the show cause hearing without allowing the husband to respond to the motion and dismissed the dissolution petition without explanation. The husband appealed and the Supreme Court reversed. Oregon's exercise of temporary emergency jurisdiction over the children did not automatically divest Montana of jurisdiction over the same parenting issues. Neither party had initiated dissolution proceedings at the time that the husband's petition was filed, so no concurrent jurisdiction issue existed regarding dissolution. Because the husband resided in Montana for 90 days prior to filing the petition, the jurisdiction requirements of 40-4-104 were satisfied. However, jurisdiction over a dissolution of marriage does not necessarily confer jurisdiction over related child custody issues. Once the Montana court was notified of the child custody proceedings in Oregon, the Montana court was obligated by 40-7-204 to contact the Oregon court regarding potential jurisdictional conflicts, but that was not done, so the Montana court's decision to decline to address the parenting issues in the husband's petition because the Oregon court had already exercised jurisdiction was reversed. Further, the inconvenient forum argument was also inappropriate because the husband was not given the opportunity to submit arguments on the issue as required under this section. In re Marriage of Vanlaarhoven, 2002 MT 222, 311 M 368, 55 P3d 942 (2002).

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJA

Consideration of Statutory Factors Not Mandatory in Determining Continuing Jurisdiction: Mother argued that the District Court erred in failing to address all the factors in subsection (3) of this section as relevant to determining whether Montana was an inconvenient forum for a child custody case. During the pendency of the case, she had moved the child to North Dakota and filed a motion to decline Montana jurisdiction as an inconvenient forum. However, nowhere does subsection (3) of this section mandate that the court consider each of the five factors set forth in the subsection. Instead, the statute simply lists a number of elements that the court may consider in making an inconvenient forum determination. Here, the court considered the first factor and concluded that because the child had not lived in another state for 6 months, Montana was the appropriate forum. Absent any indication that the exercise of continuing jurisdiction by the Montana court contravened any of the general purposes of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act stated in 40-7-102 (now repealed), among which is the deterrence of unilateral removals of children undertaken to obtain custody awards, the District Court's denial of mother's motion to decline jurisdiction was not an abuse of the court's discretion. In re B.E.S., 1998 MT 190, 290 M 188, 963 P2d 449, 55 St. Rep. 773 (1998).

Indians — Subject Matter Jurisdiction Over Dissolution of Marriage — Different Residences of Parties — Factors to Be Considered — Bertelson Followed: Stacey, an enrolled member of the Fort Peck Tribes, married Shane, a non-Indian. After the marriage ceremony, Stacey returned to the Fort Peck Indian Reservation and Shane went to Forsyth, where his parents lived and where he worked. Some time later, Stacey had a child who also became an enrolled member and lived with Stacey on the Fort Peck Indian Reservation. Still later, Shane filed a dissolution action in a state District Court. The District Court ordered joint custody and ordered that Shane would be the primary residential custodian. Approximately 1 month later, the Fort Peck Tribal Court awarded temporary custody to Stacey. She then filed a motion in District Court under former Rules 12(h) and 60, M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), to dismiss Shane's dissolution action for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The District Court held that it had subject matter jurisdiction over the case and issued a final decree of dissolution. In that decree, the District Court held that the parties' child had significant contacts both off and on the reservation, held that the District Court shared concurrent jurisdiction with the tribal court, and therefore denied Stacey's motion to dismiss. The Supreme Court reviewed its previous holdings regarding tribal jurisdiction and child custody jurisdiction under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act. The Supreme Court also reviewed the purposes of the Indian Child Welfare Act, which, while not strictly applicable to the case before it, cautions that state courts should be careful not to erode the sovereignty of tribes and tribal courts. In reliance upon In re Bertelson, 189 M 524, 617 P2d 121 (1980), the Supreme Court held that the best interests of the child should be determined and followed in deciding whether a state or tribal court has jurisdiction for the purposes of awarding custody but that when an Indian child resides off the reservation, state courts and tribal courts share concurrent jurisdiction. The Supreme Court then held, in further reliance upon Bertelson, that even when jurisdiction is concurrent, it does not mean that states courts should exercise jurisdiction and that in deciding whether to exercise concurrent jurisdiction, the state courts should consider: (1) 40-4-102, 40-4-107, 40-4-211, and this section; (2) certain policy issues; and (3) the residence of the parties pursuant to 1-1-215. For this reason, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court for a determination of the residence of Stacey and her child, saying that if the District Court determines that both reside on the reservation, the District Court must dismiss the case. However, if the District Court finds that Stacey's child is not a resident of the reservation and that the District Court shares jurisdiction with the tribal court, the District Court must then consider factors from Bertelson, previously discussed by the Supreme Court, to determine whether the District Court or the tribal court is better able to determine the best interests of the child. In re Marriage of Skillen, 1998 MT 43, 287 M 399, 956 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 147 (1998).

Family Moved From State — Inconvenient Forum for Ongoing Custody Determinations: Shortly after the marriage was dissolved in a Montana court, the mother moved with the children to California and the father moved to Washington. When the need for further child custody determinations arose, the father maintained that Montana remained the proper forum and that mother created any inconvenience by putting 2,000 miles between herself and the Montana court. The District Court, after careful consideration of where evidence regarding the children's environment and welfare was most readily available, properly exercised its discretion by determining that Montana was an inconvenient forum and that the children's interests would be best served by having a California court assume jurisdiction. This is consistent with the purpose espoused in the U.C.C.J.A. that litigation involving minor children occur in the state in which the child has the closest connection and in which significant evidence concerning the child's care, protection, training, and personal relationships is most readily available. In re Marriage of Irwin, 259 M 176, 855 P2d 525, 50 St. Rep. 741 (1993).

Adoption Agency Placement and Refusal to Consent to Adoption by Foster Parents as Reasonable — No Court Authority to Place Child: An adoption agency placed a child with foster parents for a period of time that, although initially to be of short duration, turned out to be 27 months because of prolonged court proceedings regarding termination of parental rights. The agency had always sought to place the child out of state because of potential threat posed by the birth father and made no indications that the foster parents could adopt the child; nevertheless, they began adoption proceedings and sought preliminary injunctive relief to prevent the child from being removed from their home. In denying the injunction, the District Court held, and the Supreme Court subsequently affirmed, that this section restricts who may place a child for adoption and does not include courts in that designation. Because the agency did not consent to the foster parents' request for adoption or did not place the child for adoption in Montana, the foster parents could not adopt the child. The District Court further reasoned that allowing the injunction could have the broader effect of making agencies fearful of placing children with foster parents if there was no certainty that the child could be placed with the family of the agency's choice. The agency's actions in refusing consent to adoption and placing the child out of state were not unreasonable. Lewis v. Catholic Social Serv. for Mont., 253 M 369, 833 P2d 1023, 49 St. Rep. 448 (1992).

Parental Proclivity to Relocate — Montana Jurisdiction Proper: Mother argued that the Montana District Court should have declined jurisdiction as an inconvenient forum under this section, contending the court overlooked the likelihood that the child's present or future care, protection, training, and personal relationships would be more readily available in California. The Supreme Court disagreed and held that Montana was the best arena for jurisdiction after finding that: (1) the mother and child had only recently moved to California; (2) the mother showed a proclivity to relocate; (3) the mother testified at the final hearing that she intended to make her home in Oregon; and (4) the only stable, permanent home environment for the child was the father's home in Montana. In re Marriage of Klose, 243 M 211, 793 P2d 1311, 47 St. Rep. 1156 (1990).

District Court Deferral of Child Custody to Tribal Court: The District Court properly dismissed a petition for modification of child custody on grounds that the Crow Tribal Court was a more appropriate forum. In re Custody of Zier, 230 M 464, 750 P2d 1083, 45 St. Rep. 356 (1988).

Custody — Factors Considered: Section 40-7-108 permits a court to decline to exercise jurisdiction if it finds that another state is a more appropriate forum. The factors that may be considered include which state is or recently was the child's home state and the availability of evidence in the other state. The Montana District Court's decision in this case to stay proceedings in this state was proper under 40-7-108. The children's residence was in the other state, and any evidence regarding their prior care, protection, training, and personal relationships would have been in their resident state. In re Marriage of Brown, 218 M 14, 706 P2d 116, 42 St. Rep. 1360 (1985).

Adoption Proceeding in Foreign Jurisdiction — Applicability of Habeas Corpus: A child was born to petitioner in Wyoming in 1980. She relinquished custody to a couple and moved to Montana. Petitioner executed handwritten instruments that were notarized relinquishing custody to the couple and stating she did not know the natural father. The couple began adoption proceedings in Wyoming. Petitioner then executed a written revocation of custody and petitioned for a Writ of Habeas Corpus for the child in Yellowstone County. The District Court deferred jurisdiction to the Wyoming court having jurisdiction of the adoption proceeding. The habeas corpus petition was properly filed in Yellowstone County because the child was currently located there. The District Court properly deferred jurisdiction because although petitioner contended she executed the written instruments under fraud and duress, those issues were equally triable in Wyoming. Under 40-7-108, the District Court could not determine whether Wyoming was an inconvenient forum, only whether the court itself was. The Supreme Court in upholding the District Court's action said in cases of simultaneous proceedings, the provisions of 40-7-107(3) should be followed. In re Application of Peterson, 203 M 305, 661 P2d 40, 40 St. Rep. 465 (1983).

Communication With Court of Another State: Prior to a proceeding to determine jurisdiction in a modification of a Kentucky child custody decree, the Montana and Kentucky trial court judges informally communicated to facilitate the decisionmaking process. Such communication was untimely because subsection (4) is intended for situations where it has been determined that two states have concurrent jurisdiction. It serves as a second check on jurisdiction after the other prerequisites have been met. Pierce v. Pierce, 197 M 16, 640 P2d 899, 39 St. Rep. 315 (1982).

Modification of Out-of-State Custody Decree: In a proceeding to modify a Kentucky child custody decree, the "forum non conveniens" and "clean hands" provisions come into play only after the following findings are made: (1) Kentucky no longer has jurisdiction; (2) Montana has jurisdiction under 40-4-211; and (3) under 28 U.S.C. § 1738A(f), 40-4-211, and 40-7-114 (now repealed), Montana has jurisdiction to modify the Kentucky decree. Pierce v. Pierce, 197 M 16, 640 P2d 899, 39 St. Rep. 315 (1982).

Custody — Court Discretion, Inconvenient Forum Question: Section 40-7-108 describes several criteria by which a District Court may consider whether it is an inconvenient forum but does not create a mandatory duty on the court to dismiss the action upon such grounds. The section is entirely discretionary. The trial court, knowing that the child in question, apparently abandoned by her parents living in California, had been living with relatives in Montana for some time, did not abuse its full discretion in determining it was not an inconvenient forum. Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979). See also In re Marriage of Cook, 223 M 293, 725 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 1732 (1986).

40-7-109. Jurisdiction declined by reason of conduct.

Commissioners' Note

The "Clean Hands" section of the UCCJA has been truncated in this Act [chapter]. Since there is no longer a multiplicity of jurisdictions which could take cognizance of a child-custody proceeding, there is less of a concern that one parent will take the child to another jurisdiction in an attempt to find a more favorable forum. Most of the jurisdictional problems generated by abducting parents should be solved by the prioritization of home State in Section 201 [40-7-201]; the exclusive, continuing jurisdiction provisions of Section 202 [40-7-202]; and the ban on modification in Section 203 [40-7-203]. For example, if a parent takes the child from the home State and seeks an original custody determination elsewhere, the stay-at- home parent has six months to file a custody petition under the extended home state jurisdictional provision of Section 201 [40-7-201], which will ensure that the case is retained in the home State. If a petitioner for a modification determination takes the child from the State that issued the original custody determination, another State cannot assume jurisdiction as long at the first State exercises exclusive, continuing jurisdiction.

Nonetheless, there are still a number of cases where parents, or their surrogates, act in a reprehensible manner, such as removing, secreting, retaining, or restraining the child. This section ensures that abducting parents will not receive an advantage for their unjustifiable conduct. If the conduct that creates the jurisdiction is unjustified, courts must decline to exercise jurisdiction that is inappropriately invoked by one of the parties. For example, if one parent abducts the child pre-decree and establishes a new home State, that jurisdiction will decline to hear the case. There are exceptions. If the other party has acquiesced in the court's jurisdiction, the court may hear the case. Such acquiescence may occur by filing a pleading submitting to the jurisdiction, or by not filing in the court that would otherwise have jurisdiction under this Act [chapter]. Similarly, if the court that would have jurisdiction finds that the court of this State is a more appropriate forum, the court may hear the case.

This section applies to those situations where jurisdiction exists because of the unjustified conduct of the person seeking to invoke it. If, for example, a parent in the State with exclusive, continuing jurisdiction under Section 202 [40-7-202] has either restrained the child from visiting with the other parent, or has retained the child after visitation, and seeks to modify the decree, this section in inapplicable. The conduct of restraining or retaining the child did not create jurisdiction. Jurisdiction existed under this Act [chapter] without regard to the parent's conduct. Whether a court should decline to hear the parent's request to modify is a matter of local law. The focus in this section is on the unjustified conduct of the person who invokes the jurisdiction of the court. A technical illegality or wrong is insufficient to trigger the applicability of this section. This is particularly important in cases involving domestic violence and child abuse. Domestic violence victims should not be charged with unjustifiable conduct for conduct that occurred in the process of fleeing domestic violence, even if their conduct is technically illegal. Thus, if a parent flees with a child to escape domestic violence and in the process violates a joint custody decree, the case should not be automatically dismissed under this section. An inquiry must be made into whether the flight was justified under the circumstances of the case. However, an abusive parent who seizes the child and flees to another State to establish jurisdiction has engaged in unjustifiable conduct and the new State must decline to exercise jurisdiction under this section.

Subsection (b) [(2)] authorizes the court to fashion an appropriate remedy for the safety of the child and to prevent a repetition of the unjustified conduct. Thus, it would be appropriate for the court to notify the other parent and to provide for foster care for the child until the child is returned to the other parent. The court could also stay the proceeding and require that a custody proceeding be instituted in another State that would have jurisdiction under this Act [chapter]. It should be noted that the court is not making a forum non conveniens analysis in this section. If the conduct is unjustifiable, it must decline jurisdiction. It may, however, retain jurisdiction until a custody proceeding is commenced in the appropriate tribunal if such retention is necessary to prevent a repetition of the wrongful conduct or to ensure the safety of the child.

The attorney's fee standard for this section is patterned after the International Child Abduction Remedies Act, 42 U.S.C. § 11607(b)(3). The assessed costs and fees are to be paid to the respondent who established that jurisdiction was based on unjustifiable conduct.

2019 Amendment: Chapter 98 in (1) in beginning in exception clause substituted "40-7-204" for "40-7-202"; in (1)(b) substituted "40-7-201 through 40-7-203" for "40-7-139, 40-7-140, and 40-7-201"; and in (2) near middle substituted "unjustifiable conduct" for "wrongful conduct". Amendment effective March 21, 2019.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 91 inserted present language concerning a court of this state declining to take jurisdiction due to unjustifiable conduct on the part of the person invoking jurisdiction for former language that read: "(1) If the petitioner for an initial decree has wrongfully taken the child from another state or has engaged in similar reprehensible conduct, the court may decline to exercise jurisdiction if this is just and proper under the circumstances.

(2) Unless required in the interest of the child, the court may not exercise its jurisdiction to modify a custody decree of another state if the petitioner, without consent of the person entitled to custody, has improperly removed the child from the physical custody of the person entitled to custody or has improperly retained the child after a visit or other temporary relinquishment of physical custody. If the petitioner has violated any other provision of a custody decree of another state, the court may decline to exercise its jurisdiction if this is just and proper under the circumstances.

(3) In appropriate cases a court dismissing a petition under this section may charge the petitioner with necessary travel and other expenses, including attorneys' fees, incurred by other parties or their witnesses." Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJEA

Misinterpretation of Statute — Jurisdiction Determined by Residence of Child 6 Months Before Initial Pleading: A mother took her child from Montana on April 24, 2006, after the child had resided in Montana for about 4 years, and filed for a dissolution of her marriage and a custody determination in Texas on May 26, 2006. The child's father filed a petition for dissolution in Montana on October 2, 2006, resulting in a default judgment and parenting plan that the mother later moved to set aside, which the District Court did. The Supreme Court held that the District Court misinterpreted 40-7-201 as providing that a child's home state is the state in which the child has resided for "the last" 6 months and erred when it set aside the parenting plan in favor of the action filed in Texas; the Supreme Court clarified that the home state for purposes of jurisdiction is the child's home state within 6 months before commencement of the proceeding. The Texas court could not have had jurisdiction over the child for more than a few weeks, and the District Court's interpretation did not further the purpose of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act to prevent kidnapping of a child by a parent. Section Discretionary in Determining Wrongful Taking: Application of this section is discretionary with the court as to whether the moving of a child by a parent claiming custody constitutes a wrongful taking. In re Marriage of Cox, 226 M 176, 736 P2d 97, 44 St. Rep. 567 (1987).

Modification of Out-of-State Custody Decree: In a proceeding to modify a Kentucky child custody decree, the "forum non conveniens" and "clean hands" provisions come into play only after the following findings are made: (1) Kentucky no longer has jurisdiction; (2) Montana has jurisdiction under 40-4-211; and (3) under 28 U.S.C. § 1738A(f), 40-4-211, and 40-7-114 (now repealed), Montana has jurisdiction to modify the Kentucky decree. Pierce v. Pierce, 197 M 16, 640 P2d 899, 39 St. Rep. 315 (1982).

Jurisdiction to Modify a Foreign Custody Decree: There is no requirement that the Montana court recognize or enforce a foreign court's decree when the foreign court failed to give notice to the person in physical custody of the child as required by the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act. Further, the foreign state did not retain the jurisdiction it had at the time of initial custody proceedings because the foreign state had long since ceased to be the home of the child. Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).

Custody — Jurisdiction — Recognition of Foreign Decree: When a custody decree of another state is in force, a question of the applicability of the Full Faith and Credit Clause to custody decrees arises. When the California court heard no testimony on the best interests of the child, the precise question at issue in the Montana action, the Montana court was not bound to follow the California court's decree. Similarly, the Montana court was not prevented by the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act from modifying the California decree. Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).

40-7-110. Information to be submitted to court.

Commissioners' Note

The pleading requirements from Section 9 of the UCCJA [see language of this section prior to 1999 amendment] are generally carried over into this Act [chapter]. However, the information is made subject to local law on the protection of names and other identifying information in certain cases. A number of States have enacted laws relating to the protection of victims in domestic violence and child abuse cases which provide for the confidentiality of victims names, addresses, and other information. These procedures must be followed if the child-custody proceeding of the State requires their applicability. See, e.g., California Family Law Code § 3409(a). If a State does not have local law that provides for protecting names and addresses, then subsection (e) [not adopted in Montana] or a similar provision should be adopted. Subsection (e) [not adopted in Montana] is based on the National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judge's, Model Code on Domestic and Family Violence § 304(c). There are other models to choose from, in particular UIFSA § 312.

In subsection (a)(2) [(1)(b)], the term "proceedings" should be read broadly to include more than custody proceedings. Thus, if one parent was being criminally prosecuted for child abuse or custodial interference, those proceedings should be disclosed. If the child is subject to the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children, facts relating to compliance with the Compact should be disclosed in the pleading or affidavit.

Subsection (b) [(2)] has been added. It authorizes the court to stay the proceeding until the information required in subsection (a) [(1)] has been disclosed, although failure to provide the information does not deprive the court of jurisdiction to hear the case. This follows the majority of jurisdictions which held that failure to comply with the pleading requirements of the UCCJA did not deprive the court of jurisdiction to make a custody determination.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 91 in (1) at beginning of first sentence substituted "In a child custody proceeding, each party" for "Each party in a custody proceeding" and near middle after "information" inserted "if reasonably ascertainable" and in second sentence after "affidavit" substituted "must state" for "each party shall further declare under oath"; in (1)(a) near beginning after "other" substituted "proceeding" for "litigation", after "custody of" inserted "or visitation with", after "child" deleted "in this or any other state", and inserted "and, if so, identify the court, the case number of the proceeding, and the date of the child custody determination, if any"; in (1)(b) substituted present language concerning knowledge of other proceedings that could affect a current proceeding for former language that read: "he has information of any custody proceeding concerning the child pending in a court of this or any other state"; in (1)(c) at beginning after "knows" inserted "the name and address", near middle after "claims" substituted "rights of legal custody or physical custody of" for "to have custody", and after "child" inserted "and, if so, the party shall provide the names and addresses of those persons"; inserted (2) providing for a stay of the proceedings until required information is furnished; in (4) near middle substituted "proceeding" for "custody proceeding concerning the child" and at end after "state" substituted "that could affect the current proceeding" for "of which he obtained information during this proceeding"; and made minor changes in style. 40-7-112. Appearance of parties and child.

Commissioners' Note

No major changes have been made to this section which was Section 11 of the UCCJA [see language of this section prior to 1999 amendment]. Language was added to subsection (a) [(1)] to authorize the court to require a non-party who has physical custody of the child to produce the child.

Subsection (c) [(3)] authorizes the court to enter orders providing for the safety of the child and the person ordered to appear with the child. If safety is a major concern, the court, as an alternative to ordering a party to appear with the child, could order and arrange for the party's testimony to be taken in another State under Section 111 [40-7-119]. This alternative might be important when there are safety concerns regarding requiring victims of domestic violence or child abuse to travel to the jurisdiction where the abuser resides.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 91 in (1) substituted language regarding a court ordering a party to appear with or without the child in a custody proceeding for former language that read: "(1) The court may order any party to the proceeding who is in this state to appear personally before the court. If that party has physical custody of the child, the court may order that he appear personally with the child"; in (2) near beginning before "proceeding" inserted "a child custody"; inserted (3) authorizing a court to enter orders necessary for the safety of persons appearing before the court; in (4) near beginning before "proceeding" inserted "a child custody", near middle after "pay" substituted "reasonable and necessary travel and other expenses" for "to the clerk of the court travel and other necessary expenses", and at end after "child" deleted "if this is just and proper under the circumstances"; and made minor changes in style. No Duty of Attorney to Nonclient in Child Custody Case: An attorney must be able to vigorously advocate a client's interests in litigation without being compromised by obligations to nonclients. If an attorney were considered to owe the same duty of care to both a parent and child in an adversarial custody case, neither parent nor child would be served effectively. Because the interests of a parent and those of a child may not be identical, the attorney's duty runs solely to the client except if the conduct rises to the level of deceit or collusion or is intentionally reckless. The language change from "case" to "question" is intended to clarify that it is the jurisdictional issue which must be expedited and not the entire custody case. Whether the entire custody case should be given priority is a matter of local law.

40-7-134. Proceedings governed by other law.

Commissioners' Note

Two proceedings are governed by other acts. Adoption cases are excluded from this Act [chapter] because adoption is a specialized area which is thoroughly covered by the Uniform Adoption Act (UAA) (1994). Most States either will adopt that Act or will adopt the jurisdictional provisions of that Act. Therefore the jurisdictional provisions governing adoption proceeding are generally found elsewhere.

However, there are likely to be a number of instances where it will be necessary to apply this Act [chapter] in an adoption proceeding. For example, if a State adopts the UAA then Section 3-101 of the Act specifically refers in places to the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act which will become a reference to this Act [chapter]. Second, the UAA requires that if an adoption is denied or set aside, the court is to determine the child's custody. UAA § 3-704. Those custody proceedings would be subject to this Act [chapter]. See Joan Heifetz Hollinger, The Uniform Adoption Act: Reporter's Ruminations, 30 Fam.L.Q. 345 (1996).

Children that are the subject of interstate placements for adoption or foster care are governed by the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children (ICPC). The UAA § 2-107 provides that the provisions of the compact, although not jurisdictional, supply the governing rules for all children who are subject to it. As stated in the Comments to that section: "Once a court exercises jurisdiction, the ICPC helps determine the legality of an interstate placement." For a discussion of the relationship between the UCCJA and the ICPC see J.D.S. v. Franks, 893 P.2d 732 (Ariz. 1995).

Proceedings pertaining to the authorization of emergency medical care for children are outside the scope of this Act [chapter] since they are not custody determinations. All States have procedures which allow the State to temporarily supersede parental authority for purposes of emergency medical procedures. Those provisions will govern without regard to this Act [chapter].

Commissioners' Note

This section allows States the discretion to extend the terms of this Act [chapter] to Indian tribes by removing the brackets. The definition of "tribe" is found at Section 102(16) [40-7-103(16)]. This Act [chapter] does not purport to legislate custody jurisdiction for tribal courts. However, a Tribe could adopt this Act [chapter] as enabling legislation by simply replacing references to "this State" with "this Tribe."

Subsection (a) [(1)] is not bracketed. If the Indian Child Welfare Act requires that a case be heard in tribal court, then its provisions determine jurisdiction.

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJA

Indians — Subject Matter Jurisdiction Over Dissolution of Marriage — Different Residences of Parties — Factors to Be Considered — Bertelson Followed: Stacey, an enrolled member of the Fort Peck Tribes, married Shane, a non-Indian. After the marriage ceremony, Stacey returned to the Fort Peck Indian Reservation and Shane went to Forsyth, where his parents lived and where he worked. Some time later, Stacey had a child who also became an enrolled member and lived with Stacey on the Fort Peck Indian Reservation. Still later, Shane filed a dissolution action in a state District Court. The District Court ordered joint custody and ordered that Shane would be the primary residential custodian. Approximately 1 month later, the Fort Peck Tribal Court awarded temporary custody to Stacey. She then filed a motion in District Court under former Rules 12(h) and 60, M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), to dismiss Shane's dissolution action for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The District Court held that it had subject matter jurisdiction over the case and issued a final decree of dissolution. In that decree, the District Court held that the parties' child had significant contacts both off and on the reservation, held that the District Court shared concurrent jurisdiction with the tribal court, and therefore denied Stacey's motion to dismiss. The Supreme Court reviewed its previous holdings regarding tribal jurisdiction and child custody jurisdiction under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act. The Supreme Court also reviewed the purposes of the Indian Child Welfare Act, which, while not strictly applicable to the case before it, cautions that state courts should be careful not to erode the sovereignty of tribes and tribal courts. In reliance upon In re Bertelson, 189 M 524, 617 P2d 121 (1980), the Supreme Court held that the best interests of the child should be determined and followed in deciding whether a state or tribal court has jurisdiction for the purposes of awarding custody but that when an Indian child resides off the reservation, state courts and tribal courts share concurrent jurisdiction. The Supreme Court then held, in further reliance upon Bertelson, that even when jurisdiction is concurrent, it does not mean that states courts should exercise jurisdiction and that in deciding whether to exercise concurrent jurisdiction, the state courts should consider: (1) 40-4-102, 40-4-107, 40-4-211, and 40-7-108; (2) certain policy issues; and (3) the residence of the parties pursuant to 1-1-215. For this reason, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court for a determination of the residence of Stacey and her child, saying that if the District Court determines that both reside on the reservation, the District Court must dismiss the case. However, if the District Court finds that Stacey's child is not a resident of the reservation and that the District Court shares jurisdiction with the tribal court, the District Court must then consider factors from Bertelson, previously discussed by the Supreme Court, to determine whether the District Court or the tribal court is better able to determine the best interests of the child. 40-7-136. International application.

Commissioners' Note

The provisions of this Act [chapter] have international application to child custody proceedings and determinations of other countries. Another country will be treated as if it were a State of the United States for purposes of applying Articles 1 and 2 of this Act [parts 1 and 2 of this chapter]. Custody determinations of other countries will be enforced if the facts of the case indicate that jurisdiction was in substantial compliance with the requirements of this Act [chapter].

In this section, the term "child-custody determination" should be interpreted to include proceedings relating to custody or analogous institutions of the other country. See generally, Article 3 of The Hague Convention on Jurisdiction, Applicable Law, Recognition, Enforcement and Co-operation in Respect of Parental Responsibility and Measures for the Protection of Children. 35 I.L.M. 1391 (1996).

A court of this State may refuse to apply this Act [chapter] when the child custody law of the other country violates basic principles relating to the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms. The same concept is found in of the Section 20 of the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction (return of the child may be refused if this would not be permitted by the fundamental principles of the requested State relating to the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms). In applying subsection (c) [(3)], the court's scrutiny should be on the child custody law of the foreign country and not on other aspects of the other legal system. This Act [chapter] takes no position on what laws relating to child custody would violate fundamental freedoms. While the provision is a traditional one in international agreements, it is invoked only in the most egregious cases.

This section is derived from Section 23 of the UCCJA [former 40-7-124].

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJEA

Removal of Child Across State Lines While Custody Proceedings Pending in Montana — Continuing Jurisdiction Versus Pending Jurisdiction Under Federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act: When the parties were divorced, an Oregon court granted a parenting plan. The mother later moved to Montana, and the Montana District Court properly assumed jurisdiction. The mother then fled with her son to American Samoa. A Samoan court assumed jurisdiction and awarded custody to the mother. The father petitioned the Montana District Court to enforce the earlier parenting plan, and the petition was granted. The mother appealed the Montana court's failure to recognize the jurisdiction of the Samoan court. The Supreme Court applied the provisions of the federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act of 1980 (PKPA), holding that a sister state may modify a child custody determination when the sister state has jurisdiction to make a child custody determination under its own laws, which the Samoan court had, and when the first state no longer has jurisdiction by having lost or given up its continuing or pending jurisdiction. A state has continuing jurisdiction if it has jurisdiction under its own law and it remains the residence of the child or any of the contestants. A state has pending jurisdiction if that state is engaged in proceedings that will ultimately impact the custody and visitation of a child. In this case, Montana did not have continuing jurisdiction because none of the parties were residing in Montana once the mother moved with the child to American Samoa. However, Montana did have pending jurisdiction at the time that the mother initiated the action in American Samoa. The PKPA was designed to prevent precisely what occurred here, namely the removal of a child from one jurisdiction to another in order to obtain a different result regarding custody or other matters affecting a minor child. The mother could not divest Montana of jurisdiction simply by removing the child to American Samoa in an effort to restart the entire issue. Because the Montana court did not decline jurisdiction, the Samoan court was without authority to assume jurisdiction and instead was required to enforce the Montana custody determination. Paslov v. Cox, 2004 MT 325, 324 M 94, 104 P3d 1025 (2004).

40-7-138. Appearance and limited immunity.

Commissioners' Note

This section establishes a general principle that participation in a custody proceeding does not, by itself, give the court jurisdiction over any issue for which personal jurisdiction over the individual is required. The term "participate" should be read broadly. For example, if jurisdiction is proper under Article 2 [part 2], a respondent in an original custody determination, or a party in a modification determination, should be able to request custody without this constituting the seeking of affirmative relief that would waive personal jurisdictional objections. Once jurisdiction is proper under Article 2 [part 2], a party should not be placed in the dilemma of choosing between seeking custody or protecting a right not to be subject to a monetary judgment by a court with no other relationship to the party.

This section is comparable to the immunity provision of UIFSA § 314. A party who is otherwise not subject to personal jurisdiction can appear in a custody proceeding or an enforcement action without being subject to the general jurisdiction of the State by virtue of the appearance. However, if the petitioner would otherwise be subject to the jurisdiction of the State, appearing in a custody proceeding or filing an enforcement proceeding will not provide immunity. Thus, if the non-custodial parent moves from the State that decided the custody determination, that parent is still subject to the state's jurisdiction for enforcement of child support if the child or an individual obligee continues to reside there. See UIFSA § 205. If the non-custodial parent returns to enforce the visitation aspects of the custody determination, the State can utilize any appropriate means to collect the back-due child support. However, the situation is different if both parties move from State A after the determination, with the custodial parent and the child establishing a new home State in State B, and the non-custodial parent moving to State C. The non-custodial parent is not, at this point, subject to the jurisdiction of State B for monetary matters. See Kulko v. Superior Court, 436 U.S. 84 (1978). If the non-custodial parent comes into State B to enforce the visitation aspects of the determination, the non-custodial parent is not subject to the jurisdiction of State B for those proceedings and issues requiring personal jurisdiction by filing the enforcement action.

A party also is immune from service of process during the time in the State for an enforcement action except for those claims for which jurisdiction could be based on contacts other than mere physical presence. Thus, when the non-custodial parent comes into State B to enforce the visitation aspects of the decree, State B cannot acquire jurisdiction over the child support aspects of the decree by serving the non-custodial parent in the State. Cf. UIFSA § 611 (personally serving the obligor in the State of the residence of the obligee is not by itself a sufficient jurisdictional basis to authorize a modification of child support). However, a party who is in this State and subject to the jurisdiction of another State may be served with process to appear in that State, if allowable under the laws of that State.

As the Comments to UIFSA § 314 note, the immunity provided by this section is limited. It does not provide immunity for civil litigation unrelated to the enforcement action. For example, a party to an enforcement action is not immune from service regarding a claim that involves an automobile accident occurring while the party is in the State.

40-7-139. Communication between courts.

Commissioners' Note

This section emphasizes the role of judicial communications. It authorizes a court to communicate concerning any proceeding arising under this Act [chapter]. This includes communication with foreign tribunals and tribal courts. Communication can occur in many different ways such as by telephonic conference and by on-line or other electronic communication. The Act [chapter] does not preclude any method of communication and recognizes that there will be increasing use of modern communication techniques.

Communication between courts is required under Sections 204, 206, and 306 [40-7-107, 40-7-204, and 40-7-306] and strongly suggested in applying Section 207 [40-7-108]. Apart from those sections, there may be less need under this Act [chapter] for courts to communicate concerning jurisdiction due to the prioritization of home state jurisdiction. Communication is authorized, however, whenever the court finds it would be helpful. The court may authorize the parties to participate in the communication. However, the Act [chapter] does not mandate participation. Communication between courts is often difficult to schedule and participation by the parties may be impractical. Phone calls often have to be made after-hours or whenever the schedules of judges allow.

This section does require that a record be made of the conversation and that the parties have access to that record in order to be informed of the content of the conversation. The only exception to this requirement is when the communication involves relatively inconsequential matters such as scheduling, calendars, and court records. Included within this latter type of communication would be matters of cooperation between courts under Section 112 [40-7-140]. A record includes notes or transcripts of a court reporter who listened to a conference call between the courts, an electronic recording of a telephone call, a memorandum or an electronic record of the communication between the courts, or a memorandum or an electronic record made by a court after the communication.

The second sentence of subsection (b) [(2)] protects the parties against unauthorized ex parte communications. The parties' participation in the communication may amount to a hearing if there is an opportunity to present facts and jurisdictional arguments. However, absent such an opportunity, the participation of the parties should not to be considered a substitute for a hearing and the parties must be given an opportunity to fairly and fully present facts and arguments on the jurisdictional issue before a determination is made. This may be done through a hearing or, if appropriate, by affidavit or memorandum. The court is expected to set forth the basis for its jurisdictional decision, including any court-to-court communication which may have been a factor in the decision.

40-7-140. Cooperation between courts — preservation of records.

Commissioners' Note

This section is the heart of judicial cooperation provision of this Act [chapter]. It provides mechanisms for courts to cooperate with each other in order to decide cases in an efficient manner without causing undue expense to the parties. Courts may request assistance from courts of other States and may assist courts of other States.

The provision on the assessment of costs for travel provided in the UCCJA § 19 [former 40-7-120] has been changed. The UCCJA provided that the costs may be assessed against the parties or the State or county. Assessment of costs against a government entity in a case where the government is not involved is inappropriate and therefore that provision has been removed. In addition, if the State is involved as a party, assessment of costs and expenses against the State must be authorized by other law. It should be noted that the term "expenses" means out-of-pocket costs. Overhead costs should not be assessed as expenses.

No other substantive changes have been made. The term "social study" as used in the UCCJA was replaced with the modern term: "custody evaluation." The Act [chapter] does not take a position on the admissibility of a custody evaluation that was conducted in another State. It merely authorizes a court to seek assistance of, or render assistance to, a court of another State.

This section combines the text of Sections 19-22 of the UCCJA [former 40-7-120 through 40-7-123].

40-7-201. Initial child custody jurisdiction.

Commissioners' Note

This section provides mandatory jurisdictional rules for the original child custody proceeding. It generally continues the provisions of the UCCJA § 3 [former 40-7-104]. However, there have been a number of changes to the jurisdictional bases.

1. Home State Jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of the home State has been prioritized over other jurisdictional bases. Section 3 of the UCCJA [former 40-7-104] provided four independent and concurrent bases of jurisdiction. The PKPA provides that full faith and credit can only be given to an initial custody determination of a "significant connection" State when there is no home State. This Act [chapter] prioritizes home state jurisdiction in the same manner as the PKPA thereby eliminating any potential conflict between the two acts.

The six-month extended home state provision of subsection (a)(1) [(1)(a)] has been modified slightly from the UCCJA. The UCCJA provided that home state jurisdiction continued for six months when the child had been removed by a person seeking the child's custody or for other reasons and a parent or a person acting as a parent continues to reside in the home State. Under this Act [chapter], it is no longer necessary to determine why the child has been removed. The only inquiry relates to the status of the person left behind. This change provides a slightly more refined home state standard than the UCCJA or the PKPA, which also requires a determination that the child has been removed "by a contestant or for other reasons." The scope of the PKPA's provision is theoretically narrower than this Act [chapter]. However, the phrase "or for other reasons" covers most fact situations where the child is not in the home State and, therefore, the difference has no substantive effect.

In another sense, the six-month extended home state jurisdiction provision is this Act [chapter] is narrower than the comparable provision in the PKPA. The PKPA's definition of extended home State is more expansive because it applies whenever a "contestant" remains in the home State. That class of individuals has been eliminated in this Act [chapter]. This Act [chapter] retains the original UCCJA classification of "parent or person acting as parent" to define who must remain for a State to exercise the six-month extended home state jurisdiction. This eliminates the undesirable jurisdictional determinations which would occur as a result of differing state substantive laws on visitation involving grandparents and others. For example, if State A's law provided that grandparents could obtain visitation with a child after the death of one of the parents, then the grandparents, who would be considered "contestants" under the PKPA, could file a proceeding within six months after the remaining parent moved and have the case heard in State A. However, if State A did not provide that grandparents could seek visitation under such circumstances, the grandparents would not be considered "contestants" and State B where the child acquired a new home State would provide the only forum. This Act [chapter] bases jurisdiction on the parent and child or person acting as a parent and child relationship without regard to grandparents or other potential seekers of custody or visitation. There is no conflict with the broader provision of the PKPA. The PKPA in § (c)(1) authorizes States to narrow the scope of their jurisdiction.

2. Significant connection jurisdiction. This jurisdictional basis has been amended in four particulars from the UCCJA. First, the "best interest" language of the UCCJA has been eliminated. This phrase tended to create confusion between the jurisdictional issue and the substantive custody determination. Since the language was not necessary for the jurisdictional issue, it has been removed.

Second, the UCCJA based jurisdiction on the presence of a significant connection between the child and the child's parents or the child and at least one contestant. This Act [chapter] requires that the significant connections be between the child, the child's parents or the child and a person acting as a parent.

Third, a significant connection State may assume jurisdiction only when there is no home State or when the home State decides that the significant connection State would be a more appropriate forum under Section 207 or 208 [40-7-108 or 40-7-109]. Fourth, the determination of significant connections has been changed to eliminate the language of "present or future care." The jurisdictional determination should be made by determining whether there is sufficient evidence in the State for the court to make an informed custody determination. That evidence might relate to the past as well as to the "present or future."

Emergency jurisdiction has been moved to a separate section. This is to make it clear that the power to protect a child in crisis does not include the power to enter a permanent order for that child except as provided by that section.

Paragraph (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)] provides for jurisdiction when all States with jurisdiction under paragraphs (a)(1) and (2) [subsections (1)(a) and (1)(b)] determine that this State is a more appropriate forum. The determination would have to be made by all States with jurisdiction under subsection (a)(1) and (2) [subsections (1)(a) and (2)]. Jurisdiction would not exist under this paragraph because the home State determined it is a more appropriate place to hear the case if there is another State that could exercise significant connection jurisdiction under subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)].

Paragraph (a)(4) [subsection (1)(d)] retains the concept of jurisdiction by necessity as found in the UCCJA and in the PKPA. This default jurisdiction only occurs if no other State would have jurisdiction under subsections (a)(1) through (a)(3) [(1)(a) through (1)(c)].

Subsections (b) and (c) [(2) and (3)] clearly State the relationship between jurisdiction under this Act [chapter] and other forms of jurisdiction. Personal jurisdiction over, or the physical presence of, a parent or the child is neither necessary nor required under this Act [chapter]. In other words neither minimum contacts nor service within the State is required for the court to have jurisdiction to make a custody determination. Further, the presence of minimum contacts or service within the State does not confer jurisdiction to make a custody determination. Subject to Section 204 [40-7-204], satisfaction of the requirements of subsection (a) [(1)] is mandatory.

The requirements of this section, plus the notice and hearing provisions of the Act [chapter], are all that is necessary to satisfy due process. This Act [chapter], like the UCCJA and the PKPA is based on Justice Frankfurter's concurrence in May v. Anderson, 345 U.S. 528 (1953). As pointed out by Professor Bodenheimer, the reporter for the UCCJA, no "workable interstate custody law could be built around [Justice] Burton's plurality opinion...". Bridgette Bodenheimer, The Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act: A Legislative Remedy for Children Caught in the Conflict of Laws, 22 Vand.L.Rev. 1207,1233 (1969). It should also be noted that since jurisdiction to make a child custody determination is subject matter jurisdiction, an agreement of the parties to confer jurisdiction on a court that would not otherwise have jurisdiction under this Act [chapter] is ineffective.

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJEA

Montana Home State Despite Several-Month Absence of Child From State: The father appealed the District Court's conclusion that it had jurisdiction over a child custody proceeding filed by the mother in Montana. The child had been born in Montana in 2013 and had resided in Montana until the mother moved to Minnesota in late 2015 to live with the father during a temporary reconciliation. At the end of 8 to 9 months in Minnesota, the mother returned to Montana with the child. Shortly thereafter, the mother agreed to let the child vacation with the father's parents and visit the father with the expectation the child would be returned to Montana shortly. After the father told the mother he was not returning the child to her, the mother filed a petition for a parenting plan in Montana. Over the father's objection, the District Court ruled that Montana was the child's home state and, therefore, it had jurisdiction over the matter. The father appealed to the Supreme Court, which affirmed the ruling, finding that the totality of circumstances supported jurisdiction in the state. In re Parenting of B.K., 2018 MT 217, 392 Mont. 426, 425 P.3d 703.

Short Amount of Time Spent in Montana Not Enough for Jurisdiction — Meaning of Home State Under UCCJEA — Legislative Intent Analyzed — Totality of Circumstances Approach Adopted: A child moved to Montana with both of his parents toward the end of September 2013, but the mother and the child departed to Canada in October 2013. The child never returned. In February 2014, the mother traveled to Montana to retrieve her and her son's belongings and returned to Canada without the father's knowledge. In May 2014, the father sought resolution of parenting and custody in Montana, but the District Court determined that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction on the grounds that Montana was not the home state of the child. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed after determining that the Legislature's intent in adopting the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA) was to create a bright-line rule. Using a totality of the circumstances approach, the court concluded that an absence is not temporary if the character of the absence would make it unreasonable to assume a child would integrate into a community of Montana during the portions of the 6-month period when the child is not absent from the state. Consequently, the child did not live in Montana for the timeframe required by 40-7-201. In re Marriage of Sampley, 2015 MT 121, 379 Mont. 131, 347 P.3d 1281.

Misinterpretation of Statute — Jurisdiction Determined by Residence of Child 6 Months Before Initial Pleading: A mother took her child from Montana on April 24, 2006, after the child had resided in Montana for about 4 years, and filed for a dissolution of her marriage and a custody determination in Texas on May 26, 2006. The child's father filed a petition for dissolution in Montana on October 2, 2006, resulting in a default judgment and parenting plan that the mother later moved to set aside, which the District Court did. The Supreme Court held that the District Court misinterpreted 40-7-201 as providing that a child's home state is the state in which the child has resided for "the last" 6 months and erred when it set aside the parenting plan in favor of the action filed in Texas; the Supreme Court clarified that the home state for purposes of jurisdiction is the child's home state within 6 months before commencement of the proceeding. The Texas court could not have had jurisdiction over the child for more than a few weeks, and the District Court's interpretation did not further the purpose of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act to prevent kidnapping of a child by a parent. In re Marriage of Myrland, 2010 MT 286, 359 Mont. 1, 248 P.3d 290.

Retention of Parenting Plan Proceedings by State Making Initial Custody Determination: The state of Idaho dissolved the parties' marriage and granted residential custody of the parties' child to the mother, who subsequently moved to Montana. The mother later petitioned a Montana District Court to change jurisdiction of the parties' child custody proceedings to Montana and to modify the parenting plan. The Montana court denied the petition, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Except in cases involving temporary emergency jurisdiction, a Montana court may not modify a foreign court's child custody jurisdiction unless the Montana court has jurisdiction to make an initial child custody determination and either: (1) the court in the other state determines that it no longer has exclusive continuing jurisdiction or that Montana would be a more convenient forum; or (2) either court determines that all parties and the child no longer reside in the other state. In this case no emergency existed, and neither of the two conditions for modification of a parenting plan by a Montana court existed. The Idaho court did not relinquish jurisdiction, and the father continued to live in Idaho. Thus, the Idaho court that issued the existing parenting plan retained exclusive continuing jurisdiction. Koeplin v. Crandall, 2010 MT 70, 355 Mont. 510, 230 P.3d 797.

Analysis of Child's Home State for Purposes of Determining Jurisdiction: A child's home state, for purposes of determining jurisdiction under this section, is not limited to the time period of 6 months immediately before the commencement of a child custody proceeding. The applicable time period should be within 6 months before commencement of a child custody proceeding. In the present case, the mother moved the children back to Arkansas 4 months after moving to Montana, thereby stopping the clock for the time needed to establish Montana as the home state for jurisdictional purposes. The children had not lived in Montana for at least 6 months before the father began child custody proceedings, so Montana could not acquire home state status. Stephens v. District Court, 2006 MT 21, 331 M 40, 128 P3d 1026 (2006).

Removal of Child Across State Lines While Custody Proceedings Pending in Montana — Continuing Jurisdiction Versus Pending Jurisdiction Under Federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act: When the parties were divorced, an Oregon court granted a parenting plan. The mother later moved to Montana, and the Montana District Court properly assumed jurisdiction. The mother then fled with her son to American Samoa. A Samoan court assumed jurisdiction and awarded custody to the mother. The father petitioned the Montana District Court to enforce the earlier parenting plan, and the petition was granted. The mother appealed the Montana court's failure to recognize the jurisdiction of the Samoan court. The Supreme Court applied the provisions of the federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act of 1980 (PKPA), holding that a sister state may modify a child custody determination when the sister state has jurisdiction to make a child custody determination under its own laws, which the Samoan court had, and when the first state no longer has jurisdiction by having lost or given up its continuing or pending jurisdiction. A state has continuing jurisdiction if it has jurisdiction under its own law and it remains the residence of the child or any of the contestants. A state has pending jurisdiction if that state is engaged in proceedings that will ultimately impact the custody and visitation of a child. In this case, Montana did not have continuing jurisdiction because none of the parties were residing in Montana once the mother moved with the child to American Samoa. However, Montana did have pending jurisdiction at the time that the mother initiated the action in American Samoa. The PKPA was designed to prevent precisely what occurred here, namely the removal of a child from one jurisdiction to another in order to obtain a different result regarding custody or other matters affecting a minor child. The mother could not divest Montana of jurisdiction simply by removing the child to American Samoa in an effort to restart the entire issue. Because the Montana court did not decline jurisdiction, the Samoan court was without authority to assume jurisdiction and instead was required to enforce the Montana custody determination. Paslov v. Cox, 2004 MT 325, 324 M 94, 104 P3d 1025 (2004).

Determination of Inconvenient Forum — Consideration of Statutory Factors Required: The District Court determined, based on the best interests of the child standard in the 1977 Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (UCCJA), that Montana was not a convenient forum for a child custody proceeding. The Supreme Court noted that the proper standard under the 1999 Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, which replaced the UCCJA, is whether Montana is the child's home state, in which case Montana has continuing jurisdiction unless a Montana court determines that this state is an inconvenient forum and another state is a more appropriate forum. To determine whether Montana is an inconvenient forum, the Montana court must apply the factors in 40-7-108(2). Thus, the District Court erred by applying the old UCCJA standard, and the Supreme Court reversed for a hearing under present law to address the factors in 40-7-108(2) regarding jurisdiction. In re Custody of N.G.H., 2004 MT 162, 322 M 20, 92 P3d 1215 (2004), following In re Marriage of Fontenot, 2003 MT 242, 317 M 298, 77 P3d 206 (2003).

Error in Montana Court's Declination of Jurisdiction to Washington Court — Inconvenient Forum: Following several incidents of partner abuse over the years, the mother moved to Washington state and then requested that the Montana court decline jurisdiction as an inconvenient forum in order to allow the Washington court to assume jurisdiction. The request was denied, and the mother appealed. Under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, a Montana court has jurisdiction to make child custody determinations if Montana is the child's home state, as defined in 40-7-103, and Montana will continue to have exclusive continuing jurisdiction unless the Montana court declines to exercise its jurisdiction. In this case, the parties conceded that Montana was the home state. Jurisdiction may be declined at any time if the Montana court determines that it is an inconvenient forum and that a court of another state is a more appropriate forum to make custody determinations. The factors in 40-7-108 must be considered when evaluating a motion to decline jurisdiction, and the Act places domestic violence at the top of the list of factors to be considered. Although this factor alone is not dispositive, the Supreme Court held that, given the high propensity for recidivism in domestic violence, when a court finds that partner abuse or child abuse has occurred or that a party has fled Montana to avoid further violence or abuse, the court is authorized to consider whether the party and the child might be better protected if further custody proceedings are held in another state. Here, the District Court abused its discretion by failing to consider which forum would best protect the mother and children. The Supreme Court then went on to discuss the other statutory factors and concluded that the protection of the parties, the years that the children have resided in Washington, the significant distance between the courts, the parties' disparate financial circumstances, the location of evidence and convenience of witnesses, and the familiarity factors all supported the Montana court declining jurisdiction. None of the jurisdictional factors mitigated against declination, and no factor outweighed the concern for safety raised by the history of domestic violence. Thus, the Supreme Court ordered the District Court to decline jurisdiction as an inconvenient forum and arrange to transfer the case to Washington. In re Marriage of Stoneman v. Drollinger, 2003 MT 25, 314 M 139, 64 P3d 997 (2003).

Following remand, the District Court held that the issue of child support should be transferred to Washington state in conjunction with the custody and parenting issues. Nevertheless, the wife filed a cross-appeal in 2007 arguing that under 40-5-149 (renumbered 40-5-1012), Montana retained jurisdiction over the child support issue. However, the Supreme Court dismissed the claim as untimely. Under Rule 4, M.R.App.P. (Title 25, ch. 21), notice of appeal must be filed within 30 days of judgment or order, but the wife's notice of cross-appeal was filed more than 11 months after the District Court's order that finally settled the matter. In re Marriage of Stoneman & Drollinger, 2008 MT 448, 348 M 17, 199 P3d 232 (2008).

Jurisdictional Requirement Over Dissolution Proceeding Satisfied by Party's Residence — Inconvenient Forum Improperly Applied Absent Opportunity to Respond to Motion: After several years of a difficult relationship, the husband was charged with partner or family member assault and the wife moved to Oregon with the four children. An Oregon court determined that it had temporary emergency jurisdiction over the children, issued a restraining order against the husband, and granted residential custody to the wife. The husband subsequently filed for dissolution and a parenting plan in Montana. The District Court ordered the wife to show cause why the parenting plan should not be adopted. The wife moved to vacate the hearing, claiming that the Montana court did not have jurisdiction and that it was an inconvenient forum. The District Court vacated the show cause hearing without allowing the husband to respond to the motion and dismissed the dissolution petition without explanation. The husband appealed and the Supreme Court reversed. Oregon's exercise of temporary emergency jurisdiction over the children did not automatically divest Montana of jurisdiction over the same parenting issues. Neither party had initiated dissolution proceedings at the time that the husband's petition was filed, so no concurrent jurisdiction issue existed regarding dissolution. Because the husband resided in Montana for 90 days prior to filing the petition, the jurisdiction requirements of 40-4-104 were satisfied. However, jurisdiction over a dissolution of marriage does not necessarily confer jurisdiction over related child custody issues. Once the Montana court was notified of the child custody proceedings in Oregon, the Montana court was obligated by 40-7-204 to contact the Oregon court regarding potential jurisdictional conflicts, but that was not done, so the Montana court's decision to decline to address the parenting issues in the husband's petition because the Oregon court had already exercised jurisdiction was reversed. Further, the inconvenient forum argument was also inappropriate because the husband was not given the opportunity to submit arguments on the issue as required under 40-7-108. In re Marriage of Vanlaarhoven, 2002 MT 222, 311 M 368, 55 P3d 942 (2002).

40-7-202. Exclusive, continuing jurisdiction.

Commissioners' Note

This is a new section addressing continuing jurisdiction. Continuing jurisdiction was not specifically addressed in the UCCJA. Its absence caused considerable confusion, particularly because the PKPA, § 1738(d), requires other States to give Full Faith and Credit to custody determinations made by the original decree State pursuant to the decree State's continuing jurisdiction so long as that State has jurisdiction under its own law and remains the residence of the child or any contestant.

This section provides the rules of continuing jurisdiction and borrows from UIFSA as well as recent UCCJA case law. The continuing jurisdiction of the original decree State is exclusive. It continues until one of two events occurs:

1. If a parent or a person acting as a parent remains in the original decree State, continuing jurisdiction is lost when neither the child, the child and a parent, nor the child and a person acting as a parent continue to have a significant connection with the original decree State and there is no longer substantial evidence concerning the child's care, protection, training and personal relations in that State. In other words, even if the child has acquired a new home State, the original decree State retains exclusive, continuing jurisdiction, so long as the general requisites of the "substantial connection" jurisdiction provisions of Section 201 [40-7-201] are met. If the relationship between the child and the person remaining in the State with exclusive, continuing jurisdiction becomes so attenuated that the court could no longer find significant connections and substantial evidence, jurisdiction would no longer exist.

The use of the phrase "a court of this State" under subsection (a)(1) [(1)(a)] makes it clear that the original decree State is the sole determinant of whether jurisdiction continues. A party seeking to modify a custody determination must obtain an order from the original decree State stating that it no longer has jurisdiction.

2. Continuing jurisdiction is lost when the child, the child's parents, and any person acting as a parent no longer reside in the original decree State. The exact language of subparagraph (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)] was the subject of considerable debate. Ultimately the Conference settled on the phrase that "a court of this State or a court of another State determines that the child, the child's parents, and any person acting as a parent do not presently reside in this State" to determine when the exclusive, continuing jurisdiction of a State ended. The phrase is meant to be identical in meaning to the language of the PKPA which provides that full faith and credit is to be given to custody determinations made by a State in the exercise of its continuing jurisdiction when that "State remains the residence of...". The phrase is also the equivalent of the language "continues to reside" which occurs in UIFSA § 205(a)(1) to determine the exclusive, continuing jurisdiction of the State that made a support order. The phrase "remains the residence of" in the PKPA has been the subject of conflicting case law. It is the intention of this Act [chapter] that paragraph (a)(2) of this section [subsection (1)(b)] means that the named persons no longer continue to actually live within the State. Thus, unless a modification proceeding has been commenced, when the child, the parents, and all persons acting as parents physically leave the State to live elsewhere, the exclusive, continuing jurisdiction ceases.

The phrase "do not presently reside" is not used in the sense of a technical domicile. The fact that the original determination State still considers one parent a domiciliary does not prevent it from losing exclusive, continuing jurisdiction after the child, the parents, and all persons acting as parents have moved from the State.

If the child, the parents, and all persons acting as parents have all left the State which made the custody determination prior to the commencement of the modification proceeding, considerations of waste of resources dictate that a court in State B, as well as a court in State A, can decide that State A has lost exclusive, continuing jurisdiction.

The continuing jurisdiction provisions of this section are narrower than the comparable provisions of the PKPA. That statute authorizes continuing jurisdiction so long as any "contestant" remains in the original decree State and that State continues to have jurisdiction under its own law. This Act [chapter] eliminates the contestant classification. The Conference decided that a remaining grandparent or other third party who claims a right to visitation, should not suffice to confer exclusive, continuing jurisdiction on the State that made the original custody determination after the departure of the child, the parents and any person acting as a parent. The significant connection to the original decree State must relate to the child, the child and a parent, or the child and a person acting as a parent. This revision does not present a conflict with the PKPA. The PKPA's reference in § 1738(d) to § 1738(c)(1) recognizes that States may narrow the class of cases that would be subject to exclusive, continuing jurisdiction. However, during the transition from the UCCJA to this Act [chapter], some States may continue to base continuing jurisdiction on the continued presence of a contestant, such as a grandparent. The PKPA will require that such decisions be enforced. The problem will disappear as States adopt this Act [chapter] to replace the UCCJA.

Jurisdiction attaches at the commencement of a proceeding. If State A had jurisdiction under this section at the time a modification proceeding was commenced there, it would not be lost by all parties moving out of the State prior to the conclusion of proceeding. State B would not have jurisdiction to hear a modification unless State A decided that State B was more appropriate under Section 207 [40-7-108].

Exclusive, continuing jurisdiction is not reestablished if, after the child, the parents, and all persons acting as parents leave the State, the non- custodial parent returns. As subsection (b) [(3)] provides, once a State has lost exclusive, continuing jurisdiction, it can modify its own determination only if it has jurisdiction under the standards of Section 201 [40-7-201]. If another State acquires exclusive continuing jurisdiction under this section, then its orders cannot be modified even if this State has once again become the home State of the child.

In accordance with the majority of UCCJA case law, the State with exclusive, continuing jurisdiction may relinquish jurisdiction when it determines that another State would be a more convenient forum under the principles of Section 207 [40-7-108].

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJEA

State Subject Matter Jurisdiction Relationship to Tribal Court Jurisdiction — No Abuse of Discretion for District Court Amendment of Parenting Plan — Mother Failed to Establish Definite Fixed Residence on Reservation — Proper Exercise of Jurisdiction Despite Allegation of Inconvenient Forum — Concurrent State Jurisdiction Proper. In re Parenting of L.D.C., 2022 MT 161, 409 Mont. 439, 516 P.3d 631.

Jurisdiction Over Termination of Parental Rights Proper: A mother appealed the termination of her parental rights, arguing that the District Court erred in not staying the proceedings because once the mother left Montana for Utah and the child was placed with a Utah foster family, Montana was an inconvenient forum and no longer held exclusive and continuing jurisdiction over the proceedings. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that Montana was not an inconvenient forum under 40-7-108 because the evidence required for the proceeding was not located in Utah and did not require any evidence from Utah and that because there was not an ongoing proceeding in Utah, the District Court did not err in refusing to relinquish jurisdiction under the continuing jurisdiction provision of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, 40-7-202, which requires a pending proceeding in another state. In addition, absent any pending Utah proceeding, Article V of the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children, codified at 41-4-101, dictated that Montana retain jurisdiction after the child was placed in Utah in order to adjudicate the proceeding. In re A.R.B., 2013 MT 310, 372 Mont. 274, 312 P.3d 425.

Parties No Longer Resident in Montana — Relinquishment of Montana Jurisdiction Proper: In 2000, a Montana District Court established child custody with the father, who lived in California, and held that the mother, a Montana resident, was not to have contact with the children until she addressed her psychological disorders. The father subsequently registered the Montana decision with the California courts to allow enforcement of the Montana decision in California, if necessary, and the mother moved to Minnesota. In 2007, the mother petitioned the Montana court to relinquish jurisdiction because none of the parties lived in Montana, but the court decided to retain jurisdiction and denied the petition, so the mother appealed. The father cited 41-3-103 in support of his contention that the Montana court retained jurisdiction because the case was a child abuse and neglect proceeding. However, Montana later adopted the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA), which applies to and provides greater protections in child abuse and neglect proceedings, so the provisions of 40-7-103 prevail over 41-3-103. Under 40-7-202 of the UCCJEA, a Montana District Court retains exclusive, continuing jurisdiction of child custody proceedings until one of two specific events occurs, the second of which is a determination that none of the relevant parties presently reside in Montana. Thus, it was an abuse of discretion for the District Court to fail to make a determination whether the relevant parties lived in Montana. The Supreme Court reversed with instructions to relinquish jurisdiction over the Montana custody order. In re B.P. & A.P., 2008 MT 166, 343 M 345, 184 P3d 334 (2008).

Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act Not to Govern Statutory Grandparent-Grandchild Contact Proceedings: The Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA) is directed toward parties acting as parents and contains no directive that applies its jurisdictional provisions to grandparent-grandchild contact proceedings conducted under Title 40, ch. 9., nor does Title 40, ch. 9., include any textual indication that grandparent-grandchild contact proceedings are subject to the procedural or jurisdictional requirements of the UCCJEA. Therefore, the provisions of Title 40, ch. 7, do not govern jurisdictional matters relating to grandparent-grandchild contact proceedings conducted under Title 40, ch. 9. In re Grandparent-Grandchild Contact of Stewart v. Evans, 2006 MT 102, 332 M 148, 136 P3d 524 (2006).

Assumption of Child Custody and Parenting Case by Court of Another State Proper — Neither Parent Living in Montana When Proceeding Commenced: A child was born to the parties in Montana, and a parenting plan was adopted in Montana. However, when the father sought to enforce the plan, the mother was living in Pennsylvania and the father was living in Washington. The Pennsylvania court concluded that it had jurisdiction. The Montana court disagreed, but ceded temporary emergency jurisdiction to the Pennsylvania court while refusing to cede jurisdiction. The mother appealed. The Supreme Court concluded that because this section allows either a Montana court or a court of another state to determine that neither parents nor the child reside in the original state, the Pennsylvania court had jurisdiction to make that determination. Once that determination was made, on the basis of ample, credible, and essentially undisputed evidence, the Montana court no longer had exclusive continuing jurisdiction, and the Montana court therefore erred in retaining jurisdiction. In re Parenting of A.B.A.M., 2004 MT 222, 322 M 406, 96 P3d 1139 (2004). See also Vannatta v. Boulds, 2003 MT 343, 318 M 472, 81 P3d 480 (2003).

Determination of Inconvenient Forum — Consideration of Statutory Factors Required: The District Court determined, based on the best interests of the child standard in the 1977 Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act (UCCJA), that Montana was not a convenient forum for a child custody proceeding. The Supreme Court noted that the proper standard under the 1999 Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, which replaced the UCCJA, is whether Montana is the child's home state, in which case Montana has continuing jurisdiction unless a Montana court determines that this state is an inconvenient forum and another state is a more appropriate forum. To determine whether Montana is an inconvenient forum, the Montana court must apply the factors in 40-7-108(2). Thus, the District Court erred by applying the old UCCJA standard, and the Supreme Court reversed for a hearing under present law to address the factors in 40-7-108(2) regarding jurisdiction. In re Custody of N.G.H., 2004 MT 162, 322 M 20, 92 P3d 1215 (2004), following In re Marriage of Fontenot, 2003 MT 242, 317 M 298, 77 P3d 206 (2003).

Error in Montana Court's Declination of Jurisdiction to Washington Court — Inconvenient Forum: Following several incidents of partner abuse over the years, the mother moved to Washington state and then requested that the Montana court decline jurisdiction as an inconvenient forum in order to allow the Washington court to assume jurisdiction. The request was denied, and the mother appealed. Under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, a Montana court has jurisdiction to make child custody determinations if Montana is the child's home state, as defined in 40-7-103, and Montana will continue to have exclusive continuing jurisdiction unless the Montana court declines to exercise its jurisdiction. In this case, the parties conceded that Montana was the home state. Jurisdiction may be declined at any time if the Montana court determines that it is an inconvenient forum and that a court of another state is a more appropriate forum to make custody determinations. The factors in 40-7-108 must be considered when evaluating a motion to decline jurisdiction, and the Act places domestic violence at the top of the list of factors to be considered. Although this factor alone is not dispositive, the Supreme Court held that, given the high propensity for recidivism in domestic violence, when a court finds that partner abuse or child abuse has occurred or that a party has fled Montana to avoid further violence or abuse, the court is authorized to consider whether the party and the child might be better protected if further custody proceedings are held in another state. Here, the District Court abused its discretion by failing to consider which forum would best protect the mother and children. The Supreme Court then went on to discuss the other statutory factors and concluded that the protection of the parties, the years that the children have resided in Washington, the significant distance between the courts, the parties' disparate financial circumstances, the location of evidence and convenience of witnesses, and the familiarity factors all supported the Montana court declining jurisdiction. None of the jurisdictional factors mitigated against declination, and no factor outweighed the concern for safety raised by the history of domestic violence. Thus, the Supreme Court ordered the District Court to decline jurisdiction as an inconvenient forum and arrange to transfer the case to Washington. In re Marriage of Stoneman v. Drollinger, 2003 MT 25, 314 M 139, 64 P3d 997 (2003).

Following remand, the District Court held that the issue of child support should be transferred to Washington state in conjunction with the custody and parenting issues. Nevertheless, the wife filed a cross-appeal in 2007 arguing that under 40-5-149 (renumbered 40-5-1012), Montana retained jurisdiction over the child support issue. However, the Supreme Court dismissed the claim as untimely. Under Rule 4, M.R.App.P., notice of appeal must be filed within 30 days of judgment or order, but the wife's notice of cross-appeal was filed more than 11 months after the District Court's order that finally settled the matter. In re Marriage of Stoneman & Drollinger, 2008 MT 448, 348 M 17, 199 P3d 232 (2008).

40-7-203. Jurisdiction to modify determination.

Commissioners' Note

This section complements Section 202 [40-7-202] and is addressed to the court that is confronted with a proceeding to modify a custody determination of another State. It prohibits a court from modifying a custody determination made consistently with this Act [chapter] by a court in another State unless a court of that State determines that it no longer has exclusive, continuing jurisdiction under Section 202 [40-7-202] or that this State would be a more convenient forum under Section 207 [40-7-108]. The modification State is not authorized to determine that the original decree State has lost its jurisdiction. The only exception is when the child, the child's parents, and any person acting as a parent do not presently reside in the other State. In other words, a court of the modification State can determine that all parties have moved away from the original State. The court of the modification State must have jurisdiction under the standards of Section 201 [40-7-201].

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJEA

Retention of Parenting Plan Proceedings by State Making Initial Custody Determination: The state of Idaho dissolved the parties' marriage and granted residential custody of the parties' child to the mother, who subsequently moved to Montana. The mother later petitioned a Montana District Court to change jurisdiction of the parties' child custody proceedings to Montana and to modify the parenting plan. The Montana court denied the petition, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Except in cases involving temporary emergency jurisdiction, a Montana court may not modify a foreign court's child custody jurisdiction unless the Montana court has jurisdiction to make an initial child custody determination and either: (1) the court in the other state determines that it no longer has exclusive continuing jurisdiction or that Montana would be a more convenient forum; or (2) either court determines that all parties and the child no longer reside in the other state. In this case no emergency existed, and neither of the two conditions for modification of a parenting plan by a Montana court existed. The Idaho court did not relinquish jurisdiction, and the father continued to live in Idaho. Thus, the Idaho court that issued the existing parenting plan retained exclusive continuing jurisdiction. Koeplin v. Crandall, 2010 MT 70, 355 Mont. 510, 230 P.3d 797.

Removal of Child Across State Lines While Custody Proceedings Pending in Montana — Continuing Jurisdiction Versus Pending Jurisdiction Under Federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act: When the parties were divorced, an Oregon court granted a parenting plan. The mother later moved to Montana, and the Montana District Court properly assumed jurisdiction. The mother then fled with her son to American Samoa. A Samoan court assumed jurisdiction and awarded custody to the mother. The father petitioned the Montana District Court to enforce the earlier parenting plan, and the petition was granted. The mother appealed the Montana court's failure to recognize the jurisdiction of the Samoan court. The Supreme Court applied the provisions of the federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act of 1980 (PKPA), holding that a sister state may modify a child custody determination when the sister state has jurisdiction to make a child custody determination under its own laws, which the Samoan court had, and when the first state no longer has jurisdiction by having lost or given up its continuing or pending jurisdiction. A state has continuing jurisdiction if it has jurisdiction under its own law and it remains the residence of the child or any of the contestants. A state has pending jurisdiction if that state is engaged in proceedings that will ultimately impact the custody and visitation of a child. In this case, Montana did not have continuing jurisdiction because none of the parties were residing in Montana once the mother moved with the child to American Samoa. However, Montana did have pending jurisdiction at the time that the mother initiated the action in American Samoa. The PKPA was designed to prevent precisely what occurred here, namely the removal of a child from one jurisdiction to another in order to obtain a different result regarding custody or other matters affecting a minor child. The mother could not divest Montana of jurisdiction simply by removing the child to American Samoa in an effort to restart the entire issue. Because the Montana court did not decline jurisdiction, the Samoan court was without authority to assume jurisdiction and instead was required to enforce the Montana custody determination. Paslov v. Cox, 2004 MT 325, 324 M 94, 104 P3d 1025 (2004).

Continuing Custody Jurisdiction in North Dakota Court — Modification by Montana Court Improper: When the parties were divorced in North Dakota, that state properly exercised jurisdiction in entering divorce and custody decrees. A Montana District Court subsequently modified the custody decree. The Supreme Court reversed. Under the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act and the Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act of 1980 (PKPA), full faith and credit must ordinarily be given to child custody determinations made by another state's court if that court appropriately exercised jurisdiction under PKPA standards. Further, under Thompson v. Thompson, 484 US 174 (1988), once a state exercises appropriate PKPA jurisdiction, no other state may exercise concurrent jurisdiction even if it would have been empowered to exercise original jurisdiction. Absent a determination by the North Dakota court that it no longer had exclusive and continuing jurisdiction or that a Montana court would be a more convenient forum, the Montana court had no jurisdiction to modify the North Dakota decree. Vannatta v. Boulds, 2003 MT 343, 318 M 472, 81 P3d 480 (2003), following In re Marriage of Shupe, 276 M 409, 916 P2d 744 (1996).

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJA

Concurrent State Jurisdiction Under UCCJA Determined by PKPA: Pamela Shupe obtained a divorce decree from Utah granting her sole custody of the couple's child. The father, Yancy, petitioned for a change of custody in Montana. The Supreme Court determined that each state had adopted the UCCJA and therefore each state had jurisdiction to make a custody determination. The Supreme Court stated that the PKPA had been enacted to remedy problems of concurrent state jurisdiction under the UCCJA. The Supreme Court held that because Utah had jurisdiction and had not declined to exercise its jurisdiction, then under the PKPA, Montana was not authorized to modify the original custody determination of Utah. In re Marriage of Shupe, 276 M 409, 916 P2d 744, 53 St. Rep. 447 (1996), followed in Vannatta v. Boulds, 2003 MT 343, 318 M 472, 81 P3d 480 (2003).

40-7-204. Temporary emergency jurisdiction.

Commissioners' Note

The provisions of this section are an elaboration of what was formerly Section 3(a)(3) of the UCCJA [see former 40-7-104]. It remains, as Professor Bodenheimer's comments to that section noted, "an extraordinary jurisdiction reserved for extraordinary circumstances."

This section codifies and clarifies several aspects of what has become common practice in emergency jurisdiction cases under the UCCJA and PKPA. First, a court may take jurisdiction to protect the child even though it can claim neither home State nor significant connection jurisdiction. Second, the duties of States to recognize, enforce and not modify a custody determination of another State do not take precedence over the need to enter a temporary emergency order to protect the child.

Third, a custody determination made under the emergency jurisdiction provisions of this section is a temporary order. The purpose of the order is to protect the child until the State that has jurisdiction under Sections 201-203 [40-7-201 through 40-7-203] enters an order.

Under certain circumstances, however, subsection (b) [(2)] provides that an emergency custody determination may become a final custody determination. If there is no existing custody determination, and no custody proceeding is filed in a State with jurisdiction under Sections 201-203 [40-7-201 through 40-7-203], an emergency custody determination made under this section becomes a final determination, if it so provides, when the State that issues the order becomes the home State of the child.

Subsection (c) [(3)] is concerned with the temporary nature of the order when there exists a prior custody order that is entitled to be enforced under this Act [chapter] or when a subsequent custody proceeding is filed in a State with jurisdiction under Sections 201-203 [40-7-201 through 40-7-203]. Subsection (c) [(3)] allows the temporary order to remain in effect only so long as is necessary for the person who obtained the determination under this section to present a case and obtain an order from the State with jurisdiction under Sections 201-203 [40-7-201 through 40-7-203]. That time period must be specified in the order. If there is an existing order by a State with jurisdiction under Sections 201-203 [40-7-201 through 40-7-203], that order need not be reconfirmed. The temporary emergency determination would lapse by its own terms at the end of the specified period or when an order is obtained from the court with jurisdiction under Sections 202-203 [40-7-202 and 40-7-203]. The court with appropriate jurisdiction also may decide, under the provisions of 207 [40-7-108], that the court that entered the emergency order is in a better position to address the safety of the person who obtained the emergency order, or the child, and decline jurisdiction under Section 207 [40-7-108].

Any hearing in the State with jurisdiction under Sections 201-203 [40-7-201 through 40-7-203] on the temporary emergency determination is subject to the provisions of Sections 111 and 112 [40-7-119 and 40-7-140]. These sections facilitate the presentation of testimony and evidence taken out of State. If there is a concern that the person obtaining the temporary emergency determination under this section would be in danger upon returning to the State with jurisdiction under Sections 201-203 [40-7-201 through 40-7-203], these provisions should be used.

Subsection (d) [(4)] requires communication between the court of the State that is exercising jurisdiction under this section and the court of another State that is exercising jurisdiction under Sections 201-203 [40-7-201 through 40-7-203]. The pleading rules of Section 209 [40-7-110] apply fully to determinations made under this section. Therefore, a person seeking a temporary emergency custody determination is required to inform the court pursuant to Section 209(d) [40-7-110(4)] of any proceeding concerning the child that has been commenced elsewhere. The person commencing the custody proceeding under Sections 201-203 [40-7-201 through 40-7-203] is required under Section 209(a) [40-7-110(1)] to inform the court about the temporary emergency proceeding. These pleading requirements are to be strictly followed so that the courts are able to resolve the emergency, protect the safety of the parties and the child, and determine a period for the duration of the temporary order.

Relationship to the PKPA. The definition of emergency has been modified to harmonize it with the PKPA. The PKPA's definition of emergency jurisdiction does not use the term "neglect." It defines an emergency as "mistreatment or abuse." Therefore "neglect" has been eliminated as a basis for the assumption of temporary emergency jurisdiction. Neglect is so elastic a concept that it could justify taking emergency jurisdiction in a wide variety of cases. Under the PKPA, if a State exercised temporary emergency jurisdiction based on a finding that the child was neglected without a finding of mistreatment or abuse, the order would not be entitled to federal enforcement in other States.

Relationship to Protective Order Proceedings. The UCCJA and the PKPA were enacted long before the advent of state procedures on the use of protective orders to alleviate problems of domestic violence. Issues of custody and visitation often arise within the context of protective order proceedings since the protective order is often invoked to keep one parent away from the other parent and the children when there is a threat of violence. This Act [chapter] recognizes that a protective order proceeding will often be the procedural vehicle for invoking jurisdiction by authorizing a court to assume temporary emergency jurisdiction when the child's parent or sibling has been subjected to or threatened with mistreatment or abuse.

In order for a protective order that contains a custody determination to be enforceable in another State it must comply with the provisions of this Act [chapter] and the PKPA. Although the Violence Against Women's Act (VAWA), 18 U.S.C. § 2265, does provide an independent basis for the granting of full faith and credit to protective orders, it expressly excludes "custody" orders from the definition of "protective order," 22 U.S.C. § 2266.

Many States authorize the issuance of protective orders in an emergency without notice and hearing. This Act [chapter] does not address the propriety of that procedure. It is left to local law to determine the circumstances under which such an order could be issued, and the type of notice that is required, in a case without an interstate element. However, an order issued after the assumption of temporary emergency jurisdiction is entitled to interstate enforcement and nonmodification under this Act [chapter] and the PKPA only if there has been notice and a reasonable opportunity to be heard as set out in Section 205 [40-7-105]. Although VAWA does require that full faith and credit be accorded to ex parte protective orders if notice will be given and there will be a reasonable opportunity to be heard, it does not include a "custody" order within the definition of "protective order."

VAWA does play an important role in determining whether an emergency exists. That Act [chapter] requires a court to give full faith and credit to a protective order issued in another

State if the order is made in accordance with the VAWA. This would include those findings of fact contained in the order. When a court is deciding whether an emergency exists under this section, it may not relitigate the existence of those factual findings.

CASES DECIDED UNDER UCCJEA

Children in Montana Subject to Exclusive Continuing Jurisdiction in Florida — Montana Protective Order Upheld: A Montana family moved to Florida, where the parents later divorced and agreed to a parenting plan. The mother moved back to Montana with the children, who resided with her in Montana during the school year and for 1 week after school ends. Several years later, the mother sought a protective order in Montana to prevent the father from contacting her and her children. The District Court granted the order, specifying that it would last until 1 week after school ends and could be modified or superseded by an order in the custody case by a court of competent jurisdiction. The father appealed that the District Court erroneously modified the parties' prior Florida parenting plan in violation of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court, finding the order minimally sufficient to comply with 40-7-204. In re Marriage of Kirkman, 2020 MT 17, 398 Mont. 389, 456 P.3d 1028.

No Standing for Grandparents to Bring Emergency Child Custody Case: The father physically abused the mother while the family lived in Maine. The mother moved the children to her parents' home in Oregon, and the grandparents, mother, and children subsequently moved to Montana. Meanwhile, the father filed for divorce and child custody in Maine, and the Maine court ordered that the children be returned to Maine. The grandparents filed for an emergency custody determination in Montana, seeking to block the Maine court's order. A Montana District Court initially accepted jurisdiction of the children, but after communicating with the Maine court, the Montana court declined jurisdiction, dismissed the grandparents' case, and remanded to the Maine court. The grandparents appealed. The Supreme Court determined the issue based on the question of standing, noting that 40-4-211 allows a parenting plan to be commenced in District Court by a person other than a parent if the person has established a parent-child relationship and has filed a parenting petition in the county where the child resides or is found. However, in this case, no petition to establish parenting rights was filed, and neither parent voluntarily relinquished custody to the grandparents or had their parental rights terminated, so the grandparents could not make the predicate showing that they were entitled to custody. Because the grandparents lacked standing to gain custody of the children, the petition for emergency custody was properly denied and remand to the Maine court was affirmed. In re Parenting of D.A.H. & G.M.H. v. C.P.H., 2005 MT 68, 326 M 296, 109 P3d 247 (2005).

Removal of Child Across State Lines While Custody Proceedings Pending in Montana — Continuing Jurisdiction Versus Pending Jurisdiction Under Federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act: When the parties were divorced, an Oregon court granted a parenting plan. The mother later moved to Montana, and the Montana District Court properly assumed jurisdiction. The mother then fled with her son to American Samoa. A Samoan court assumed jurisdiction and awarded custody to the mother. The father petitioned the Montana District Court to enforce the earlier parenting plan, and the petition was granted. The mother appealed the Montana court's failure to recognize the jurisdiction of the Samoan court. The Supreme Court applied the provisions of the federal Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act of 1980 (PKPA), holding that a sister state may modify a child custody determination when the sister state has jurisdiction to make a child custody determination under its own laws, which the Samoan court had, and when the first state no longer has jurisdiction by having lost or given up its continuing or pending jurisdiction. A state has continuing jurisdiction if it has jurisdiction under its own law and it remains the residence of the child or any of the contestants. A state has pending jurisdiction if that state is engaged in proceedings that will ultimately impact the custody and visitation of a child. In this case, Montana did not have continuing jurisdiction because none of the parties were residing in Montana once the mother moved with the child to American Samoa. However, Montana did have pending jurisdiction at the time that the mother initiated the action in American Samoa. The PKPA was designed to prevent precisely what occurred here, namely the removal of a child from one jurisdiction to another in order to obtain a different result regarding custody or other matters affecting a minor child. The mother could not divest Montana of jurisdiction simply by removing the child to American Samoa in an effort to restart the entire issue. Because the Montana court did not decline jurisdiction, the Samoan court was without authority to assume jurisdiction and instead was required to enforce the Montana custody determination. Paslov v. Cox, 2004 MT 325, 324 M 94, 104 P3d 1025 (2004).

Jurisdictional Requirement Over Dissolution Proceeding Satisfied by Party's Residence — Inconvenient Forum Improperly Applied Absent Opportunity to Respond to Motion: After several years of a difficult relationship, the husband was charged with partner or family member assault and the wife moved to Oregon with the four children. An Oregon court determined that it had temporary emergency jurisdiction over the children, issued a restraining order against the husband, and granted residential custody to the wife. The husband subsequently filed for dissolution and a parenting plan in Montana. The District Court ordered the wife to show cause why the parenting plan should not be adopted. The wife moved to vacate the hearing, claiming that the Montana court did not have jurisdiction and that it was an inconvenient forum. The District Court vacated the show cause hearing without allowing the husband to respond to the motion and dismissed the dissolution petition without explanation. The husband appealed and the Supreme Court reversed. Oregon's exercise of temporary emergency jurisdiction over the children did not automatically divest Montana of jurisdiction over the same parenting issues. Neither party had initiated dissolution proceedings at the time that the husband's petition was filed, so no concurrent jurisdiction issue existed regarding dissolution. Because the husband resided in Montana for 90 days prior to filing the petition, the jurisdiction requirements of 40-4-104 were satisfied. However, jurisdiction over a dissolution of marriage does not necessarily confer jurisdiction over related child custody issues. Once the Montana court was notified of the child custody proceedings in Oregon, the Montana court was obligated by this section to contact the Oregon court regarding potential jurisdictional conflicts, but that was not done, so the Montana court's decision to decline to address the parenting issues in the husband's petition because the Oregon court had already exercised jurisdiction was reversed. Further, the inconvenient forum argument was also inappropriate because the husband was not given the opportunity to submit arguments on the issue as required under 40-7-108. This section applies the enforcement remedies provided by this article [part] to orders requiring the return of a child issued under the authority of the International Child Abduction Remedies Act (ICARA), 42 U.S.C. § 11601 et seq., implementing the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction. Specific mention of ICARA proceedings is necessary because they often occur prior to any formal custody determination. However, the need for a speedy enforcement remedy for an order to return the child is just as necessary.

40-7-303. Duty to enforce.

Commissioners' Note

This section is based on Section 13 of the UCCJA [former 40-7-114] which contained the basic duty to enforce. The language of the original section has been retained and the duty to enforce is generally the same.

Enforcement of custody determinations of issuing States is also required by federal law in the PKPA, 28 U.S.C. § 1738A(a). The changes made in Article 2 of this Act [part 2] now make a State's duty to enforce and not modify a child custody determination of another State consistent with the enforcement and nonmodification provisions of the PKPA. Therefore custody determinations made by a State pursuant to the UCCJA that would be enforceable under the PKPA will generally be enforced under this Act [chapter]. However, if a State custody determination made pursuant to the UCCJA would not be enforceable under the PKPA, it will also not be enforceable under this Act [chapter]. Thus a custody determination made by a "significant connection" jurisdiction when there is a home State is not enforceable under the PKPA regardless of whether a proceeding was ever commenced in the home State. Even though such a determination would be enforceable under the UCCJA with its four concurrent bases of jurisdiction, it would not be enforceable under this Act [chapter]. This carries out the policy of the PKPA of strongly discouraging a State from exercising its concurrent "significant connection" jurisdiction under the UCCJA when another State could exercise "home state" jurisdiction.

This section also incorporates the concept of Section 15 of the UCCJA [former 40-7-116] to the effect that a custody determination of another State will be enforced in the same manner as a custody determination made by a court of this State. Whatever remedies are available to enforce a local determination can be utilized to enforce a custody determination of another State. However, it remains a custody determination of the State that issued it. A child-custody determination of another State is not subject to modification unless the State would have jurisdiction to modify the determination under Article 2 [part 2].

The remedies provided by this article [part] for the enforcement of a custody determination will normally be used. This article [part] does not detract from other remedies available under other local law. There is often a need for a number of remedies to ensure that a child-custody determination is obeyed. If other remedies would easily facilitate enforcement, they are still available. The petitioner, for example, can still cite the respondent for contempt of court or file a tort claim for intentional interference with custodial relations if those remedies are available under local law.

40-7-304. Temporary visitation.

Commissioners' Note

This section authorizes a court to issue a temporary order if it is necessary to enforce visitation rights without violating the rules on nonmodification contained in Section 303 [40-7-303]. Therefore, if there is a visitation schedule provided in the custody determination that was made in accordance with Article 2 [part 2], a court can issue an order under this section implementing the schedule. An implementing order may include make-up or substitute visitation.

A court may also issue a temporary order providing for visitation if visitation was authorized in the custody determination, but no specific schedule was included in the custody determination. Such an order could include a substitution of a specific visitation schedule for "reasonable and seasonable."

However, a court may not, under subsection (a)(2) [(1)(b)] provide for a permanent change in visitation. Therefore, requests for a permanent change in the visitation schedule must be addressed to the court with exclusive, continuing jurisdiction under Section 202 [40-7-202] or modification jurisdiction under Section 203 [40-7-203]. As under Section 204 [40-7-204], subsection (b) [(2)] of this section requires that the temporary visitation order stay in effect only long enough to allow the person who obtained the order to obtain a permanent modification in the State with appropriate jurisdiction under Article 2 [part 2].

40-7-305. Registration of child custody determination.

Commissioners' Note

This remainder of this article [part] provides enforcement mechanisms for interstate child custody determinations.

This section authorizes a simple registration procedure that can be used to predetermine the enforceability of a custody determination. It parallels the process in UIFSA for the registration of child support orders. It should be as much of an aid to pro se litigants as the registration procedure of UIFSA.

A custody determination can be registered without any accompanying request for enforcement. This may be of significant assistance in international cases. For example, the custodial parent under a foreign custody order can receive an advance determination of whether that order would be recognized and enforced before sending the child to the United States for visitation. Article 26 of the 1996 Hague Convention on Jurisdiction, Applicable Law, Recognition and Cooperation in Respect of Parental Responsibility and Measures for the Protection of Children, 35 I.L.M. 1391 (1996), requires those States which accede to the Convention to provide such a procedure.

40-7-306. Enforcement of registered determination.

Commissioners' Note

A registered child-custody determination can be enforced as if it was a child-custody determination of this State. However, it remains a custody determination of the State that issued it. A registered custody order is not subject to modification unless the State would have jurisdiction to modify the order under Article 2 [part 2].

40-7-307. Simultaneous proceedings.

Commissioners' Note

The pleading rules of Section 308 [40-7-308], require the parties to disclose any pending proceedings. Normally, an enforcement proceeding will take precedence over a modification action since the PKPA requires enforcement of child custody determinations made in accordance with its terms. However, the enforcement court must communicate with the modification court in order to avoid duplicative litigation. The courts might decide that the court with jurisdiction under Article 2 [part 2] shall continue with the modification action and stay the enforcement proceeding. Or they might decide that the enforcement proceeding shall go forward. The ultimate decision rests with the court having exclusive, continuing jurisdiction under Section 202 [40-7-202], or if there is no State with exclusive, continuing jurisdiction, then the decision rests with the State that would have jurisdiction to modify under Section 203 [40-7-203]. Therefore, if that court determines that the enforcement proceeding should be stayed or dismissed, the enforcement court should stay or dismiss the proceeding. If the enforcement court does not do so, the court with exclusive, continuing jurisdiction under Section 202 [40-7-202], or with modification jurisdiction under Section 203 [40-7-203], could enjoin the parties from continuing with the enforcement proceeding.

40-7-308. Expedited enforcement of child custody determination.

Commissioner's Note

This section provides the normal remedy that will be used in interstate cases: the production of the child in a summary, remedial process based on habeas corpus.

The petition is intended to provide the court with as much information as possible. Attaching certified copies of all orders sought to be enforced allows the court to have the necessary information. Most of the information relates to the permissible scope of the court's inquiry. The petitioner has the responsibility to inform the court of all proceedings that would affect the current enforcement action. Specific mention is made of certain proceedings to ensure that they are disclosed. A "procedure relating to domestic violence" includes not only protective order proceedings but also criminal prosecutions for child abuse or domestic violence.

The order requires the respondent to appear at a hearing on the next judicial day. The term "next judicial day" in this section means the next day when a judge is at the courthouse. At the hearing, the court will order the child to be delivered to the petitioner unless the respondent is prepared to assert that the issuing State lacked jurisdiction, that notice was not given in accordance with Section 108 [40-7-106], or that the order sought to be enforced has been vacated, modified, or stayed by a court with jurisdiction to do so under Article 2 [part 2]. The court is also to order payment of the fees and expenses set out in Section 312 [40-7-312]. The court may set another hearing to determine whether additional relief available under this state's law should be granted.

If the order has been registered and confirmed in accordance with Section 304 [40-7-304], the only defense to enforcement is that the order has been vacated, stayed or modified since the registration proceeding by a court with jurisdiction to do so under Article 2 [part 2].

40-7-310. Hearing and order.

Commissioners' Note

The scope of inquiry for the enforcing court is quite limited. Federal law requires the court to enforce the custody determination if the issuing state's decree was rendered in compliance with the PKPA, 28 U.S.C. § 1738A(a). This Act [chapter] requires enforcement of custody determinations that are made in conformity with Article 2's [part 2's] jurisdictional rules.

The certified copy, or a copy of the certified copy, of the custody determination entitling the petitioner to the child is prima facie evidence of the issuing court's jurisdiction to enter the order. If the order is one that is entitled to be enforced under Article 2 [part 2] and if it has been violated, the burden shifts to the respondent to show that the custody determination is not entitled to enforcement.

It is a defense to enforcement that another jurisdiction has issued a custody determination that is required to be enforced under Article 2 [part 2]. An example is when one court has based its original custody determination on the UCCJA § 3(a)(2) [former 40-7-104(1)(b)] (significant connections) and another jurisdiction has rendered an original custody determination based on the UCCJA § 3(a)(1) [former 40-7-104(1)(a)] (home State). When this occurs, Article 2 of this Act [part 2], as well as the PKPA, mandate that the home state determination be enforced in all other States, including the State that rendered the significant connections determination.

Lack of notice in accordance with Section 108 [40-7-106] by a person entitled to notice and opportunity to be heard at the original custody determination is a defense to enforcement of the custody determination. The scope of the defense under this Act [chapter] is the same as the defense would be under the law of the State that issued the notice. Thus, if the defense of lack of notice would not be available under local law if the respondent purposely hid from the petitioner, took deliberate steps to avoid service of process or elected not to participate in the initial proceedings, the defense would also not be available under this Act [chapter].

There are no other defenses to an enforcement action. If the child would be endangered by the enforcement of a custody or visitation order, there may be a basis for the assumption of emergency jurisdiction under Section 204 of this Act [40-7-204]. Upon the finding of an emergency, the court issues a temporary order and directs the parties to proceed either in the court that is exercising continuing jurisdiction over the custody proceeding under Section 202 [40-7-202], or the court that would have jurisdiction to modify the custody determination under Section 203 [40-7-203].

The court shall determine at the hearing whether fees should be awarded under Section 312 [40-7-312]. If so, it should order them paid. The court may determine if additional relief is appropriate, including requesting law enforcement officers to assist the petitioner in the enforcement of the order. The court may set a hearing to determine whether further relief should be granted.

The remainder of this section is derived from UIFSA § 316 with regard to the privilege of self-incrimination, spousal privileges, and immunities. It is included to keep parallel the procedures for child support and child custody proceedings to the extent possible.

40-7-311. Warrant to take physical custody of child.

Commissioners' Note

The section provides a remedy for emergency situations where there is a reason to believe that the child will suffer imminent, serious physical harm or be removed from the jurisdiction once the respondent learns that the petitioner has filed an enforcement proceeding. If the court finds such harm exists, it should temporarily waive the notice requirements and issue a warrant to take physical custody of the child. Immediately after the warrant is executed, the respondent is to receive notice of the proceedings.

The term "harm" cannot be totally defined and, as in the issuance of temporary retraining orders, the appropriate issuance of a warrant is left to the circumstances of the case. Those circumstances include cases where the respondent is the subject of a criminal proceeding as well as situations where the respondent is secreting the child in violation of a court order, abusing the child, a flight risk and other circumstances that the court concludes make the issuance of notice a danger to the child. The court must hear the testimony of the petitioner or another witness prior to issuing the warrant. The testimony may be heard in person, via telephone, or by any other means acceptable under local law. The court must state the reasons for the issuance of the warrant. The warrant can be enforced by law enforcement officers wherever the child is found in the State. The warrant may authorize entry upon private property to pick up the child if no less intrusive means are possible. In extraordinary cases, the warrant may authorize law enforcement to make a forcible entry at any hour.

The warrant must provide for the placement of the child pending the determination of the enforcement proceeding. Since the issuance of the warrant would not occur absent a risk of serious harm to the child, placement cannot be with the respondent. Normally, the child would be placed with the petitioner. However, if placement with the petitioner is not indicated, the court can order any other appropriate placement authorized under the laws of the court's State. Placement with the petitioner may not be indicated if there is a likelihood that the petitioner also will flee the jurisdiction. Placement with the petitioner may not be practical if the petitioner is proceeding through an attorney and is not present before the court.

This section authorizes the court to utilize whatever means are available under local law to ensure the appearance of the petitioner and child at the enforcement hearing. Such means might include cash bonds, a surrender of a passport, or whatever the court determines is necessary.

40-7-312. Costs, fees, and expenses.

Commissioners' Note

This section is derived from the International Child Abduction Remedies Act, 42 U.S.C. § 11607(b)(3). Normally the court will award fees and costs against the non-prevailing party. Included as expenses are the amount of investigation fees incurred by private persons or by public officials as well as the cost of child placement during the proceedings.

The non-prevailing party has the burden of showing that such an award would be clearly inappropriate. Fees and costs may be inappropriate if their payment would cause the parent and child to seek public assistance.

This section implements the policies of Section 8(c) of Pub.L. 96-611 (part of the PKPA) which provides that:

In furtherance of the purposes of section 1738A of title 28, United States Code [this section], as added by subsection (a) of this section, State courts are encouraged to-

(2) award to the person entitled to custody or visitation pursuant to a custody determination which is consistent with the provisions of such section 1738A [this section], necessary travel expenses, attorneys' fees, costs of private investigations, witness fees or expenses, and other expenses incurred in connection with such custody determination....

The term "prevailing party" is not given a special definition for this Act [chapter]. Each State will apply its own standard.

Subsection (b) [(2)] was added to ensure that this section would not apply to the State unless otherwise authorized. The language is taken from UIFSA § 313 (court may assess costs against obligee or support enforcement agency only if allowed by local law).

40-7-314. Appeals.

Commissioners' Note

The order may be appealed as an expedited civil matter. An enforcement order should not be stayed by the court. Provisions for a stay would defeat the purpose of having a quick enforcement procedure. If there is a risk of serious mistreatment or abuse to the child, a petition to assume emergency jurisdiction must be filed under Section 204 [40-7-204]. This section leaves intact the possibility of obtaining an extraordinary remedy such as mandamus or prohibition from an appellate court to stay the court's enforcement action. In many States, it is not possible to limit the constitutional authority of appellate courts to issue a stay. However, unless the information before the appellate panel indicates that emergency jurisdiction would be assumed under Section 204 [40-7-204], there is no reason to stay the enforcement of the order pending appeal.

40-7-315. Role of prosecutor.

Commissioners' Note

Sections 315-317 [40-7-315 through 40-7-317] are derived from the recommendations of the Obstacles Study that urge a role for public authorities in civil enforcement of custody and visitation determinations. One of the basic policies behind this approach is that, as is the case with child support, the involvement of public authorities will encourage the parties to abide by the terms of the court order. The prosecutor usually would be the most appropriate public official to exercise authority under this section. However, States may locate the authority described in the section in the most appropriate public office for their governmental structure. The authority could be, for example, the Friend of the Court Office or the Attorney General. If the parties know that prosecutors and law enforcement officers are available to help secure the return of a child, the parties may be deterred from interfering with the exercise of rights established by court order.

The use of public authorities should provide a more effective method of remedying violations of the custody determination. Most parties do not have the resources to enforce a custody determination in another jurisdiction. The availability of the prosecutor or other government official as an enforcement agency will help ensure that remedies of this Act [chapter] can be made available regardless of income level. In addition, the prosecutor may have resources to draw on that are unavailable to the average litigant.

The role of the public authorities should generally not begin until there is a custody determination that is sought to be enforced. The Act [chapter] does not authorize the public authorities to be involved in the action leading up to the making of the custody determination, except when requested by the court, when there is a violation the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, or when the person holding the child has violated a criminal statute. This Act [chapter] does not mandate that the public authorities be involved in all cases referred to it. There is only so much time and money available for enforcement proceedings. Therefore, the public authorities eventually will develop guidelines to determine which cases will receive priority.

The use of civil procedures instead of, or in addition to, filing and prosecuting criminal charges enlarges the prosecutor's options and may provide a more economical and less disruptive means of solving problems of criminal abduction and retention. With the use of criminal proceedings alone, the procedure may be inadequate to ensure the return of the child. The civil options would permit the prosecutor to resolve that recurring and often frustrating problem.

A concern was expressed about whether allowing the prosecutor to use civil means as a method of settling a child abduction violated either DR 7-105(A) of the Code of Professional Responsibility or Model Rule of Professional Responsibility 4.4. Both provisions either explicitly or implicitly disapprove of a lawyer threatening criminal action to gain an advantage in a civil case. However, the prohibition relates to threats that are solely to gain an advantage in a civil case. If the prosecutor has a good faith reason for pursuing the criminal action, there is no ethical violation. See Committee on Legal Ethics v. Printz, 416 S.E. 2d 720 (W.Va. 1992) (lawyer can threaten to press criminal charges against a client's former employee unless employee made restitution).

It must be emphasized that the public authorities do not become involved in the merits of the case. They are authorized only to locate the child and enforce the custody determination. The public authority is authorized by this section to utilize any civil proceeding to secure the enforcement of the custody determination. In most jurisdictions, that would be a proceeding under this Act [chapter]. If the prosecutor proceeds pursuant to this Act [chapter], the prosecutor is subject to its provisions. There is nothing in this Act [chapter] that would prevent a State from authorizing the prosecutor or other public official to use additional remedies beyond those provided in this Act [chapter].

The public authority does not represent any party to the custody determination. It acts as a "friend of the court." Its role is to ensure that the custody determination is enforced.

Sections 315-317 [40-7-315 through 40-7-317] are limited to cases covered by this Act [chapter], i.e. interstate cases. However, States may, if they wish, extend this part of the Act [chapter] to intrastate cases.

It should also be noted that the provisions of this section relate to the civil enforcement of child custody determinations. Nothing in this section is meant to detract from the ability of the prosecutor to use criminal provisions in child abduction cases.

Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Applicability: Section 2, Ch. 92, L. 2009, provided: "[This act] applies to petitions for grandparent-grandchild contact filed in accordance with Title 40, chapter 9, part 1, on or after October 1, 2009."

2007 Amendment: Chapter 495 inserted (2), (3), and (4) concerning determination by court of unfitness of parent; in (5) after "section" inserted "over the objections of a fit parent", near middle substituted "based upon clear and convincing evidence" for "after a hearing", after "contact" inserted "with the grandparent", and at end inserted "and that the presumption in favor of the parent's wishes has been rebutted"; inserted (9) concerning effect of court's determination of unfitness of parent; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 495, L. 2007, provided: "WHEREAS, the Legislature enacted the principal grandparent-grandchild contact statute, section 40-9-102, MCA, in 1979 and has not amended that statute since 1997; and

WHEREAS, since 1997, the statute has provided that a grandparent wanting to have contact with a grandchild could petition a District Court to grant that contact and that the court must grant the petition if it found that the contact was "in the best interest of the child"; and

WHEREAS, since 1997, the United States Supreme Court and the Montana Supreme Court have both held that a parent's right to the custody, care, and control of a child is founded upon a parent's constitutional right to liberty and have also held that it is the constitutionally protected right of a fit parent to determine who the parent's child may or may not associate with; and

WHEREAS, the Montana Supreme Court held on May 9, 2006, in the case of Polasek v. Omura, that a District Court for Cascade County committed reversible error when the District Court granted a petition for grandparent-grandchild contact under section 40-9-102, MCA, against the wishes of the custodial parent who had not been found to be an unfit parent, based upon the single statutory criteria that the contact was "in the best interest of the child"; and

WHEREAS, the Montana Supreme Court held in Polasek v. Omura that before a District Court could use the "best interest of the child" standard, the District Court must first determine whether the child's parent was a fit parent and, if the District Court determines the parent to be a fit parent and an objecting fit parent, that the presumption in favor of the parent's wishes has been rebutted; and

WHEREAS, because of the rulings of the U.S. Supreme Court and the Montana Supreme Court, section 40-9-102, MCA, is now misleading to grandparents in that the statute implies that a grandparent may petition a District Court to award, and the District Court may grant, grandparent-grandchild contact without consideration of the wishes of a custodial parent, or even over the objection of a custodial parent, and without consideration of the fitness of that parent; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature believes in the constitutional right of parents to control the actions and conduct of their children and believes that third parties should not be allowed, through the courts, to control the actions of those children if the parents are fit and proper parents; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature believes that both parents and grandparents must have a clear understanding or "road map" of parental rights and a grandparent's right to contact with a grandchild and that those rights should be clear in state law and easily located in state statutes by both parents and grandparents alike.

THEREFORE, it is the purpose of the Legislature to make Montana statutes reflect the holding of the U.S. Supreme Court in Troxel v. Granville and of the Montana Supreme Court in Polasek v. Omura regarding the constitutional rights of custodial parents to determine who a child may or may not have contact with by providing that before a District Court may grant grandparent-grandchild contact over the objection of a custodial parent, the District Court must inquire into the fitness of the parent and approve the petition for contact only if the parent is found to be unfit and the contact is in the best interest of the child or, if the court determines the parent to be a fit parent, the contact petitioned for is in the best interest of the child and the presumption in favor of the parent's wishes has been rebutted."

Applicability: Section 2, Ch. 495, L. 2007, provided: "[This act] applies to a petition for grandparent-grandchild contact filed in accordance with Title 40, chapter 9, part 1, after October 1, 2007."

1997 Amendment: Chapter 343 throughout section changed reference to grandparent visitation to "grandparent-grandchild contact"; in (1), near beginning after "reasonable", substituted "rights to contact with the child" for "visitation rights"; in (2), near middle before "would be", substituted "contact" for "visitation"; and made minor changes in style.

Saving Clause: Section 41, Ch. 343, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

Severability: Section 42, Ch. 343, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Applicability: Section 43, Ch. 343, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] applies to proceedings begun after October 1, 1997, including proceedings regarding modification of orders or decrees existing on October 1, 1997."

1995 Amendment: Chapter 546 in (1), in second sentence, substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of family services"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1991 Amendment: At end of first sentence of (1) inserted language clarifying extent of grandparent's right to visit grandchildren and inserted second sentence providing for notice in certain cases to Department of Family Services.

1983 Amendment: In (1), substituted language allowing court to grant visitation to a grandparent for former text that read: "If the father or mother of an unmarried child is deceased, the district court may grant to the parents of the deceased person reasonable visitation rights with the child"; inserted (3) stating how often one may petition under the section; and inserted (4) allowing court to appoint an attorney to represent child's interests.

Case Notes

Termination of Visitation Agreement — Correctly Classified as Grandparent Visitation Agreement and Not Parental Visitation Agreement: The grandparents filed a petition for a parental interest determination after the mother moved to North Dakota with the child. Following mediation, the parties signed an agreement that allowed the child to live with the mother and gave day-to-day decisionmaking to the mother, but specifying certain visitation rights for the grandparents. Years later, the grandparents filed contempt motions, requesting that the District Court enforce the parties' agreement. The District Court eventually terminated the agreement, finding that it was a grandparent visitation agreement subject to modification and termination and not a parental visitation agreement. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the agreement was correctly classified and that the District Court correctly terminated the grandparents' visitation. King v. Chilcott, 2020 MT 224, 401 Mont. 204, 472 P.3d 155.

Grandparent Visitation — Application of Statutes: When considering a grandparent's visitation request, a District Court is required to apply 40-9-102, which specifically pertains to grandparent visitation, rather than 40-4-228, which pertains to parenting and visitation between a natural parent and a third party. (However, see Title 40, ch. 9, part 2, which was enacted in response to In re Parenting of L.R.S. and provides that a grandparent is not precluded from seeking relief in lieu of or in addition to relief under Title 40, ch. 9.) In re Parenting of L.R.S., 2018 MT 48, 390 Mont. 366, 414 P.3d 285.

Mother's Wishes Supersede Grandparents'—Fit Parent: The appellant grandparents requested regular and unsupervised visitation rights with their grandchild. The mother objected, allowing only supervised visits due to the grandparents' beliefs and prior actions. The District Court ruled that the grandparents did not present clear and convincing evidence to overcome the wishes of the fit parent under 40-9-102. On appeal, the Supreme Court upheld the determination, finding that the wishes of the parent overcame those of the grandparents. Glueckert v. Glueckert, 2015 MT 107; 378 Mont. 507, 347 P.3d 1216.

Burden on Grandparent to Overcome Presumption — Parenting Plan Terminology Not Fatal to Grandparent-Grandchild Contract Plan: The mother of two children did not oppose a grandmother's petition for grandparent-grandchild contact, but the mother did oppose extended visits in Washington state. The District Court incorrectly adopted extended out-of-state visitation provisions over the mother's objections because the grandmother had the burden of overcoming the objections of the fit parent and the grandmother did not supply evidence to overcome the presumption. However, except for the out-of-state visitation provisions, the District Court properly interpreted and applied this section because, although the grandparent-grandchild contact plan used parenting plan terminology, the objectives of the plan properly provided for a relationship between the grandmother and the children, rather than improperly establishing a parent-child relationship. Furthermore, information-sharing requirements within the plan merely required the parties to keep each other informed so that the children could be appropriately cared for during visits, rather than showing that the grandmother had been allocated improper parental decisionmaking powers. In re Grandparent/Grandchild Contact of C.A.G. and E.J.M.G., 2014 MT 290, 376 Mont. 540, 337 P.3d 751.

Preponderance of the Evidence Standard Used to Modify or Terminate Grandparent Visitation — Fit Parent's Views Given Deference: The District Court applied an incorrect standard of review in evaluating a parent's request to modify or terminate a stipulated court order for grandparent-grandchild contact. In order to adequately protect a parent's fundamental constitutional right to make decisions concerning the care, custody, and control of a child, a parent must be allowed to present any evidence that bears on those decisions as they relate to the nonparent. If the court finds that a parent is fit, then the parent's views on continued visitation and the best interest of the child must be given deference in the court's analysis. When a parent seeks to modify or terminate a previously issued contact order, the burden of proof is on the parent to make a showing by a preponderance of the evidence, rather than by clear and convincing evidence. In re Grandparent-Grandchild Contact of Snyder, 2010 MT 151, 357 Mont. 34, 235 P.3d 578.

Initial Best Interest Standard Applicable to Grandparent-Grandchild Proceedings: When a grandparent petitions for contact with a grandchild, the first inquiry is whether a parent adequately cares for the child. If the parent is fit, a presumption arises in favor of the parent's wishes because due process does not permit the state to infringe on the fundamental right of parents to make childrearing decisions simply because a state judge believes a better decision could be made. If the parent is not fit, no presumption arises and the parent's wishes are due no deference. The close scrutiny applied to the fundamental parenting right requires that a petitioning grandparent prove by clear and convincing evidence that it is in the child's best interest to have contact with the grandparent and that, in the case of a fit objecting parent, the presumption in favor of the parent's wishes has been rebutted. Here, it was reversible error for the District Court to neglect to inquire into the parent's fitness prior to judging whether a grandparent's request for contact should be granted. Polasek v. Omura, 2006 MT 103, 332 M 157, 136 P3d 519 (2006), following Troxel v. Granville, 530 US 57 (2000), and explained in In re Grandparent-Grandchild Contact of Snyder, 2010 MT 151, 357 Mont. 34, 235 P.3d 578. In In re C.T.C., 2014 MT 306, 377 Mont. 106, 339 P.3d 54, the Supreme Court applied the analysis in Polasek to stepparent visitation when the stepparent's spouse, the biological parent of the child, is deceased. See also King v. Chilcott, 2020 MT 224, 401 Mont. 204, 472 P.3d 155.

District Court Jurisdiction Over Grandparent-Grandchild Contact Proceedings: In the case of a petition for grandparent-grandchild contact brought under Title 40, ch. 9, the District Court retains jurisdiction to hear the petition and to issue a ruling on it. In re Grandparent-Grandchild Contact of Stewart v. Evans, 2006 MT 102, 332 M 148, 136 P3d 524 (2006).

Great-Grandparent Visitation: Mother challenged the award of visitation rights to a child's great-grandmother and great-great-grandmother when the child was in the father's custody on grounds that the grandparent visitation statutes do not address great-grandparent visitation.

Absent allegations of attempted independent great-grandparent visitation or a trial court finding on independent great-grandparent visitation rights, the issue was moot. In re Marriage of Dreesbach, 265 M 216, 875 P2d 1018, 51 St. Rep. 374 (1994).

Conditional Exercise of Grandparent Visitation: It was not an abuse of District Court discretion to grant grandparents the right of visitation only if the visitation was simultaneous with that of the father. In re Marriage of Kovash, 260 M 44, 858 P2d 351, 50 St. Rep. 934 (1993).

Adoption by Stepparent — No Mandatory Termination of Grandparents' Visitation: There is no clear legislative intent or public policy that mandates termination of visitation for natural grandparents when a grandchild is adopted by a stepparent. Kanvick v. Reilly, 233 M 324, 760 P2d 743, 45 St. Rep. 1524 (1988).

Grant of Grandparents' Visitation in Child's Best Interest Only: This section allows a court to grant a grandparent visitation rights only after a finding that the visitation would be in the child's best interest. The District Court properly refused adoption of a visitation schedule in the grandparents' home, which would subject the child to contact with her father, yet allowed the grandparents to visit the child in her mother's home. Kanvick v. Reilly, 233 M 324, 760 P2d 743, 45 St. Rep. 1524 (1988).

Reasonableness of Grandparent Visitation Schedule: The trial court granted to grandparents a total of 4 weeks per year of visitation, plus holidays, and allowed additional visitation conditioned on the mother's approval. Such a schedule was reasonable and provided adequate access to the child by the grandparents. In re Marriage of Jacobson, 228 M 458, 743 P2d 1025, 44 St. Rep. 1678 (1987).

Severability: Section 31, Ch. 350, L. 1995, was a severability clause.

Chapter Case Notes

Discovery Not Condoned Under Temporary Order of Protection Proceedings: After the petitioner obtained a temporary order of protection (TOP) against the respondent for stalking, the respondent proceeded to conduct extensive discovery. After the respondent was charged criminally for stalking, the petitioner moved to dismiss the TOP without prejudice, which the District Court granted. On appeal, the respondent argued that the petition should have been dismissed with prejudice as a discovery sanction against the petitioner for failing to appear at depositions. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that the breadth of discovery allowed in the case was antithetical to the purpose of a TOP, and concluded that unless extraordinary circumstances exist, courts should not compel a petitioner in a stalking matter to be subjected to discovery by a respondent. Because the need for a TOP may arise in the future, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in dismissing the TOP without prejudice. Lear v. Jamrogowicz, 2013 MT 147, 370 Mont. 320, 303 P.3d 790, followed in Boushie v. Windsor, 2014 MT 153, 375 Mont. 301, 328 P.3d 631.

Internet Dispute Turned Personal — Temporary Order of Protection Proper — No Additional Discovery — No Right to Jury Trial — No Right to Substitute Judge: A dispute arose from heated Internet-based correspondence between the petitioner, a Montana resident, and the respondent, a nonresident, who drove from Georgia to Montana, where he repeatedly drove past the petitioner's residence, showed up at his workplace, videotaped his vehicle, and created a website containing false and defamatory information about the petitioner and his wife. Based on this behavior, the petitioner sought and received a temporary order of protection (TOP) against the respondent, in Municipal Court. The District Court affirmed the TOP and denied the respondent's requests for discovery, a jury trial, and a substitute judge. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court, reasoning that all the TOP conditions that were imposed are permitted in 40-15-201, discovery would be antithetical to the purpose of a TOP, a jury trial would defeat the purpose of a TOP to provide swift and efficient protection of the victim, and a substitute judge is not a right in a TOP proceeding. Boushie v. Windsor, 2014 MT 153, 375 Mont. 301, 328 P.3d 631.

Jurisdiction Conferred on District Court When Acts of Stalking Committed Partly Within State: The District Court had jurisdiction over a petition for a temporary order of protection because the petition alleged that acts of stalking were committed partly within Montana. There is no statutory requirement under 40-15-102 or 45-5-220 that repeated acts of stalking must occur in Montana in order to confer jurisdiction on the District Court. Jordan v. Kalin, 2011 MT 142, 361 Mont. 50, 256 P.3d 909.

Failure to Enter Findings and Conclusions Regarding Continuation of Protective Order — Protective Order to Remain in Effect Pending Remand: Following the breakup of the parties, plaintiff obtained a temporary protective order in Justice's Court prohibiting contact by defendant. The court subsequently held a hearing on whether to make the protective order permanent and determined that good cause existed to continue the protective order. Defendant appealed to the District Court, which determined that defendant caused plaintiff substantial emotional distress, if not reasonable apprehension of bodily injury, by repeatedly harassing, threatening, and intimidating plaintiff. However, the court did not enter findings of fact and conclusions of law as required by former Rule 52(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), precluding appellate review absent a complete order. The Supreme Court remanded for the required findings and conclusions, but left the protective order in place during remand. Edelen v. Bonamarte, 2007 MT 138, 337 M 407, 162 P3d 847 (2007).

Failure to Appoint Guardian Ad Litem for Minor — Abuse of Discretion: Petitioners were granted a temporary protective order against a minor. The District Court scheduled a hearing to make the order permanent. The minor was unable to attend the hearing and was not represented by counsel or by a guardian. Nevertheless, the District Court made the order permanent. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the District Court abused its discretion by not appointing a guardian ad litem for the minor as required by former Rule 17(c), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), and this section. The Supreme Court remanded for appointment of a guardian ad litem to represent the minor's interests. In re Keller v. Trull, 2007 MT 108, 337 M 188, 158 P3d 439 (2007).

Internet Dispute Turned Personal — Temporary Order of Protection Proper — No Additional Discovery — No Right to Jury Trial — No Right to Substitute Judge: A dispute arose from heated Internet-based correspondence between the petitioner, a Montana resident, and the respondent, a nonresident, who drove from Georgia to Montana, where he repeatedly drove past the petitioner's residence, showed up at his workplace, videotaped his vehicle, and created a website containing false and defamatory information about the petitioner and his wife. Boushie v. Windsor, 2014 MT 153, 375 Mont. 301, 328 P.3d 631.

Denial of Motion to Vacate Permanent Order of Protection — No Abuse of Discretion: By waiting 13 years to challenge an underlying permanent order of protection, the respondent failed to preserve issues related to the constitutionality of 40-15-201 on appeal, and the Supreme Court declined to review these issues. Furthermore, when granting a temporary order of protection in 1997, the District Court found that the petitioner might be in danger of harm if the court did not act immediately, and when considering the permanent order of protection in 1999, the court found good cause to make the temporary order of protection permanent. When reconsidering the issue in the context of the respondent's motion to vacate the permanent order of protection, the District Court ultimately found that the petitioner's concerns were more persuasive, and the Supreme Court affirmed because the respondent had failed to prove that the District Court acted "without conscientious judgment or in a way that exceeded the bounds of reason". In re Marriage of Lockhead, 2013 MT 368, 373 Mont. 120, 314 P.3d 915.

Temporary Order of Protection Not Appealable Final Order: The petitioner and respondent were in the middle of a custody dispute when the respondent sought a temporary order of protection (TOP) in the Justice's Court against the petitioner. The petitioner responded by removing the TOP proceeding to the District Court, which was the venue for the parenting plan proceeding. After an order of protection hearing, the District Court dissolved the TOP and reserved the parenting plan petition for a later date. The respondent appealed the dissolution of the TOP. The Supreme Court dismissed the appeal, holding that the District Court, because it had essentially merged the TOP and parenting plan matters, had not issued a final resolution for all of the issues raised in the parenting plan, and thus the order dissolving the TOP was not immediately appealable. LeProwse v. Garrett, 2012 MT 275, 367 Mont. 161, 291 P.3d 110.

Case Notes

Amended Permanent Order of Protection Improperly Issued — Opportunity to Be Heard Required: In an easement dispute, the District Court sua sponte expanded a permanent order of protection to include one of the plaintiffs that was not previously included in the order from crossing an alleged easement. On appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that the District Court erred when it issued an expanded order of protection against one of the plaintiffs when that plaintiff was not provided with an opportunity to be heard at a hearing. The District Court did not receive or review evidence regarding the plaintiff's conduct or provide the plaintiff notice of the hearing. Bardsley v. Pluger, 2015 MT 301, 381 Mont. 284, 358 P.3d 907, following In re Keller v. Trull, 2007 MT 108, 337 Mont. 188, 158 P.3d 439, and In re Marriage of Coogler, 2004 MT 122, 321 Mont. 243, 90 P.3d 414.

Temporary Order of Protection Not Appealable Final Order: The petitioner and respondent were in the middle of a custody dispute when the respondent sought a temporary order of protection (TOP) in the Justice's Court against the petitioner. The petitioner responded by removing the TOP proceeding to the District Court, which was the venue for the parenting plan proceeding. After an order of protection hearing, the District Court dissolved the TOP and reserved the parenting plan petition for a later date. The respondent appealed the dissolution of the TOP. The Supreme Court dismissed the appeal, holding that the District Court, because it had essentially merged the TOP and parenting plan matters, had not issued a final resolution for all of the issues raised in the parenting plan, and thus the order dissolving the TOP was not immediately appealable. Reversible Error for District Court to Adopt Terms of Protective Order Unrelated to Those Agreed to at Hearing or by Stipulation: Wife Lundstrom received a protective order in Justice's Court requiring husband Scholz to notify her when he intended to access the parties' property for business purposes. Lundstrom then filed a marriage dissolution petition in District Court, and Scholz subsequently petitioned the District Court under the same cause number to dismiss or modify the protective order. The District Court held a hearing to consider Scholz's petition and agreed to modify the protective order to allow Scholz more liberal access to the property, requesting both parties to submit proposed orders memorializing the terms agreed upon at the hearing. The court then signed the order prepared by Lundstrom's counsel. Scholz moved to reconsider, asserting that the order contained terms contradictory to those agreed upon at the hearing, and later moved for the District Court to dismiss the protective order, but Lundstrom did not answer either motion. Both motions were denied, and Scholz appealed. The Supreme Court first considered whether the District Court properly exercised its jurisdiction over the Justice's Court protective order. Although Justices' Courts and District Courts have concurrent jurisdiction to hear and issue protective orders, a District Court may not take jurisdiction of a Justice's Court case on its own initiative. However, in this case, Scholz availed himself of the District Court's jurisdiction by petitioning to dismiss or modify the protective order and could not then challenge the District Court's jurisdiction. However, the District Court committed reversible error by adopting verbatim Lundstrom's proposed modification of the protective order because the modification order contained significant deviations from the issues covered at the hearing and the court lacked authority to order terms contradictory to matters discussed or completely absent at the hearing. The District Court should have deviated from its original determination at the hearing to no greater extent than the parties actually agreed by stipulation. The case was remanded for further proceedings. In re Marriage of Lundstrom & Scholz, 2007 MT 304, 340 M 83, 172 P3d 588 (2007), following In re Custody of C.S.F., 232 M 204, 755 P2d 578 (1988). In re Custody of C.S.F. was clarified in Steab v. Luna, 2010 MT 125, 356 Mont. 372, 233 P.3d 351.

Minor Unrepresented and Absent From Hearing on Order of Protection — Abuse of Discretion — Reversible Error: Petitioners were granted a temporary protective order against a minor. The District Court scheduled a hearing to make the order permanent. The minor was unable to attend the hearing and was not represented by counsel or by a guardian. Nevertheless, the District Court made the order permanent. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the District Court abused its discretion by conducting the hearing without the minor's presence or representation and without taking or reviewing any evidence and by basing the permanent order on nothing more than statements presented by the petitioners in their petition. The hearing did not satisfy the requirements of a mandatory hearing under this section, and the Supreme Court remanded for a hearing to be attended by the petitioners, the minor, and their respective representatives, if applicable, to determine whether there was sufficient evidence to justify granting the request for a permanent order of protection. In re Keller v. Trull, 2007 MT 108, 337 M 188, 158 P3d 439 (2007).

Dismissal, Without Hearing, of Order Supported by Allegations and Fears of Child Abuse: A mother obtained two temporary orders of protection from two different judges after her child complained about sexual and physical abuse by the father. The mother and father were separated. The first judge's dismissal of both orders without granting the mother an evidentiary hearing was a manifest abuse of discretion. The judge had twice ordered the father to obtain a mental health evaluation and a sexual offender evaluation in order to protect the child, and the father refused. He was rewarded by dismissal of the temporary protection orders. The dismissal was reversed, and the case was remanded for a hearing on the merits of the father's motion to vacate the orders. K.D.R.-M. v. R.E.M., 2004 MT 292, 323 M 340, 100 P3d 150 (2004).

Abuse of Discretion to Issue Permanent Protective Orders in Light of Failure to Hold Show Cause Hearing: The District Court issued a temporary protective order to the wife and subsequently granted a permanent protective order, amending the permanent order the next day to include additional restraints on the husband. The court noted that the husband was not present at a show cause hearing. The husband appealed on grounds that he was not given notice and that no hearing was conducted. The Supreme Court noted that under this section, a show cause hearing must be held within 20 days after issuance of a temporary protection order, but the record did not indicate that a hearing was ever held. Thus, the District Court abused its discretion, and the Supreme Court reversed and directed that the permanent protective orders be vacated. In re Marriage of Coogler, 2004 MT 122, 321 M 243, 90 P3d 414 (2004).

Discretion of District Court to Amend Temporary Protective Order — Evidence of Domestic Violence Prior to Birth of Child Irrelevant to Determination of Child Custody: Following incidents of domestic abuse unwitnessed by the parties' child, the father received a temporary protective order prohibiting contact by the mother with both the husband and child. The court subsequently held a hearing regarding the temporary order pursuant to this section and amended the protective order by extending it for an additional 6 months as to the husband, but found that the child was not in substantial danger, so the order was not extended to the child. Rather, the court issued an interim parenting plan that provided primary residential custody to the mother. The father appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. It is within the discretion of the District Court, upon a showing of good cause, to continue, amend, or make permanent a protection order, and its decision will not be overturned absent an abuse of that discretion. Here, the District Court properly considered the child's best interests in fashioning the interim parenting plan, and correctly declined to limit the mother's contact with the child through the protective order. Evidence of alleged incidents of domestic violence prior to the couple's marriage and the birth of the child was irrelevant. In re Schiller, 2002 MT 103, 309 M 431, 47 P3d 816 (2002), distinguishing Stoneman v. Drollinger, 2000 MT 274, 302 M 107, 14 P3d 12 (2000). However, while Schiller established that a change to a protective order is appealable, see LeProwse v. Garrett, 2012 MT 275, 367 Mont. 161, 291 P.3d 110, in which the Supreme Court dismissed an appeal of the dissolution of a temporary order of protection because the order was not the only issue in the case and the District Court had not yet ordered a final decision and resolution of the other issues.

Case Notes

Dissolution of Protective Order — District Court's Denial of Appeal Incorrectly Interpreted Appeal: The petitioner obtained an order of protection against the respondent in 2015. In 2017, the respondent moved to dissolve the order. The Justice Court denied the respondent's motion and the respondent appealed to the District Court. The District Court denied the respondent's appeal, stating that the respondent's motion to appeal the order was untimely as it should have been filed within 30 days of November 23, 2015. On appeal to the Supreme Court, the respondent argued that the District Court incorrectly treated his appeal of the court's 2017 order as an appeal of the 2015 order of protection itself. The Supreme Court agreed with the respondent, holding that the respondent timely filed his appeal. Anderson v. Larson, 2018 MT 155, 392 Mont. 29, 420 P.3d 1018.

Internet Dispute Turned Personal — Temporary Order of Protection Proper — No Additional Discovery — No Right to Jury Trial — No Right to Substitute Judge: A dispute arose from heated Internet-based correspondence between the petitioner, a Montana resident, and the respondent, a nonresident, who drove from Georgia to Montana, where he repeatedly drove past the petitioner's residence, showed up at his workplace, videotaped his vehicle, and created a website containing false and defamatory information about the petitioner and his wife. Based on this behavior, the petitioner sought and received a temporary order of protection (TOP) against the respondent, in Municipal Court. The District Court affirmed the TOP and denied the respondent's requests for discovery, a jury trial, and a substitute judge. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court, reasoning that all the TOP conditions that were imposed are permitted in 40-15-201, discovery would be antithetical to the purpose of a TOP, a jury trial would defeat the purpose of a TOP to provide swift and efficient protection of the victim, and a substitute judge is not a right in a TOP proceeding. Boushie v. Windsor, 2014 MT 153, 375 Mont. 301, 328 P.3d 631.

Order of Protection — District Court's Authority to Continue or Terminate: A District Court has the authority to continue or terminate an order of protection, regardless of the protected party's desires. Albrecht v. Albrecht, 2011 MT 316, 363 Mont. 117, 266 P.3d 1275.

Substantial Though Conflicting Evidence of Abuse by Father — Award of Custody to Mother Affirmed: The father contested an award of primary residential care of the children to the mother because she had been unable to provide the children with a stable home, to keep a stable job, and to consistently get the children to school on time, was going to regular counseling, and opposed the father's visitation with the children. The father also contended that findings of his possible abuse of the mother and children were erroneous. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court affirmed custody to the mother, noting that the deficiencies cited by the father were at least partially caused by his own actions and that although the testimony regarding abuse was conflicting, the record contained sufficient evidence detailing the father's history of violence to warrant making a protection order permanent and to support the finding that the children's best interests were served by primary custody with the mother. In re Marriage of Bock, 2005 MT 40, 326 M 123, 107 P3d 488 (2005).

Discretion of District Court to Amend Temporary Protective Order — Evidence of Domestic Violence Prior to Birth of Child Irrelevant to Determination of Child Custody: Following incidents of domestic abuse unwitnessed by the parties' child, the father received a temporary protective order prohibiting contact by the mother with both the husband and child. The court subsequently held a hearing regarding the temporary order pursuant to 40-15-202 and amended the protective order by extending it for an additional 6 months as to the husband, but found that the child was not in substantial danger, so the order was not extended to the child. Rather, the court issued an interim parenting plan that provided primary residential custody to the mother. The father appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. It is within the discretion of the District Court, upon a showing of good cause, to continue, amend, or make permanent a protection order, and its decision will not be overturned absent an abuse of that discretion. Here, the District Court properly considered the child's best interests in fashioning the interim parenting plan, and correctly declined to limit the mother's contact with the child through the protective order. CHAPTER 1
RIGHTS AND OBLIGATIONS OF MINORS

Minority

41-1-101. Minors and adults defined.

Case Notes

Interpretation of Decree Provision on Termination of Support Obligation: In the decree of dissolution, the paragraph immediately following the paragraph concerning payment of child support provided that "Upon termination of the child support obligation" the appellant must pay the respondent maintenance until her death or remarriage. A dispute arose over the meaning of "termination of the child support obligation". The Supreme Court held that the District Court's ruling that the obligation terminated when the appellant stopped making monthly child support payments, rather than when the youngest child turned 18, was not clearly erroneous. In re Marriage of Jones, 218 M 441, 709 P2d 158, 42 St. Rep. 1722 (1985).

Custody and Support — "Child" Defined — Majority Age: Upon attaining the age of 18 a person is an adult and is no longer a "child" within the purview of 40-6-211 of whom parents are entitled to custody or to whom parents are obligated for support, despite the fact that at the time of the decree the legal age was 21. Chrestenson v. Chrestenson, 180 M 96, 589 P2d 148 (1979).

Family Allowance From Estate: When daughter became 18 years old, her right to receive a family allowance under sections 91-2401 through 91-2403, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), terminated. In re Hall's Estate, 124 M 355, 224 P2d 138 (1950).

Admission to State School for Girls: The controlling element in juvenile laws is age, not minority. Hence, contention that female cannot be committed to State Vocational School for Girls (Mountain View School) after she reaches age of majority cannot be sustained. State ex rel. Foot v. District Court, 77 M 290, 250 P 973, 49 ALR 398 (1926).

Case Notes

No Wrongful Death Action for Death of Unborn Child: In view of the rule for calculating the periods of minority set forth in 41-1-102, an unborn fetus is not a "minor child" within the meaning of 27-1-512 and thus an action for the wrongful death of an unborn child cannot be maintained under present state law. Kuhnke v. Fisher, 210 M 114, 683 P2d 916, 41 St. Rep. 952 (1984). See also Strzelczyk v. Jett, 264 M 153, 870 P2d 730, 51 St. Rep. 206 (1994).

41-1-103. Unborn children.

Case Notes

Supreme Court Recognizes Wrongful Death Claim for Stillborn Fetus: Alexa Strzelczyk brought a wrongful death action against her physician for the death of her full-term, stillborn fetus. The defendant, Jett, removed the case to federal court because neither party still resided in Montana. The federal court certified the case to the state Supreme Court because of the state court's decision in Kuhnke v. Fisher, 210 M 114, 683 P2d 916 (1984), holding that under state law at that time, wrongful death statutes did not support a claim for the death of a stillborn fetus. The federal court noted that the statutes had been revised since the 1984 decision. The Supreme Court ruled that the revised statutes provided for an action for the wrongful death of a "person", rather than "minor child", and that a child conceived but not yet born is defined as an "existing person" under the law, so far as may be necessary for its interest in the event of its subsequent birth. The Supreme Court noted that "live" birth is not statutorily required. The Supreme Court also held that each case must be considered carefully to determine if the circumstances make it “necessary” for the fetus to be determined to be a person in order to protect some interest. Strzelczyk v. Jett, 264 M 153, 870 P2d 730, 51 St. Rep. 206 (1994).

Appointment of Guardian Ad Litem for Minor’s Claims Against Father Upheld — Best Interests of Children to Include Insurance Claims: The father of three minor children was involved in a motor vehicle accident that killed the mother. The father was charged with vehicular homicide while under the influence; however, the charge was eventually dismissed. The father owned a motor vehicle insurance policy, which proposed to pay the policy limits of $300,000 to the children. During this process, an attorney appointed to represent the minor children with respect to the insurance settlement indicated that the children may have additional claims against the father’s business insurance policy. Ultimately, over the father’s objection, the District Court appointed a guardian ad litem for the children and an attorney to pursue any legal claims in the best interests of the children. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the appointment for the purpose of pursuing insurance claims was appropriate and that it was in the best interests of the children despite being against the father’s business insurance policy. In re Conservatorship of J.S., 2015 MT 335, 381 Mont. 462, 362 P.3d 76.

Appointment of GAL and Conservator — Inability of Parents to Choose Counsel for Child: The custodial parents of a minor child appealed the District Court’s order denying their motion to disqualify counsel for their child in a personal injury matter, arguing that they had the right to choose counsel over the opposition of the guardian ad litem (GAL) and conservator, that 37-61-403 and 72-5-427 were unconstitutional, and that 37-61-403 conflicts with the Montana Rules of Professional Conduct. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that once the parents consented to the appointment of a GAL and conservator, they divested themselves of the right to choose who would represent their child’s personal injury claims. Assuming that the parents were clients under 37-61-403, their failure to comply with the statute by not securing consent of the attorney of record or applying to the District Court to change the attorney of record did not render the statute unconstitutional. Because the parents voluntarily consented to the appointment of the GAL and conservator and, thus, divested themselves of control over the child’s legal action, their unhappiness with the decisions of the GAL and conservator did not render 72-5-427 unconstitutional. Rule 1.16, Montana Rules of Professional Conduct, and 37-61-403 work in conjunction: Rule 1.16 provides that an attorney shall withdraw from representation if discharged by a client and 37-61-403 provides the method for how discharge can be accomplished. In re Estate of C.K.O., 2013 MT 72, 369 Mont. 297, 297 P.3d 1217.

No Attorney Appointed in Estate-Related Proceeding — Minors’ Interests Amply Protected: Section 91-4316, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), imposed on the court the responsibility to look after the interests of minors. In a proceeding for the sale of realty brought by the administrator, the interests of the adults were the same as those of the minor heirs. The court might reasonably conclude that the interests of the heirs were amply protected by their adult sisters and that the additional expense of appointing an attorney to represent the minor heirs was unwarranted. That decision was in the court's sound discretion, and the fact that no attorney was appointed did not affect the validity of the proceedings. Haugan v. Yale Oil Corp., 124 M 1, 217 P2d 1084 (1950), following State ex rel. Hamilton v. District Court, 102 M 341, 57 P2d 1227 (1936), and State ex rel. Cotter v. District Court, 34 M 306, 87 P 615 (1906).

Infant Not to Appear Without Guardian: Sections 93-2805 and 93-2806, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), provided that an infant must appear in an action either by his general guardian or by a guardian ad litem appointed by the court. An infant defendant without a general guardian cannot appear until a guardian is appointed. Here, where a default judgment was taken against infant defendant, he could not be held responsible for his counsel's inadvertent failure to appear after consultation with his father prior to the appointment of a guardian. Maloney v. Schandelmier, 65 M 531, 212 P 493 (1923).

Appearance by General Guardian: At common law an infant plaintiff sues by guardian ad litem, but under statutes of this state he appears by his general guardian or his guardian ad litem. Melzner v. N. Pac. Ry., 46 M 162, 127 P 146 (1912); Flaherty v. Butte Elec. Ry., 40 M 454, 107 P 416 (1910).

Emancipation as Not Removing Minority: The emancipation of a minor by his parents does not render him capable of suing without a guardian. Where the complaint showed the plaintiff to be a minor, it was not subject to demurrer (demurrer abolished, former Rule 7(c), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), and 25-31-503, now repealed) because of a plaintiff's want of capacity to sue. A guardian should be appointed and his name inserted. Hoskins v. White, 13 M 70, 32 P 163 (1893).

Agency — Parents' Neglect to Give Notice Not Imputable to Child — Child Incapable of Appointing Agent: Neglect of parents of injured child to give 60-day notice under section 11-1305, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), may not be imputed to the child, and since, under this section, a child is incapable of appointing an agent for any purpose, it is questionable whether the statute can be complied with in that respect by anyone as agent. Child's cause of action for personal injuries is a property right over which a parent has no control. Lazich v. Belanger, 111 M 48, 105 P2d 738 (1940).

Case Notes

Workers' Compensation — Disaffirmation of Settlement Agreement by Minor: A minor was injured while working and filed for workers' compensation benefits. He subsequently signed a settlement agreement after negotiating with a claims adjuster. The claimant's filing of a petition to reopen his claim resulted in a hearing and the conclusion that the case was closed. The claimant appealed, based on his minority status at the time of the settlement and his concomitant right to disaffirm contracts. The Supreme Court held that the close relationship and continuing awareness of the claimant's mother during the claims negotiations were of no avail to the defendants because only the minor claimant had signed the settlement. The defendants should have required the claimant's legal guardian to sign as well as the claimant. Accordingly, the final compromise settlement was set aside. Parrent v. Midway Toyota, 192 M 118, 626 P2d 848, 38 St. Rep. 559 (1981).

No Form Prescribed: A minor who had purchased an automobile on time redelivered it to the seller in substantially the same condition and waived any claim for the amount paid on the purchase price. He notified the seller of his intention to disaffirm the contract in two notes. No particular form of disaffirmance is prescribed by law. The unequivocal acts on the minor's part by which his intentions were made known to the seller were sufficient. Stanhope v. Shambow, 54 M 360, 170 P 752 (1918).

Contract for Conveyance Upon Majority: The defendants purchased a tract of land from the plaintiff when he was a minor, taking a written obligation from him that he would execute a deed to them when he became of age. The obligation stated that he would execute the deed in consideration of $150 paid to him. The consideration, however, was paid to his father, from whom defendants received a written guaranty that the son would execute said deed when he became of age. Plaintiff upon reaching majority disaffirmed the contract. He was not required to restore the consideration or give notice of disaffirmance prior to the beginning of the suit, as the suit itself was sufficient notice of disaffirmance. Clark v. Tate, 7 M 171, 14 P 761 (1887).

Restoration of Consideration:

Minor may disaffirm contract without restoring consideration to other party when, from the very nature of the consideration, it cannot be returned (as in case of services performed by attorneys under contract of employment to institute an action). Downey v. N. Pac. Ry., 72 M 166, 232 P 531 (1924).

When infant purchaser of automobile disaffirmed contract of purchase and made complete restoration by redelivering it in substantially the same condition as when he bought it, both he and his sureties were discharged from further liability. Stanhope v. Shambow, 54 M 360, 170 P 753 (1918).

An infant may disaffirm contracts made by him, other than those for necessaries and those entered into under express statutory authority or direction, during infancy or within a reasonable time after reaching majority, provided he first makes restoration of consideration, thus placing the other party in status quo. Limited Emancipation Decisions Not Subject to Appellate Mediation Requirements: Former Rule 54, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), provided that certain domestic relations cases are subject to appellate mediation, but those cases do not include limited emancipation decisions, which are more akin to severing parental rights than to delineating how, when, and under what circumstances parental rights may be exercised. Thus, limited emancipation actions are not subject to appellate mediation requirements. In re Emancipation of Dammarell, 2000 MT 46, 298 M 391, 3 P3d 597, 57 St. Rep. 230 (2000).

CASES PRIOR TO 1993 ACT

Immunity of Employer Under Workers' Compensation Act: When a 13 year-old girl, unlawfully employed as operator of a passenger elevator, was killed in the performance of her duties and had failed to serve upon the employer a written notice of her election not to be bound by Workers' Compensation Act, she being an "employee" under 39-71-118 expressly including minors "whether lawfully or unlawfully employed", it was held that her insured employer was immune from common-law or statutory suits for damages brought by her mother as administratrix. Tarrant v. Helena Bldg. & Realty Co., 116 M 319, 156 P2d 168 (1944).

Defenses Not Available: In an action such as this the defenses of contributory negligence and assumption of risk are not available. Daly v. Swift & Co., 90 M 52, 300 P 265 (1931), distinguished in Shaw v. Kendall, 114 M 323, 136 P2d 748 (1943).

Knowledge: Since a corporate defendant in an action based on a violation of the Child Labor Law can only have vicarious knowledge of any fact, the knowledge of its managing officers that a minor of the prohibited age was being employed in a proscribed labor constitutes the knowledge required by the act. Daly v. Swift & Co., 90 M 52, 300 P 265 (1931).

Negligence Per Se: Violation of the child labor law is negligence per se. Daly v. Swift & Co., 90 M 52, 300 P 265 (1931).

Responsibility for Independent Contractor: The fact that a boy under the age of 16 years was employed by an independent contractor in making repairs on a freight elevator when injured was immaterial, it having been defendant company's duty, being in full possession of the building and elevator and with knowledge that he was engaged in forbidden labor, to see to it that he was not permitted to continue therein. Daly v. Swift & Co., 90 M 52, 300 P 265 (1931).

What Constitutes Cause of Action: Complaint in an action to recover damages for the death of a boy under the age of 12 years alleging, inter alia, that defendant company knowingly and negligently permitted the boy to be employed by an independent contractor in and about heavy elevator machinery while being moved, contrary to the provisions of the child labor law, it was held not open to the objection that it did not state a cause of action in that it showed on its face that deceased was not in the employ of defendant but that of the contractor. Daly v. Swift & Co., 90 M 52, 300 P 265 (1931).

Invalidity of Act as to Dangerous Occupations Not Specifically Enumerated: When the Legislature undertakes to define a new offense, the statute must be so explicit that all persons subject to its penalty may know what acts to avoid, and under that rule the provision of 41-2-101 (now repealed) making it a misdemeanor to employ a child under the age of 16 years "in any occupation ... known to be dangerous" is so uncertain as to the kind and nature of occupations intended to come within the prohibited class as to render it void. Burk v. Mont. Power Co., 79 M 52, 255 P 337 (1927), distinguished in Shaw v. Kendall, 114 M 323, 136 P2d 748 (1943).

Requisites of Complaint for Damages: The complaint in an action by a minor against a railway company to recover damages for personal injuries, making it negligence per se for an employer to hire a child under 16, must allege that defendant employed plaintiff knowing him to have been under that age. Fallon v. Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry., 61 M 130, 200 P 453 (1921).

Chapter Compiler's Comments

Task Force on Dependency and Neglect Court Systems: Section 1, Ch. 659, L. 2023, and sec. 2, Ch. 659, L. 2023, established a task force on dependency and neglect court systems to study whether a separate dependency and neglect court system or the existing court system, with enhancements, would best serve children, families, and other participants involved in dependency and neglect court proceedings; to report to the governor, the chief justice of the supreme court, and the 69th legislature; and to prepare draft legislation, if appropriate. Sections 1 and 2 were effective May 19, 2023, and terminate June 30, 2025.

Preamble: The preamble to SB 301 (Ch. 543, L. 1979) provided: "WHEREAS, Governor Judge appointed a task force to recommend ways in which services to families in which abuse and neglect are occurring could be improved; and

WHEREAS, the task force recognizes that the most crucial actions toward improving services to families must be taken by the local community; and

WHEREAS, the task force recognizes that child abuse and neglect is a multifaceted problem and that no one agency or discipline, by itself, has the resources or perspective to resolve or contain the problem; and

WHEREAS, the task force has heard testimony from numerous individuals, legislative staff, and other persons who deal with abused and neglected children and their families; and

WHEREAS, existing child abuse and neglect laws do not meet requirements allowing Montana to qualify for federal grants under Public Law 93-247.

THEREFORE, it is the intent of this bill to address the problems facing the children, families, and communities of this state regarding child abuse and neglect."

ADA Reasonable Accommodations Requirement Generally Subsumed by Requirements to Make Reasonable Efforts and Develop Appropriate Treatment Plan: A mother appealed the termination of her parental rights on the grounds that the Department of Public Health and Human Services (DPHHS) had failed to provide reasonable accommodations for her disability and that the District Court had failed to properly apply the federal Americans With Disabilities Act of 1990 (ADA) in its termination order. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding that the ADA's requirement that a public entity make reasonable accommodations for a person's disabilities is satisfied if DPHHS has fulfilled its existing obligations to make reasonable efforts and develop an appropriate treatment plan for the parent. Similarly, the Supreme Court found that the District Court is already required to make findings in consideration of a disabled parent in approving a treatment plan and no additional requirements above and beyond this are imposed by the ADA. In re K.L.N., 2021 MT 56, 403 Mont. 342, 482 P.3d 650.

Qualifications to Be Considered Party or Interested Person in Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings: In a child abuse and neglect proceeding, the mother's longtime boyfriend, who was not biologically related to the child but was identified by the child as his "dad", appealed the District Court's determination that the boyfriend was neither a party nor an interested person to the child's case and, therefore, was not entitled to continued notice or the right to appear in any subsequent proceedings related to the child. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that the Department of Public Health and Human Services, the child, and a parent, guardian, or individual with legal custody of the child are all parties to child abuse and neglect proceedings. In addition, a foster parent, a preadoptive parent, a relative caring for the child, or a relative who has cared for the child is allowed to file a motion to intervene and may also be a party to the proceedings. Therefore, because the boyfriend did not meet the above criteria, the District Court did not err in dismissing him as a party to the proceedings. However, the Supreme Court determined that under 41-3-422(9)(a), the boyfriend is a person interested in the child's case and has a right to appear at hearings pertaining to the child but does not have the right to notice or the right to be heard. The District Court erred when it denied the boyfriend's request to appear at the child's proceedings. In re J.B., 2015 MT 342, 381 Mont. 525, 362 P.3d 859.

Imposition of Child Custody Change in Criminal Sentence — Moot: After the defendant was convicted of assault on a minor and aggravated assault based on acts committed against her child, the District Court ordered as part of the defendant's criminal sentence that the child be temporarily placed with the father while civil dependency and neglect proceedings progressed against the defendant and stated in its judgment that it should be presumed that the father should have legal custody of the child unless the defendant could demonstrate otherwise. On appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that the defendant's appeal challenging the District Court's temporary placement of the child with the father was moot because the mother had regained custody of the child through the civil dependency and neglect proceedings. However, the District Court's statement regarding the presumption that the father should have custody of the child had no place in the judgment and was ordered stricken. St. v. MacDonald, 2013 MT 105, 370 Mont. 1, 299 P.3d 839.

Termination of Parental Rights — Requirements of Indian Child Welfare Act: Under the Indian Child Welfare Act, 25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq., the party seeking termination of an individual's parental rights to an Indian child under state law must satisfy the court that active efforts have been made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs designed to prevent the breakup of the Indian family and that the efforts have proved unsuccessful. The party seeking termination has the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that the continued custody of the child by the parent or Indian custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child. In re Custody of A.L.R., A.A.R., & T.C.R., 2002 MT 183, 311 M 76, 54 P3d 17 (2002). No Authority to Grant Third-Party Petition for Parenting Plan Absent Termination of Parental Rights: A young, single mother left her child in the temporary care of the Knopps, her aunt and uncle, while she sought employment and a place to live. About 2 months after the child was left with them, the Knopps petitioned for a parenting plan and support for the child. Although the document was referred to as a petition for a parenting plan, child support, and medical support, it was the functional equivalent of a petition for permanent custody. The Knopps applied for temporary custody and received it, ex parte, so that when the mother returned and tried to remove the child to their new home, she was not allowed to do so. The mother then sought termination of the guardianship and the return of her child. The mother's parental rights were never terminated or suspended by the state or county, nor were any proceedings ever commenced to demonstrate that the child was abused, dependent, or neglected. The District Court dismissed the petition, relying on In re Guardianship of D.T.N., 275 M 480, 914 P2d 579 (1996), in holding that the mother had a constitutional right to custody of her child and that permanent guardianship could not be granted because the mother's parental rights had not been terminated or suspended. The Knopps appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The rule of law does not permit destruction of a natural parent's fundamental right to the custody of a child based simply on the subjective determination of the child's best interests. Rather, a natural parent cannot be denied custody of a child absent termination of parental rights for abuse or neglect pursuant to this chapter. In re Parenting of J.N.P., 2001 MT 120, 305 M 351, 27 P3d 953 (2001). See also In re A.R.A., 276 M 66, 919 P2d 388 (1996), and Girard v. Williams, 1998 MT 231, 291 M 49, 966 P2d 1155 (1998). However, see In re Parenting of M.M.G., 2012 MT 228, 366 Mont. 386, 287 P.3d 952, in which the Supreme Court held that the petitioners could seek a parenting plan if the petitioners could establish a child-parent relationship, even though the mother's parental rights had not been terminated, distinguishing this case from In re Parenting of J.N.P.

Best Interest of Child Standard Unconstitutional in Custody Award to Nonparent Over Natural Parent Absent Finding of Abuse, Neglect, or Dependency: The best interest of the child standard incorporated into 40-4-221 in determining the custody of a child whose custodial parent dies is unconstitutional to the extent that it allows the grant of a petition prior to the termination of the noncustodial parent's constitutional right to custody. Use of the standard is improper in that any showing that a nonparent may be able to provide a better environment than a natural parent is irrelevant to the question of custody between the two in view of the constitutional right of a parent to custody. Although 40-4-221 gives a nonparent standing to request a custody hearing, it does not give the District Court authority to deprive a natural parent of the right to custody absent a finding of abuse, neglect, or dependency on the part of the natural parent. Indian Child Welfare Act — Burden of Proof for Placement in Foster Care: D.F and L.F., natural children of appellant who is an enrolled member of the Three Affiliated Tribes, were taken from appellant and placed in a foster home by the Department of Family Services (now Department of Health and Human Services). The Supreme Court found that the District Court had properly applied the standard of the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 requiring "clear and convincing" evidence that continued custody by appellant was likely to result in emotional or physical harm to her children and that clear and convincing evidence was shown to the District Court. All of the expert witnesses who testified gave examples of actions by appellant or her live-in male roommate that endangered the psychological or physical well-being of the children. Therefore, even though the District Court did not specifically state the burden of proof, the proof required by 25 U.S.C. 1912(e) was satisfied. In re L.F. & D.F., 266 M 461, 880 P2d 1365, 51 St. Rep. 900 (1994), cited in In re G.S., 2002 MT 245, 312 M 108, 59 P3d 1063 (2002), in which the Supreme Court upheld the District Court, concluding that the District Court applied the "clear and convincing evidence" standard in ruling that the state agency employed active, yet unsuccessful, efforts to provide remedial and rehabilitative services designed to prevent the breakup of an Indian family prior to granting the state agency temporary custody of the Indian children.

Marriage and Divorce Law Inapplicable to Nonparent Seeking Child Custody: As part of a change in custody proceeding conducted under the marriage and divorce statutes, the District Court erred in granting to a nonparent the custody of a child who was neither a natural child nor adopted. The proper procedure to be followed is contained in the child abuse, neglect, and dependency statutes. Although the nonparent apparently fit the requirements for custodian under either scenario, the case was remanded for correct procedural consideration under this chapter. In re Marriage of Miller, 251 M 300, 825 P2d 189, 49 St. Rep. 36 (1992), following In re Doney, 174 M 282, 570 P2d 575 (1977), and overruling a contrary prior holding in In re Custody of C.C., K.C., & B.C., 215 M 72, 695 P2d 816 (1985).

Exclusion of Evidence on Child Abuse Proceeding Concerning Father — Harmless Error: It was harmless error, in a child custody modification proceeding, for a District Court judge to exclude evidence that a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), alleging sexual abuse by the father, had been filed under Title 41, ch. 3, and dismissed for lack of evidence after being heard by the same judge who made the custody modification determination. In re Marriage of Stout, 216 M 342, 701 P2d 729, 42 St. Rep. 856 (1985).

No Requirement for Determination on Exact Cause and Nature of Child's Problems: Title 41, ch. 3, does not require a determination of the exact nature and cause of a child's problems before reaching a proper decision. When the trial court's findings were supported by substantial and credible evidence after a thorough and intense examination of all factors presented, the mother cannot prevail under the theory that the evidence did not support the court's findings that her child was a youth in need of care or under the contention that, at most, the nature and cause of her child's problems could not be determined. In re B.L.O., 213 M 164, 689 P2d 1246, 41 St. Rep. 2024 (1984).

Dependent and Neglected Finding Invalid When Entered in Guardianship Proceeding: A District Court finding that children were dependent and neglected was invalid since it was rendered in a guardianship proceeding instituted by the paternal grandparents rather than in a proceeding instituted to have the children declared dependent and neglected, as it must be, by the County Attorney under Title 41, ch. 3. In re Guardianship of Aschenbrenner, 182 M 540, 597 P2d 1156 (1979). However, see also In re L.E.B., 259 M 492, 856 P2d 1382, 50 St. Rep. 895 (1993), in which Aschenbrenner was distinguished in a case brought under adoption proceedings rather than guardianship proceedings.

Procedures to Be Rigorously Followed: While there is some overlap in the various statutory schemes governing the termination of parental rights and the custody of children as to general subject matter, each is used for a distinct purpose and sets forth specific procedures which must be rigorously followed before a valid judgment or order may be issued, to insure that the minors involved receive the full protection of these laws. In re Guardianship of Aschenbrenner, 182 M 540, 597 P2d 1156 (1979).

Termination of Parental Rights: The State may not terminate a parent's right to raise his or her own child merely because a court or state agency feels that a nonparent has more financial resources or pursues a preferable lifestyle. In re Inquiry into J.L.B., Youth in Need of Care, 182 M 100, 594 P2d 1127 (1979).

Names of Parties: The Supreme Court directed that in this and in future cases under 41-3-101, et seq., in both the District and Supreme Courts, all names of parties involved be removed to avoid publicity of the minor parties involved. In re Gore, Youth in Need of Care, 174 M 321, 570 P2d 1110 (1977).

Questioning by Guardian Ad Litem at Hearing Allowed — Partial Compliance — Extension of Temporary Legal Custody Proper: The Department of Public Health and Human Services petitioned for emergency protective services following reports of inappropriate behavior by the minors' parents. Eventually, at a hearing to terminate the father's parental rights, the District Court allowed the minors' guardian ad litem to question a child protection specialist and therapist over the objections of the father. The District Court subsequently terminated the father's parental rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the District Court did not err in allowing the children's guardian ad litem to cross-examine witnesses, although some lines of questioning lacked foundation and should have not been permitted. The Supreme Court also found that the Department provided reasonable efforts to reunify the father with the children, that the father's partial compliance with the treatment plan was not sufficient for compliance, that while the Department did not file for a formal motion to extend an order for temporary legal custody the Department nevertheless requested it, and that the father failed to identify which of his three attorneys he believed were ineffective over the course of his 4-year case. In re B.F., 2020 MT 223, 401 Mont. 185, 472 P.3d 142.

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Termination of Parental Rights Improper — Remand for Consideration of Placement with Father: Although the out-of-state father had been the primary parent of the children, they were removed from the mother's care after she refused to return them to the father. The father's court-appointed attorney advised him to stipulate to the state's petitions, failed to object to the children being placed with their maternal grandparents, and never requested a placement hearing. Ultimately, the father's parental rights were terminated and the father appealed. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the father's attorney had provided ineffective counsel, and remanded the matter to the District Court to consider the father as the first placement option for the children. In re B.H., 2020 MT 4, 398 Mont. 275, 456 P.3d 233.

Termination of Parental Rights After Thirty Months — Parent's Relapse, Improvement, and Subsequent Relapse — Reasonableness of Treatment Plan Challenged: The father had his children removed after the Department of Public Health and Human Services found that he used drugs, failed to adequately supervise his children, kept an unsanitary home, and did not ensure that his children received medical care. The District Court granted a petition for emergency protective services and the father stipulated to a treatment plan. Over the course of the proceeding, the father relapsed, improved for a time, relapsed again, and finally showed signs of improvement. Ultimately, the District Court terminated the father's parental rights, finding that the children could not wait any longer for the father to complete his treatment plan. On appeal, the father argued that the treatment plan was not appropriate because it did not provide him with a reasonable amount of time to complete certain tasks and that it erred in determining that he was unfit and not likely to change within a reasonable amount of time. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the father failed to completely comply with his treatment plan, despite coming close, and that the children spending 30 consecutive months in kinship foster care required termination of the father's rights. In re X.B., 2018 MT 153, 392 Mont. 15, 420 P.3d 538.

Parent in Long-Term Federal Incarceration Unable to Comply With Treatment Plan — Termination of Parental Rights Affirmed: The District Court terminated the parental rights of a father who was incarcerated in federal prison for a long-term sentence. The father asserted that the District Court erred in terminating his parental rights because it was not in the children's best interests and that the court should have allowed the children to continue their relationship with their loving, but temporarily absent, father. The Supreme Court disagreed. The best interests of the child are of paramount importance and take precedence over parental rights, and the need for permanent placement of children in a loving and stable home supersedes the parents' interests. The District Court kept informed about the children's placements and placement failures and made arrangements for their placement in a stable home. Given the fact that the father's long-term incarceration would not provide the opportunity for adequate parenting, and the father's failure to comply with a court-ordered parenting plan, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by terminating the father's parental rights and placing the children in permanent foster care. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 98, 350 M 86, 206 P3d 565 (2009).

Termination Hearing Held Wrong Time to Consider Placement With Grandparents — Failure of Other State to Accept Jurisdiction: When parents of a child whom the husband had abused opposed termination of parental rights at the termination hearing by alleging that the Department of Public Health and Human Services should have sought placement with the grandparents pursuant to this section (see 2023 amendment to 41-3-101), the District Court held that the termination hearing was the wrong time to adjudicate a placement of the children with the grandparents. The Supreme Court upheld the District Court, noting that the Department had inquired into such a placement with its counterpart state agency in North Carolina, where the grandparents lived, but after interviewing the grandmother, the North Carolina state agency refused to consider the placement and thereby declined to accept jurisdiction over the children. In re O.A.W., 2007 MT 13, 335 M 304, 153 P3d 6 (2007).

Liability of Parent for Child's Injury to Third Person Based on Parent's Failure to Exercise Reasonable Care of Child — Restatement of Torts as Reasonable Expression of Parent's Duty — Kienenberger Reversed: Crisafulli attended an auction conducted by Bass's auction company and was injured when Bass's son rode a bicycle through the crowd of spectators while handling auction tickets and hit Crisafulli. The District Court applied J.L. v. Kienenberger, 257 M 113, 848 P2d 472 (1993), granting summary judgment to Bass on grounds that parents have no independent duty to control the behavior of their children. Crisafulli contended that Kienenberger was distinguishable and that the District Court should instead have followed Restatement (Second) of Torts 316 (1965). That section of the Restatement does not make a parent liable for the torts of a child, but imposes liability on the parent for the parent's own failure to exercise a duty of reasonable care, then narrowly defines the circumstances under which that duty arises by requiring that the parent knows of the ability to control the child and understands the necessity for doing so, and then further conditions liability on a finding that the parent's failure created an unreasonable risk of harm to a third person. The Supreme Court concluded that imposition of liability under these limited and exceptional circumstances, in the absence of any legislative policy to the contrary, was a reasonable expression of a parent's duty in Montana and adopted the Restatement, overruling Kienenberger to the extent that it was inconsistent. The District Court's order granting summary judgment to Bass on the issue was reversed. Crisafulli v. Bass, 2001 MT 316, 308 M 40, 38 P3d 842 (2001). See also Mitchell v. Wiltfong, 604 P2d 79 (Kans. Ct. App. 1979).

Appropriateness of Treatment Plan Requirement That Parents Provide Explanation of Child's Injuries: Four treatment plans were developed with the parents, the purpose of all of which was to: (1) return the child to parental custody; (2) enable the parents to provide a safe and nurturing environment for the child; (3) enable the parents to develop an awareness of the child's needs and an ability to meet those needs; (4) help the parents develop minimal parenting skills; and (5) resolve the issues that led to the child's abuse, which included a requirement that the parents provide a reasonable and consistent explanation for the child's injuries. The parents were subsequently convicted of endangering the welfare of the child, and the state petitioned for custody. Prior to the permanent custody hearing, the mother moved to strike the task that required an explanation of the child's injuries, but the state never filed a brief in response to the motion. Nevertheless, the motion was denied. Following the termination of the mother's parental rights, she challenged the appropriateness of that task on grounds that the task placed her in the untenable position of having to choose between incriminating herself and failing to complete the treatment plan, in violation of her right against self-incrimination, relying on In re A.N., 2000 MT 35, 298 M 237, 995 P2d 427 (2000). The Supreme Court found her reliance on In re A.N. misplaced. The mother waived her self-incrimination privileges by voluntarily testifying regarding her knowledge of the child's injuries at both the permanent custody hearing and during the criminal proceeding and could not argue later that the disputed task impinged on her constitutional privilege against self-incrimination. Further, the state's duty to protect children, as set out in this section, necessitated that the parents come to terms with the reasons why the child was abused, and without demonstrable willingness from the parents to resolve the abuse issues, the District Court had no assurance that the child would not be abused again. Thus, the task was a fair requirement in the treatment plan, and the District Court did not err in concluding that the plan was appropriate or in denying the motion to strike the task from the plan. Denying the motion was within the court's discretion regardless of whether the state filed a brief in response to the motion. In re A.C., 2001 MT 126, 305 M 404, 27 P3d 960 (2001).

No Duty to Third Party: This section describes a duty parents owe to their children, not to third parties. The rule in Montana is that a parent is not liable for a child's tort except as provided in 27-1-718 and 40-6-237. J.L. v. Kienenberger, 257 M 113, 848 P2d 472, 50 St. Rep. 182 (1993), overruled in Crisafulli v. Bass, 2001 MT 316, 308 M 40, 38 P3d 842 (2001), to the extent that Restatement (Second) of Torts 316 (1965) is adopted as a reasonable expression of a parent's duty in Montana, imposing liability on a parent, not for the torts of a child, but for the parent's own failure to exercise reasonable care.

County Properly Dismissed From Suit — State Assumption of Responsibility: A county was properly dismissed from a civil rights action brought by father whose children were removed from the state by social workers because the county retained no enforcement authority under an agreement with the state whereby the state assumed all responsibility for enforcement of the dependent and neglected child statutes. Caldwell v. LeFaver, 928 F2d 331 (9th Cir. 1991).

Qualified Immunity of Department Social Workers in Removing Children to Out-of-State Placement: Social workers who removed minor children from father's home without notice or hearing and arranged for them to stay in another state with their mother, who had joint custody, were not entitled to absolute immunity in father's civil rights action because their actions were neither quasi-prosecutorial nor quasi-judicial in nature. However, the social workers were entitled to qualified immunity because of the emergency nature of their actions and because they did not violate any clearly established constitutional or statutory right. Caldwell v. LeFaver, 928 F2d 331 (9th Cir. 1991).

Preservation of Family Unity as Long-Term Goal — Temporary Out-of-State Custody in Furtherance of Goal: The trial court satisfied the policy to preserve family life set forth in this section (see 1995 amendment) even though temporary custody was awarded the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) for treatment of the child outside of Montana. The trial court made its determination after considering all factors and adopted a treatment plan with ultimate goals of assisting the mother in working to regain physical custody of her child and aiding her in establishing herself as capable of providing the type and quality of care that her child requires. In re B.L.O., 213 M 164, 689 P2d 1246, 41 St. Rep. 2024 (1984).

Abuse and Neglect — Custody With Intervening Divorce: Where a couple voluntarily surrendered their child to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) because of abuse and neglect by the mother, the District Court was correct in continuing with the abuse and neglect custody proceeding rather than dismissing it and allowing custody to be determined in the couple's divorce action. Once a determination of abuse and neglect has been made, the court proceeds to a dispositional hearing to determine the custody of the child. In re M.M., 200 M 244, 650 P2d 784, 39 St. Rep. 1716 (1982).

Family Unity Not to Be Preserved at Expense of Children's Best Interests: After an adjudicatory hearing, the District Court terminated the parental rights of the parents of five children and granted custody with authority to consent to adoption to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). Under Department placement, the children would be separated from each other. The paternal grandmother appealed to the Supreme Court, claiming that the state policy of preserving the unity and welfare of the family as set forth in this section was violated by the separation of the children and by the District Court's refusal to award the children to her. The Supreme Court affirmed because the District Court's findings indicated that it had considered the grandmother's request but that the overriding concern was and ought to have been the best interests of the children. In re M.N., 199 M 407, 649 P2d 749, 39 St. Rep. 1487 (1982).

Protection of Family Unit: Although it is the function of the court to protect the unity of the family, family unity was not a factor when the child's only known natural parent had been confined to a state hospital and the child had been placed in a foster home since birth. The child had never had a viable parent-child relationship with her mother and had never seen or been associated with her natural mother. In re C.M.S., A Dependent and Neglected Child, 187 M 115, 609 P2d 240 (1979).

Voluntary Statements Made to Civilians in Criminal Case — No Invasion of Privacy: On two occasions while the defendant and his stepson were alone, the stepson received serious injuries. On both occasions the defendant made statements to his wife and to several doctors explaining how the injuries occurred. The defendant was charged with aggravated assault and filed a motion to suppress his statements. The defendant contended that the statements violated his right of privacy guaranteed by the Montana Constitution. The court found that there was no element of surreptitious obtaining of the information. Additionally, constitutional provisions on right of privacy permit its invasion upon a showing of a compelling state interest. That compelling state interest is clearly shown in child abuse cases by the declaration of policy contained in 41-3-101. St. v. Hall, 183 M 511, 600 P2d 1180 (1979).

Termination of Parental Rights: When the following things were considered, the record supported the conclusion that the father's rights were adequately considered prior to termination of parental rights and that the decision to terminate them was supported by credible evidence: (1) the father was notified of the hearing, was present, and was represented by counsel; (2) professional testimony indicated the father would not be able to provide enough influence to offset the marked deprivation anticipated to continue for the child; (3) the father was found to have made no effort to assist the mother in learning to become a good parent; (4) the father had visited the child only once in 6 months when the child was in a foster home and had been reported to have abused the child. In re L.F.G., 183 M 239, 598 P2d 1125 (1979).

Youth in Need — Best Interest of Child — Mental Condition of Parent as Sole Factor: When the District Court considered the best interests of a child only after first determining that the child was in fact abused or neglected, it met the required standard. Considering the mental condition of the mother as the primary if not the sole factor, but having evidence that the child would not receive even minimally satisfactory maternal care and would be exposed to extremely high chances of developing a mental condition similar to that of the mother, sufficient credible evidence was before the District Court to support the District Court's decision that the child was a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court rejected the view that mental condition of a parent could not be the sole factor supporting a severance of parental rights. In re L.F.G., 183 M 239, 598 P2d 1125 (1979).

Grounds for Removal From Parents: Under 41-3-102, abuse or neglect can take many forms, some violent, others more passive but just as injurious. The court cannot hold the children hostage while awaiting the good behavior of the parents. It must protect the children's rights as well as the parents. In re T.Y.K., 183 M 91, 598 P2d 593 (1979).

Protection of All Children When Abuse of One Less Than Another: A parent does not have the privilege of inflicting brutal treatment upon each of his children in succession before they individually obtain the protection of the state by virtue of 41-3-101. Section 41-3-101, et seq., grants to the District Court the ability to make a determination of neglect and abuse as to all children in a family based on the policy that abuse of one child has a detrimental effect on the other children's development. In re T.Y.K., 183 M 91, 598 P2d 593 (1979), followed in In re B.T., B.T., M.T., & M.T., 223 M 287, 725 P2d 230, 43 St. Rep. 1728 (1986), In re T.C. & R.C., 240 M 308, 784 P2d 392, 46 St. Rep. 2148 (1989), In re J.A.B., 1999 MT 173, 295 M 227, 983 P2d 387, 56 St. Rep. 675 (1999), and In re M.B., J.B., & W.B., 2004 MT 304, 323 M 468, 100 P3d 1006 (2004).

Preservation of Family Unity: When proof shows a minor child is neglected, it is not possible to preserve family unity. It is when there is a failure of proof that the legislative policy to preserve the unity and welfare of the family must prevail. (See 1995 amendment.) Therefore, the judgment of the District Court awarding permanent custody to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) was proper. Family unity need not be preserved at the expense of a child's best interests. In re Inquiry Into J.J.S., Youth in Need of Care, 176 M 202, 577 P2d 378 (1978).

Insufficient Evidence to Overcome Policy to Preserve Family: Mother's failure to find suitable housing and a decent job after death of father is insufficient adversity to dissolve the family absent a concrete showing that it would be in the best interest of the children. It was a clear abuse of discretion by District Court to award permanent custody to Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public and Human Services) because policy of the State of Montana as declared by the Legislature is to preserve the unity and welfare of the family whenever possible. (See 1995 amendment.) Div. of Child Welfare Serv. v. Fisher, 169 M 254, 545 P2d 654 (1976).

Attorney General's Opinions

Balance of Competing State Interests in Prevention and Reporting of Child Abuse — Abrogation of Communication Privileges by Statute: Although the state has competing interests in the prevention of child abuse and neglect and in protecting the communication privileges between physicians or mental health practitioners and their patients, the communication privilege is abrogated under 41-3-201 in cases where the professional obtains the information as a result of his treatment of the child. 42 A.G. Op. 7 (1987).

County Power — "4-C's": Counties, jointly with the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services), may contract with local "4-C's" projects to provide coordination and support of child abuse prevention and treatment services. 37 A.G. Op. 105 (1978).

PROCEDURE

No Error in Finding Inapplicability of Indian Child Welfare Act to Parental Rights Termination Proceeding: At a hearing to terminate a father's parental rights, the father listed three Indian tribes that he thought either he or the children's mother was affiliated with. The District Court found that although the father was an enrolled member of one of the tribes, the children were not eligible or enrolled with that tribe. The father also asserted that he might have connections to a second tribe because of the mother's alleged membership, but in order for the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) to apply, the child must be either a tribal member or eligible for tribal membership and be the biological child of a tribal member. Because the father could not assert that he was a member of the second tribe, the children could not qualify as members of the second tribe. The father also contended that there was possible heritage with a third tribe through the mother's father, but neither he nor the mother was a tribal member, so the children could not be biological children of a member of the third tribe. Additionally, any connection the children had with the third tribe through their maternal grandfather was preserved by their mother's continued custody and care. Therefore, the District Court did not err in finding that ICWA did not apply. In re J.J.L., D.J.L., and R.D.L.L., 2010 MT 4, 355 Mont. 23, 223 P.3d 921.

Children Relinquished Voluntarily — Finding That Youths in Need of Care Not Clearly Erroneous: A mother who had voluntarily relinquished her children to the state because of an inability to parent the children, even in the safety of a home for domestically abused women, contended that the District Court committed clear error in subsequently adjudicating the children as youths in need of care (YINC) because the court based its decision solely on the children's observations of domestic abuse and violence between the parents and because no psychological evaluations had been conducted on the children and no expert medical testimony was introduced at the termination hearing. The Supreme Court found no clear error on the part of the District Court. The mother cited no authority requiring psychological evaluations or expert medical testimony before a YINC adjudication. Further, the evidence of abuse or neglect necessary to support a YINC adjudication may be actual physical or psychological harm or a substantial risk of physical or psychological harm to the child by acts or omissions of a parent responsible for the child's welfare. Here, the District Court heard testimony at the initial hearing that several incidents had occurred in which the children were directly exposed to domestic abuse and that the father was incarcerated and the mother was unable to parent the children. One of the children had to be placed at a children's receiving home following removal from two foster homes for violent behavior. The mother was shown to have serious mental health issues, including anger issues, that negatively impacted the mother's parenting ability and that remained unaddressed. Under these circumstances, the District Court's conclusion that the children were YINC was affirmed. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 113, 350 M 132, 206 P3d 74 (2009).

Sufficient Evidence to Adjudicate Children as Youths in Need of Care: The District Court properly adjudicated children as youths in need of care based on evidence that: (1) there was a significant prior history of domestic violence and domestic abuse between the parents in the presence of the children; (2) one of the children exhibited various behavior and developmental problems, including running away, violent behavior, anger control problems, and poor language skills; (3) the father could not care for the children because of his long-term federal incarceration; (4) the mother, who was living at a shelter for domestic abuse victims and dealing with mental health issues, had voluntarily surrendered the children to state care because of her inability to adequately parent them; and (5) the state had made reasonable efforts to avoid placement of the children or to make it possible to safely return the children to the home, but protective placement was required. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 98, 350 M 86, 206 P3d 565 (2009). See also In re K.H. and K.M., 2012 MT 175, 366 Mont. 18, 285 P.3d 474, in which the Supreme Court concluded that there was insufficient evidence to adjudicate children as youths in need of care and that the District Court properly considered the mother's past conduct, including her choice of intimate partners, in the context of how that conduct affected the children.

Parent's Acquiescence in Adjudicatory Proceedings — Finding That Child Is Youth in Need of Care Based on Parent's Admissions — Stipulation Not Required: A mother contested termination of her parental rights on grounds that her child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The mother was incarcerated at the time of the hearing and contended that although she agreed to a treatment plan, she never admitted that the child met the definition of a youth in need of care or stipulated that the child was in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that the trial court should have specifically inquired of the mother or her counsel whether the mother stipulated that the child was a youth in need of care, but it was not error for the District Court to make that finding based on the mother's own admissions that she was addicted to methamphetamine and needed treatment and that her addiction impacted the child unfairly. The mother was not placed at an unfair disadvantage during the termination proceedings and was represented by counsel at all stages. She never questioned the regularity of the proceedings until appeal. The court held that because 35 months had passed between the adjudicatory hearing and the notice of appeal, it would not be in the child's best interests to prolong the matter, particularly when much of the delay was caused by the mother's repeated relapses and her failure to put the child's interests above her desire to indulge her addiction. The adjudication was proper and did not prejudice the mother, and the District Court was affirmed. In re A.S., 2006 MT 281, 334 M 280, 146 P3d 778 (2006).

District Court Not Limited to Consideration of Only Physical Neglect in Termination of Parental Rights: The final petition for termination of a mother's parental rights specifically cited physical neglect as its basis, and the mother contended that the District Court was thus barred from considering any evidence beyond physical neglect, such as psychological abuse, as demonstrated by the living conditions in her home. The District Court did not rule on the issue, but simply made the underlying findings necessary to terminate the mother's parental rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although it may have been better if the final petition had listed other grounds, it is proper for the state to consider other causes of abuse and neglect during proceedings because the purpose of the proceedings is to protect the child. The final petition also cited failure to comply with the treatment plan as another basis for termination. The treatment plan addressed the mother's psychological issues related to her parenting skills, so the mother was clearly on notice that psychological issues could be considered. Based on the record, parental rights were properly terminated because the mother failed to comply with the treatment plan, she was unable to properly and consistently parent her children by understanding and meeting each of their needs, her conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time relevant to the developmental needs of the children, and termination was in the best interests of the children. In re J.G., C.G., & M.G.-E., 2004 MT 104, 321 M 54, 89 P3d 11 (2004). See also In re T.D.H., 2015 MT 244, 380 Mont. 401, 356 P.3d 457.

Failure to Adjudicate Youth in Need of Care Precluding Termination of Parental Rights: A parent contended that parental rights were improperly terminated because the child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that such adjudication is a threshold requirement before a court may grant temporary legal custody, order a parental treatment plan, or terminate parental rights. The state argued that the child was found to be a youth in need of care during earlier guardianship proceedings in a different District Court. The Supreme Court cited In re F.M., 2002 MT 180, 311 M 35, 53 P3d 368 (2002), for the holding that evidence received at a hearing on a collateral matter, such as a guardianship proceeding, did not satisfy the adjudicatory requirements of 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437). Further, it was improper for the District Court to approve a treatment plan 10 months prior to proper adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care, in violation of 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) and 41-3-420 (renumbered 41-3-443), which also rendered the requirements of 41-3-609 unsatisfied. Because the child was not properly adjudicated a youth in need of care, court approval of a treatment plan was improper and termination of parental rights was reversed. In re B.N.Y., 2003 MT 241, 317 M 291, 77 P3d 189 (2003).

Attempt to Use Writ of Habeas Corpus to Demand Physical Presence of Children Removed From Parent in Abuse and Neglect Proceeding — Petition Properly Denied: The mother petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus demanding that her children be physically present for an abuse and neglect hearing because they were material witnesses and had been removed from her custody unlawfully. The petition was denied. On appeal, the mother cited In re Bertelson, 189 M 524, 617 P2d 121 (1980), for the proposition that a writ of habeas corpus was the appropriate procedural device to bring the custody matter before a court. The Supreme Court disagreed and distinguished Bertelson because the mother's position ignored the substantial differences between dissolution proceedings and abuse and neglect proceedings, differences that were not at issue in Bertelson. The court also cited its earlier holding in In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982 (2000), in which it was held that the children were properly removed from the mother's home. Because temporary custody of the children with the state was legal, relief pursuant to habeas corpus premised on illegal restraint was not available to the mother under these circumstances. In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Denial of Writ of Habeas Corpus to Compel Attendance of Children in Abuse and Neglect Hearing Not Violative of Due Process Rights or Right to Confront Witnesses: The mother petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus demanding that her children be physically present for an abuse and neglect hearing because they were material witnesses and claiming that the writ was necessary to ensure her due process rights by having the children available to rebut allegations against her at the hearing. The petition was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the mother was entitled to an opportunity for a meaningful hearing, that opportunity need not be provided at the expense of the children whose best interests were the paramount focus of the proceeding, and subjecting the children to direct and cross-examination could exacerbate the abuse that they had already experienced. Denial of the petition did not violate the mother's right to confront witnesses because the children were not her accusers and she had no right to confront them. Rather, the abuse and neglect case was brought by the state, and the mother had ample opportunity to confront and examine the state's witnesses and experts at the hearing, so her due process rights were met. In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Parties in Dissolution Proceeding Not Same as Parties in Abuse and Neglect Proceeding — Res Judicata Inapplicable: During marriage dissolution proceedings, the mother was granted custody of the children, but during a subsequent abuse and neglect proceeding, permanent custody was granted to the father. The mother appealed the placement on grounds that it constituted a readjudication of the earlier custody order in her favor in the dissolution action, in violation of the doctrine of res judicata. The Supreme Court disagreed. Four criteria must be met for res judicata to apply, the first of which is that the parties or their privies are the same. The mother failed to meet this criteria because in the dissolution action, the parties were the mother and father, while in the abuse and neglect proceeding, the parties were the state, the children, and the mother. Despite the fact that the state was investigating claims of abuse within the family during the dissolution action, it was not a party to that action and did not petition for investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) for the children until the dissolution was final. In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

No Treatment Plan Required to Terminate Parental Rights When Child Abandoned: A mother's parental rights were terminated based on the determination that she had abandoned her children, and the mother appealed. The children had been in out-of-home placement for longer than 1 year, and the mother had no contact with the children for almost 6 years, so no court-approved treatment plan was ever devised for the mother. The Supreme Court found that the mother's minimal efforts to contact the Department of Public Health and Human Services after termination proceedings were initiated were not sufficient to show the mother's intent to resume the care of her children, so the District Court did not err when it terminated the mother's parental rights on grounds of abandonment. A treatment plan is not required when the District Court finds that a parent has abandoned a child. In re J.J. & C.J., 2001 MT 131, 305 M 431, 28 P3d 1076 (2001).

Stipulation Not Considered Sufficient Adjudication of Youth in Need of Care — Lack of Jurisdictional Prerequisite to Terminate Parental Rights: The mother entered into a stipulation with the state that her children were youths in need of care only upon several conditions: (1) her parental rights would remain intact; (2) the children would reside with their grandmother; (3) the Casey Family Program would manage the children's cases; (4) the mother would always have contact with the children even if the program was required to intervene between the mother and grandmother; and (5) at an appropriate time when the mother was ready, the program, the Department, and the mother would devise a treatment plan that would be completed by the mother in order to regain custody of the children. At a subsequent hearing, the Department proposed a permanency plan that involved removing the children from their grandmother. The mother contended that the proposal amounted to a failure to abide by the conditions of the stipulation, thereby voiding the conditional stipulation that the children were youths in need of care and precluding the District Court's authority to terminate her parental rights. The Supreme Court agreed. Although a stipulation may be an acceptable alternative to an adjudicatory hearing in many circumstances, the fundamental nature of the rights of a parent requires that the process by which a stipulation is drafted and signed needs to be closely scrutinized. In this case, the stipulation was drafted by the County Attorney and signed by the mother without the benefit of legal counsel and essentially allowed the court to determine that the youths were in need of care without a finding that they were abused or neglected and without a hearing as required by 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). The mother had conflicting feelings about the removal of the children from their grandmother's care and relied on her understanding from the stipulation that the Department would not remove the children or terminate her parental rights, so she did not complete her treatment plan. Only a few days after the initial hearing, she promptly began work toward completion of the treatment plan and had made significant progress, particularly considering the unexpected death of her mother, by the time of the next hearing. Despite the change in circumstances resulting from the death, the Department did not grant the mother any additional time to complete the treatment plan, nor did the Department offer any evidence that the mother had abused or neglected the children. Under the unique facts of this case, the Supreme Court held that the District Court incorrectly found that the stipulation sufficed as an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care. Without that adjudication, the District Court lacked the jurisdictional prerequisite to terminate the mother's parental rights, so the Supreme Court reversed. In Re Custody and Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80, 23 P3d 206 (2001).

Finding That Child Is Youth in Need of Care Prerequisite to Transfer of Custody: The exigent protection of the health and welfare of a child is paramount when the state's initial intervention into otherwise private family matters reveals an actual or potentially dangerous or unhealthy environment requiring the removal of the child from a custodial caregiver. The legal determination that a child is a youth in need of care is a jurisdictional prerequisite for a court-ordered transfer of custody. The first question in a termination proceeding is whether the District Court correctly adjudicated the child as a youth in need of care, and the state need only offer clear and convincing evidence that the court properly adjudicated the child as a youth in need of care in order for the court to inquire into the actual fitness of the parent. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Parent Not Represented by Counsel During Show Cause Hearing Regarding Whether Child a Youth in Need of Care — Due Process Rights Not Violated: At the time of a show cause hearing on whether her child was a youth in need of care, the mother was an indigent mental patient civilly committed to the state hospital. She appeared at the hearing without representation of counsel. The mother contended that the District Court violated her due process rights by making that critical determination regarding the child when she was unrepresented. Although in In re A.S.A., J.L.A., G.A., & A.J.A., 258 M 194, 852 P2d 127 (1993), the Supreme Court held that the constitutional right to due process guarantees an indigent parent the right to court-appointed counsel in parental rights termination proceedings, the court has not extended the right to counsel to a pretermination proceeding in which the focal issue is whether a child is a youth in need of care. Rather, appointment of counsel at any time prior to the initiation of termination proceedings is within the discretion of the District Court. In this case, the initial determination that the child was a youth in need of care was made by order pursuant to a finding of probable cause even before the mother's first appearance in any proceedings when the District Court relied on a report submitted by a social worker showing that the child was abused or neglected or in danger of abuse or neglect and that removal from the home was necessary to protect the child's welfare. Subsequent to the initial determination, the District Court reached the same conclusion on at least three separate occasions when the mother was represented by counsel, including one hearing when the social worker was subjected to cross-examination by the mother's counsel. The Supreme Court applied In re M.F., 201 M 277, 653 P2d 1205 (1982), and in re D.S., H.S., R.S., R.S., J.S., R.S., & K.S., 253 M 484, 833 P2d 1090 (1992), and in holding that the state is not required to provide counsel at proceedings concerning temporary investigative authority or temporary custody. Thus, the mother's due process rights were not violated when the District Court made the determination that the child was a youth in need of care at a time when the mother was not represented by counsel. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Petition Need Not Allege Abuse or Neglect — Facts Establishing Probable Cause Sufficient to Issue Order for Protective Services: A petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) must state the authority requested and facts establishing probable cause that the youth is abused or neglected or in danger of being so and must be accompanied by an affidavit or Department report stating in detail the facts on which the request is based. There is no statutory requirement that the petition contain an allegation of abuse or neglect or the evidence that the Department would present in support of its petition. The fact that the mother stipulated to a 90-day TIA, but not to protective services or the removal of the children from the home, believing that she would retain custody of the children during the 90-day period, did not preclude the District Court from ordering removal of the children from the home. The best interests of the child is paramount and takes precedence over parental rights in abuse and neglect proceedings. In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000).

Threatened Harm to Child — Denial of Motion to Dismiss Proper: When the mother surreptitiously contacted the father, who had had his parental rights terminated after being convicted of murdering the couple's other child, the state petitioned to terminate the mother's parental rights as well. Although witnesses unanimously agreed that the mother and child enjoyed a caring, nurturing, well-bonded mother-son relationship, there was also evidence that the mother would require a period of years to overcome her tendency to enter into addictive relationships with men in which she would not keep her child safe from abuse by her partner. The mother moved to dismiss the petition as inadequate as a matter of law, contending that there was not a sufficient basis to find that the child was a youth in need of care or evidence that she had abused the child. A youth in need of care is one who is abused or neglected, which means that the child has suffered harm or threatened harm to the child's health or welfare. Harm means, inter alia, harm that occurs when a parent exposes or allows the child to be exposed to an unreasonable risk by failing to intervene or eliminate the risk. Threatened harm means substantial risk of harm to the child's health or welfare. The absence of proof of physical abuse by the mother did not mean that the petition must fail because a parent does not have the privilege of inflicting brutal treatment upon each child in succession before the children may individually obtain the protection of the state. Under the circumstances, the motion to dismiss the petition was properly denied. In re J.A.B., 1999 MT 173, 295 M 227, 983 P2d 387, 56 St. Rep. 675 (1999), following In re T.Y.K., 183 M 91, 598 P2d 593 (1979).

Statute Constitutional — Abandonment by Noncustodial Parent: Father whose parental rights were terminated questioned the constitutionality of 41-3-609 with regard to noncustodial parents. The Supreme Court found that the legal relationship between father and child did not change despite the facts that the mother was awarded custody and that the father failed to continue in his obligations to the child. In determining what constitutes abandonment, this section considers the action of the parent responsible for the child's welfare, not the action of the custodial or noncustodial parent. In re M.W., 234 M 530, 764 P2d 1279, 45 St. Rep. 2107 (1988).

Finding of Abuse, Neglect, or Dependency Necessary Before Consideration of Best Interests of the Child: M.G.M. was born out of wedlock and had little contact with her natural father until the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) placed M.G.M. in a foster home and terminated her mother's parental rights. The Department then sought to terminate the father's parental rights. To terminate his parental rights, the court must first find that the child is abused, neglected, or dependent (see 1995 amendment). Only when such a finding has been made can the court apply the best interests of the child test. In re M.G.M., 201 M 400, 654 P2d 994, 39 St. Rep. 2191 (1982).

Prior Felony Conviction — Factor to Be Considered in Parental Termination Proceedings: Although a criminal background does not disqualify one from having custody of his children, it is a factor and should be considered in child abuse and neglect proceedings under 41-3-102. Although the crime itself may not be relevant to the proceeding, the conduct of the father on parole may be, thus the admission of a prior felony conviction at such a hearing was not error. In re T.J.D., J.L.D. & R.J.W., 189 M 147, 615 P2d 212 (1980).

Standard of Proof: The State must show by clear and convincing evidence that the child is neglected or abused before parental rights may be terminated. This standard more adequately furthers the policy of family unity than does the preponderance of evidence standard. In re T.J.D., J.L.D. & R.J.W., 189 M 147, 615 P2d 212 (1980); In re Inquiry Into J.L.B., Youth in Need of Care, 182 M 100, 594 P2d 1127 (1979), followed in In re T.A., 249 M 186, 814 P2d 994, 48 St. Rep. 634 (1991).

Removal of Children Warranted: The District Court did not abuse its discretion when it granted the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services' (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) petition for permanent custody and authority to consent to adoption of three children since they were adjudged dependent (see 1995 amendment) and neglected and there was ample evidence to warrant removal from their parents. In re G., Youth in Need of Care, 174 M 321, 570 P2d 1110 (1977).

Failure to Make Required Findings: The District Court abused its discretion in awarding permanent custody to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) because it patently failed to make the required findings that the child was "abused, dependent [see 1995 amendment], or neglected" and therefore was without power to effect a permanent transfer of custody to a nonparent. In re Fish, 174 M 201, 569 P2d 924 (1977).

Custody Awarded Nonparent: Permanent custody cannot be awarded to a nonparent on the basis of the "best interest" test, it being appropriate only to determine custody rights between natural parents, but rather when natural parents forfeit their rights by not meeting the minimum standards of the child abuse, neglect, and dependent (see 1995 amendment) statutes. Henderson v. Henderson, 174 M 1, 568 P2d 177 (1977).

Constitutionality: This section is not unconstitutionally vague, ambiguous, or uncertain. In re Burgdorf, 170 M 116, 551 P2d 656 (1976).

Constitutionality — Due Process — Least Drastic Alternative: This section is not unconstitutionally vague. When no showing of prejudice is made, mother is represented by counsel in neglect proceeding, and when no demand for a hearing is made, there is not a denial of due process. Mother's attitude may cause court to dispense with evaluation of least restrictive alternative. In re Burgdorf, 170 M 116, 551 P2d 656 (1976).

Sufficiency of Evidence: When the record clearly reflects an established, continuing pattern of abuse and neglect, the decision of the court declaring children to be abused and neglected and awarding custody to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) with the right to grant an adoption will be sustained. In re Bessette, 170 M 122, 551 P2d 653 (1976).

Insufficient Evidence to Overcome Policy to Preserve Family: Mother's failure to find suitable housing and a decent job after death of father is insufficient adversity to dissolve the family absent a concrete showing that it would be in the best interest of the children. It was a clear abuse of discretion by District Court to award permanent custody to Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) because policy of the State of Montana as declared by the Legislature is to preserve the unity and welfare of the family whenever possible. Div. of Child Welfare Serv. v. Fisher, 169 M 254, 545 P2d 654 (1976).

"Dependent" and "Neglected" Distinguished: A "dependent child" (see 1995 amendment) is one who must be supported by someone other than its natural or legal guardians, while a "neglected child", which is a broader term, describes a situation where there has been parental failure to exercise the degree of care demanded by family circumstances. In re Vikse, 147 M 417, 413 P2d 876 (1966).

ABUSE AND NEGLECT

Continued Neglect of Children Sufficient Basis for Termination of Mother's Parental Rights Without Reunification Efforts: A mother appealed the District Court's termination of her parental rights to her two children under 41-3-423 on the basis of neglect. The Supreme Court held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the mother's parental rights without requiring reunification efforts because the record established that the mother's history of continued and worsening drug use and neglect of her children amounted to "chronic, severe neglect" under 41-3-423(2)(a) and that reunification efforts and treatment plans were not in the best interests of the children. In re E.Z.C., 2013 MT 123, 370 Mont. 116, 300 P.3d 1174. See also In re J.A.B. and L.M.F., 2015 MT 28, 378 Mont. 119, 342 P.3d 35.

Chronic, Severe Neglect — Termination of Parental Rights Affirmed — Consideration of Prior Petition Proper: The parents appealed the District Court's finding that they had subjected their children to chronic, severe neglect and its order terminating their parental rights. The parents argued that the Department of Public Health and Human Services was collaterally estopped from introducing evidence contained in a prior petition for temporary legal custody of the children to establish chronic, severe neglect in the present petition. The parents also argued that their conduct did not rise to the level of chronic, severe neglect. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding the elements of collateral estoppel were not met because the issues in the current and prior petitions were not identical and the prior petition was not dismissed as a final judgment on the merits. The Supreme Court upheld the District Court's finding of chronic, severe neglect, noting that discrete instances of neglect, when viewed within a consistent pattern of similar behavior, provide a clear basis for a finding of chronic, severe neglect. In re M.N., J.N., Jr., & R.N., 2011 MT 245, 362 Mont. 186, 261 P.3d 1047. See also In re E.Z.C., 2013 MT 123, 370 Mont. 116, 300 P.3d 1174, and In re L.N., 2014 MT 187, 375 Mont. 480, 329 P.3d 598, in which the Supreme Court affirmed the termination of parental rights to L.N., the fourth child of the parents of J.N., M.N., and R.N. (see above), on the basis that the parents had previously subjected their older children to chronic and severe neglect.

Defendant's Fathering of Own Child Following Assault of Child — Sentencing Condition That Defendant Not Engage in Contact With Children Under 15 Years of Age Affirmed: Rowe was convicted of felony criminal endangerment and misdemeanor negligent endangerment after assaulting a 2-year-old child whom Rowe was babysitting. As a condition of sentence, the District Court prohibited Rowe from having contact with any child under 15 years of age unless supervised by an approved adult. Rowe appealed the sentencing condition on grounds that because he married and fathered a child following conviction, the sentencing condition effectively precluded him from contact with his own child and violated his fundamental right to parent. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court affirmed. Citing In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001), the court noted that the child abuse and neglect statutes reflect the tension between the need to protect family unity whenever possible and the need to provide for the protection of children whose health and welfare are or may be adversely affected and further threatened by the conduct of those responsible for their care and protection, including a parent. Undisputedly, Rowe had an anger problem, and he participated in anger management for several years before the assault but voluntarily stopped taking his medications 2 to 3 weeks prior to the assault. Rowe also committed other incidents of violence in addition to the assault and posed a substantial risk of harm to his own child, so the District Court did not abuse its discretion by imposing a sentencing condition precluding Rowe's contact with his own child. St. v. Rowe, 2009 MT 225, 351 M 334, 217 P3d 471 (2009).

Out-of-State Conviction of Indecency With Child Considered Aggravating Circumstance for Purposes of Terminating Parental Rights: A father was convicted in Texas of indecency with a child. A Montana District Court considered the Texas conviction as an aggravating circumstance in terminating the father's parental rights. On appeal, the father contended that in Texas, the crime of indecency with a child was analogous to indecent exposure and asserted that the state did not introduce clear and convincing evidence that the Texas crime would constitute sexual abuse under Montana law to qualify as an aggravating circumstance. The Supreme Court disagreed. In Montana, the definition of child abuse includes indecent exposure, and the District Court properly concluded that the Texas conviction constituted an aggravating circumstance under Montana law. Chronic and Severe Neglect Inclusive of Emotional Neglect: In terminating parental rights without reunification services, the state relied on 41-3-423 and 41-3-609 in a case of chronic, severe neglect of a child. A parent asserted that parental rights may not be terminated based on a finding of severe emotional neglect, but the Supreme Court held that by definition, neglect includes psychological harm to a child. (See 2023 amendment to 41-3-102.) Here, the parent's ongoing drug use and repeated incarceration resulted in the parent's unavailability to the child and inconsistent caregiving, and this neglect in turn produced high anxiety and emotional disturbance in the child. Parental rights were thus properly terminated based on chronic, severe emotional neglect. In re Custody & Parental Rights of D.S., 2005 MT 275, 329 M 180, 122 P3d 1239 (2005). Failure to Protect Child From Physical Abuse and to Feed Child — Sufficient Evidence of Abuse: Following termination of her parental rights, a mother contended that there was insufficient evidence to find that she had abused her child. The Supreme Court disagreed. There was convincing testimony that the mother failed to protect the child from physical abuse by her boyfriend and that on at least one occasion, she neglected to feed the child until 4:30 p.m. This evidence met the statutory definition of child abuse or neglect, and the characterization of her treatment of the child as abuse was not clearly erroneous. In re Custody & Parental Rights of C.J.K., 2005 MT 67, 326 M 289, 109 P3d 232 (2005).

Proper Finding That Youths in Need of Care — Expert Testimony Based in Part on Hearsay — Adequate Exercise of Independent Factfinding Judgment: The District Court found that two youths were in need of care. The mother appealed on grounds of insufficient evidence and contended that the District Court erroneously adopted the state's findings of fact and conclusions of law without substantial change, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The record contained sufficient credible evidence to support the findings that the children were abused and neglected by the mother's actions that injured the children's capacity to function emotionally or psychologically and thus were youths in need of care. Additionally, it was not error for the District Court to rely on the testimony of a psychology expert, even though the testimony was based in part on hearsay, because the facts and data relied on by the expert were of the type typically relied on by experts in the field of psychology. Moreover, although the verbatim adoption of findings and conclusions of the prevailing party is not favored, the District Court in this case did not in fact adopt the state's findings and conclusions verbatim, but rather exercised independent factfinding judgment. In re A.R. & I.R., 2005 MT 23, 326 M 7, 107 P3d 457 (2005), distinguishing In re Inquiry Into J.L. & D.L., 2000 MT 289, 302 M 254, 14 P3d 473 (2000).

Adjudication of Child as Youth in Need of Care Based on Prospective Abuse Proper: A mother relinquished custody of her three children after the District Court determined that the children were in need of care. When she became pregnant again, the state moved for emergency protective services for the fourth child upon its birth. The father contended that because the child was removed from the parents at birth, it was never abuse or neglected and thus could not properly have been adjudicated as a youth in need of care. Citing In re C.P., 2001 MT 187, 306 M 238, 32 P3d 754 (2001), the Supreme Court disagreed. The circumstances related to the prior termination of the mother's parental rights to her three children had not changed, and because she would also be the primary caregiver for the fourth child, there was substantial risk to the health and welfare of the newborn child as well, so the District Court did not err in adjudicating the fourth child as a youth in need of care based on prospective abuse. In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003).

Failure to Hold Adjudicatory Hearing to Determine Whether Children in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Improper Absent Adjudication of Status of Children: The District Court held several hearings concerning temporary investigative authority, granting several extensions, and also held several hearings concerning granting temporary legal custody, which was extended twice. The state then filed a petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. Temporary legal custody was extended a third time pending a hearing on the termination hearing. At the hearing, the mother's parental rights were terminated, and she appealed. The Supreme Court found that there had never been an adjudicatory hearing at which the District Court heard testimony or received evidence concerning whether the children were abused or neglected. The hearing for temporary legal custody did not equate to an adjudication by the court that the children were youths in need of care, even in light of an alleged stipulation by the mother to that effect. Absent an adjudicatory hearing and an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care, termination of parental rights was improper, and the order was reversed. In re M.O., M.O., & M.O., 2003 MT 4, 314 M 13, 62 P3d 265 (2003).

Substantial Risk of Harm to Child — Parental Rights Terminated Despite Lack of Evidence of Abuse or Neglect: A girl was born to a mother who was later divorced and remarried. When the girl was 15, she had sexual intercourse with her stepfather and conceived a baby. The state petitioned for temporary investigative authority (TIA) and emergency protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) over both the girl and her baby, pursuant to 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). The mother then agreed to divorce the stepfather so that he could marry the girl. The petition regarding the girl was dismissed because she was married and was no longer subject to the mother's parental control. At the show cause hearing on the petition regarding protection of the baby, a state social worker testified that, although there was no indication of actual abuse or neglect of the baby, there was concern for the baby's safety should the baby be placed in the home with the girl and stepfather. The state ultimately petitioned to terminate the girl's parental rights to the baby. The District Court determined that the baby was a youth in need of care and terminated the girl's parental rights. The girl appealed on grounds that the court's determination that the baby was a youth in need of care was erroneous, absent any evidence of abuse, neglect, or abandonment, and that the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) was insufficient on its face because it contained no allegations that the baby was abused or neglected. However, the definition of abuse or neglect in this section includes either actual harm or the substantial risk of harm. Thus, the report required by 41-3-427 need set forth in detail only facts supporting the petition's request for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) based on the assertion that a child is abused or neglected or is in danger of being abused or neglected. The social worker's testimony was considered sufficient to support a finding that there was substantial risk of harm to the baby if returned to the girl's custody; therefore, the District Court's determination that the baby was a youth in need of care was correct. The court's finding that under the circumstances, the baby had little hope of a normal emotional, moral, and psychological development with his parents was also supported by substantial evidence and was not clearly erroneous, based on the social worker's testimony that the girl's relationship with the stepfather was unhealthy, that the family unit exhibited extremely poor boundaries, and that the girl had obvious psychological damage from being sexually abused by her father and would, without successful treatment, be unable to set appropriate boundaries for the baby or be able to understand the risk of harm that her relationship with the stepfather posed to the baby. The Supreme Court affirmed. In re D.T.H., 2001 MT 138, 305 M 502, 29 P3d 1003 (2001).

Child in Danger of Abuse and Neglect Subject to Adjudication Regardless of Whether Actual Abuse or Neglect Occurred: A child who is in danger of being abused or neglected may be considered a youth in need of care regardless of whether actual abuse or neglect occurred, irrespective of a parent's care for the child prior to the parent's incarceration or commitment to a mental hospital. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Source of Children's PTSD Not Traceable to Father — No Abuse of Discretion by Court That Held Children Not Suffering From Abuse and Neglect Caused by Father — Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427) and Temporary Legal Custody Properly Terminated: John, who pleaded guilty to negligent homicide in the death of his psychotic wife, Nancy, petitioned the District Court for the termination of temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) and temporary legal custody of the Department of Public Health and Human Services, and the petition was granted. The Supreme Court held that the Department's authority was properly terminated because the District Court could not and did not find that the posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) suffered by John's children was caused by their father's behavior. The expert testimony given at trial showed that the children's PTSD could have been caused by living with their psychotic mother and not by their father's killing of their mother and his subsequent attempt to cover up the murder. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly found that the children were not abused or neglected by their father and that the District Court therefore did not abuse its discretion when it granted John's petition and terminated the Department's authority. In re Inquiry Into J.L. & D.L., 2000 MT 289, 302 M 254, 14 P3d 473, 57 St. Rep. 1219 (2000).

Failure to Detect and Prevent Abuse: In an action to terminate a mother's parental rights, although the District Court found that the mother knew of her daughters' sexual abuse, the court specifically stated that her knowledge of the abuse was irrelevant to its ultimate determination because the mother failed to notice what was occurring and repeatedly left the children with persons who were not competent or safe caretakers. Such conduct satisfies the requirements of this section. In re Inquiry Into M.M., 274 M 166, 906 P2d 675, 52 St. Rep. 1170 (1995).

Proof of Sexual Abuse Not Necessary to Conclusion That Child Is Youth in Need of Care: A finding that a child was sexually abused was not a prerequisite to a conclusion that the child was a youth in need of care warranting placement of the child with the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). The conclusion was proper in light of the combination of the testimony of four expert witnesses, a video deposition of the child, a series of nude photos of the child taken by the parents, evidence of spousal physical abuse in the presence of the child, and the fact that the father did not provide as evidence the results of his court-ordered psychological evaluation. In re H.D., 256 M 70, 844 P2d 114, 49 St. Rep. 1141 (1992).

Evidence of Abuse and Neglect Sufficient to Find Youth in Need of Care: When a mother's actions over a 4-year period were marked by indifference to and neglect of her parental responsibilities, including failure to assume physical care of her son and insensitivity to his emotional needs, the District Court did not err in determining that the child was a youth in need of care and that his well-being would be best served by remaining in the custody of his grandparents. In re R.T.L.P., 238 M 384, 777 P2d 892, 46 St. Rep. 1354 (1989).

Custody Transfer Supported by Evidence of Substantial Impairment: A psychologist testified that a child suffered substantial impairment of psychological function during her stay with her natural father and would be at risk of increased emotional stress if the placement continued. The evidence presented was sufficient to prove that the child was a youth in need of care and to support the lower court transfer of custody to the state, with reasonable visitation rights maintained by the father. In re M.G.M., 228 M 184, 741 P2d 770, 44 St. Rep. 1443 (1987).

Three Prerequisites for Termination of Parental Rights: The Supreme Court found substantial credible evidence that the three prerequisites for termination of parental rights were met: (1) that S.B. was a youth in need of care under the statutory definitions of 41-3-102 since the child failed to thrive due to carelessness of the parent (citing In re C.A.R. & P.J.R., 214 M 174, 693 P2d 1214, 41 St. Rep. 2395 (1984)); (2) that a court-approved treatment plan was unsuccessful (citing In re R.J.W., 197 M 286, 642 P2d 1072, 39 St. Rep. 568 (1982)); and (3) that the conduct or condition rendering the parent unfit to provide adequate care was unlikely to change within a reasonable time (citing In re R.J.W., supra). In re S.B., 223 M 36, 724 P2d 168, 43 St. Rep. 1512 (1986).

Mother's Lack of Care — Harm Caused to Children's Physical and Mental Welfare — Children Abused and Neglected: In applying the applicable definitions to the present case, the trial court properly determined the two children were youths in need of care because they had been abused and neglected by their mother. This abuse and neglect resulted from their mother's failure to care for and attend to the children, causing serious physical problems and injury to their cognitive and emotional development. Also, their mother allowed a sexual assault to be committed against one of the children, which resulted in harm to the child's welfare. The mother's conduct was unlikely to change significantly in the future. Under these circumstances, the court properly terminated the mother's parental rights and awarded permanent custody with the authority to consent to adoption to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). In re C.A.R. & P.J.R., 214 M 174, 693 P2d 1214, 41 St. Rep. 2395 (1984).

Evidence Supporting Designation as Youth in Need of Care: Evidence that the child failed to thrive in the family home, that both parents refused to comply with recommended drug and alcohol abuse treatment programs, and that the mother had been unsuccessful in learning how to care properly for her child was sufficient to support designation of the child as a youth in need of care. In re R.J.W., 197 M 286, 642 P2d 1072, 39 St. Rep. 568 (1982).

Extreme and Prolonged Uncleanliness: Regardless of any actual proof that a parent intentionally inflicted injuries upon his child, the occurrence of serious and frequent, yet unexplained, physical injuries to the child is sufficient to properly bring the child within the statutory definition of abuse or neglect. Additionally, the statute is broad enough to include extreme and prolonged uncleanliness under the definition of neglect. In re A.J.S., 193 M 79, 630 P2d 217, 38 St. Rep. 947 (1981).

Substantial Evidence to Support Finding of Neglect or Abuse: Where the evidence offered in a proceeding to declare youths in need of care included testimony by two clinical psychologists that the mental and physical state of appellant's offspring deteriorated when the offspring was in the care of appellant and that appellant's newborn child would also suffer the same consequences, and also testimony to the effect that appellant was physically abusive, there is substantial credible evidence to support the District Court's conclusion that appellant's offspring were in need of care and termination of parental rights was justified. Based upon examination of the offered evidence, in relation to the declared policy of this state to promote normal childhood development and to provide for the protection of children whose health and welfare are or may be adversely affected by the conduct of those responsible for their care, the District Court found the offspring abused or neglected as those terms are defined in 41-3-102. In re J.L.F. and H.A.F., 192 M 63, 626 P2d 253, 38 St. Rep. 533 (1981). See also In re C.A.R. & P.J.R., 214 M 174, 693 P2d 1214, 41 St. Rep. 2395 (1984).

Declaration of Child as Youth in Need of Care — Custody Awarded to Agency — Evidence of Abuse or Neglect: A child diagnosed as failing to thrive was given to foster parents. Professional personnel all agreed that the child in question was failing to thrive and that the child's condition deteriorated while in the care of the natural mother. The child's condition improved dramatically while in foster care. The District Court's finding and conclusion that the child was a neglected child was supported by "clear and convincing" evidence and the court was justified in permanently depriving the natural mother of the child and transferring legal custody to SRS (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). In re M.R.L., 186 M 468, 608 P2d 134 (1980).

Termination of Parental Rights — Factors Considered: When the following things were considered, the record supported the conclusion that the father's rights were adequately considered prior to termination of parental rights and that the decision to terminate them was supported by credible evidence: (1) the father was notified of the hearing, was present, and was represented by counsel; (2) professional testimony indicated the father would not be able to provide enough influence to offset the marked deprivation anticipated to continue for the child; (3) the father was found to have made no effort to assist the mother in learning to become a good parent; (4) the father had visited the child only once in 6 months when the child was in a foster home and had been reported to have abused the child. In re L.F.G., 183 M 239, 598 P2d 1125 (1979).

Youth in Need — Best Interests of Child — Mental Condition of Parent as Sole Factor: When the District Court considered the best interests of a child only after first determining that the child was in fact abused or neglected, it met the required standard. Considering the mental condition of the mother as the primary if not the sole factor, but having evidence that the child would not receive even minimally satisfactory maternal care and would be exposed to extremely high chances of developing a mental condition similar to that of the mother, sufficient credible evidence was before the District Court to support the District Court's decision that the child was a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court rejected the view that mental condition of a parent could not be the sole factor supporting a severance of parental rights. In re L.F.G., 183 M 239, 598 P2d 1125 (1979).

Protection of All Children When Abuse of One Less Than Another: A parent does not have the privilege of inflicting brutal treatment upon each of his children in succession before they individually obtain the protection of the state by virtue of 41-3-101. Section 41-3-101, et seq., grants to the District Court the ability to make a determination of neglect and abuse as to all children in a family based on the policy that abuse of one child has a detrimental effect on the other children's development. In re T.Y.K., 183 M 91, 598 P2d 593 (1979), followed in In re B.T., B.T., M.T., & M.T., 223 M 287, 725 P2d 230, 43 St. Rep. 1728 (1986), In re T.C. & R.C., 240 M 308, 784 P2d 392, 46 St. Rep. 2148 (1989), In re J.A.B., 1999 MT 173, 295 M 227, 983 P2d 387, 56 St. Rep. 675 (1999), and In re M.B., J.B., & W.B., 2004 MT 304, 323 M 468, 100 P3d 1006 (2004).

Definition of Neglect: The definition of neglect includes emotional deprivation, inadequate nutrition, and extreme and prolonged uncleanliness of the child. In re Inquiry Into J.L.B., Youth in Need of Care, 182 M 100, 594 P2d 1127 (1979).

Termination of Parental Rights: The state may not terminate a parent's right to raise his or her own child merely because a court or state agency feels that a nonparent has more financial resources or pursues a preferable lifestyle. In re Inquiry Into J.L.B., Youth in Need of Care, 182 M 100, 594 P2d 1127 (1979).

Absence of Abuse or Neglect: Judgment was reversed and custody of two children taken from their maternal aunt and returned to the natural father since there was no showing that the children were abused or neglected. The court improperly deprived the father of custody by means of the subterfuge of a guardianship that had outlived the purpose for which it was created. In re Guardianship of Doney, 174 M 282, 570 P2d 575 (1977), followed in Babcock v. Wonnacott, 268 M 149, 885 P2d 522, 51 St. Rep. 1224 (1994). Youth in Need of Care — Transfer of Custody: It was clear from the record that appellant was unwilling or unable to provide care necessary for the physical and emotional well-being of her children, and testimony supported the court's finding that the children were abused and neglected youths in need of care within the meaning of this section and its judgment transferring permanent legal custody of the children to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) pursuant to 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438). In re Moyer, 173 M 208, 567 P2d 47 (1977).

Children's Best Interest and Welfare Paramount Concern: Substantial credible evidence that father maltreated children and was incompetent, coupled with evidence mother did not provide proper or sufficient food, clothing, or sanitary or medical care was sufficient to support finding and judgment that children were dependent and neglected, awarding permanent care, custody, and control to proper state agency, with right to consent to children's adoption. In re Jones, 168 M 1, 539 P2d 1193 (1975).

Mental Retardation Due to Emotional Deprivation: Children who have become mentally retarded due to emotional deprivation and lack of environmental stimulation are neglected children within the meaning of the law. In re Olson, 164 M 431, 524 P2d 779 (1974).

Fitness of Parents:

Minor children were dependent (see 1995 amendment) and neglected within meaning of the statutory definition, notwithstanding possible fitness of natural mother for their custody, when she had acquiesced and permitted them to remain in care and custody of welfare department. In re Bad Yellow Hair, 162 M 107, 509 P2d 9 (1973).

A child was properly found dependent and neglected based on mother's declaration in waiver and the consent to adoption that she could not provide care and guidance and could not perform duties of a parent. Application of Hendrickson, 159 M 217, 496 P2d 1115 (1972).

Evidence of mother's use of welfare funds to supply her alcoholic needs, lack of medical care for her children, threats to kill the children, and other failures to make proper provision for the children warranted a finding that the children were neglected and the entry of an order committing them to custody of the state. In re Corneliusen, 159 M 6, 494 P2d 908 (1972).

ABANDONMENT

Termination of Parental Rights — Willful Surrender of Children to Other Parent Without Maintaining Contact for 3 Years — Abandonment of Children: In 2001, the parties divorced and the mother received custody of their two children. In 2006, to avoid termination proceedings against her, the mother stipulated with the Department of Health and Human Services (the Department) to transfer custody of the children to the father. Three years later, the Department removed the children from the father and petitioned to terminate the parental rights of both parents. The District Court ultimately terminated the mother's parental rights, finding that the mother had willfully abandoned the children. The mother appealed, alleging that she could not have abandoned the children when she did not have custody of them. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's ruling that the mother had abandoned her children because she had surrendered custody and had not maintained any contact with the children since 2008. In re E.M.S. and C.A.S., 2011 MT 307, 363 Mont. 68, 265 P.3d 1258.

No Evidence of Willful Parental Abandonment — Termination of Parental Rights Not Warranted: After only sporadic contact between a father and his child over a period of several years and failure of the father to fully comply with child support obligations, the mother petitioned to terminate the father's parental rights on grounds that the father had abandoned the child. The District Court denied the petition and the mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Termination of parental rights based on abandonment of a child is not appropriate unless there is clear and convincing evidence that the child was willfully abandoned. In this case, the totality of the circumstances showed that the father's conduct was more in the character of immature, ignorant, uncertain, and lacking in diligent attention to his parenting responsibilities rather than a willful manifestation of intent to abandon the child. The mere fact that the father may have violated a court order within the meaning of 42-2-608 by failing to meet child support obligations in full did not mean that, as a matter of law, his parental rights must be terminated. Thus, although the father was not a model parent, the mother failed to meet the burden of demonstrating by clear and convincing evidence that the father was unfit. Therefore, the District Court properly applied its discretion in denying the petition. In re Stepparent Adoption of B.W.Z.-S., 2009 MT 433, 354 M 116, 222 P3d 613 (2009).

District Court's Finding of Abandonment Not Supported by Substantial Credible Evidence: The District Court terminated the parental rights of the natural father, holding that the father left the child under circumstances making it reasonable to believe that he did not intend to assume the child's care, thereby abandoning her. The Supreme Court stated that a parent's right of custody, though secondary to the child's best interests, is a fundamental liberty interest and must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures. The Supreme Court noted that the father, although in prison, had contacted the caseworker, County Attorney, and mother, among others, conveying that he was interested in parenting the child. In addition, the father had completed, parenting and anger management programs in prison even though the Department of Public Health and Human Services had not set up a treatment plan for the father as ordered by the District Court. The Supreme Court held that in light of the circumstances, the action of the District Court in finding abandonment was clearly erroneous and remanded the case. In re S.S., K.C., & J.C., 2002 MT 270, 312 M 343, 59 P3d 393 (2002).

Improper Termination of Rights of Noncustodial Parent on Grounds of Abandonment Absent Showing of Willful Surrender of Custody: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights after finding that he abandoned his children by willfully surrendering physical custody for a period of 6 months without manifesting a firm intention to resume physical custody or making permanent physical arrangements for care of the children. The father appealed on grounds that he could not have willfully surrendered custody because he did not have physical custody of the children, who were initially with the mother and then in state foster care. The Supreme Court agreed. Acknowledging that pursuant to In re M.W., 234 M 530, 764 P2d 1279 (1988), it is possible for a court to find that a noncustodial parent has abandoned children, that finding must be based on evidence that the parent did not intend to resume the children's care, which was not the case here. Rather, the District Court in this case found that the father willfully surrendered physical custody, which was directly controverted by the fact that the father could not surrender custody that he did not have. Termination of the father's parental rights under that theory of abandonment was reversible error. In re T.C. & W.C., 2001 MT 264, 307 M 244, 37 P3d 70 (2001).

Abandonment Held to Constitute Abuse or Neglect: The father appealed the termination of his parental rights, arguing that the trial court's finding of abandonment did not constitute a finding of abuse or neglect required by statute to terminate parental rights. The Supreme Court ruled that in the past, it had implicitly upheld terminations on the basis of abandonment and that it was clarifying its earlier rulings by holding that abandonment is "harm to a child's welfare" and that "harm to a child's welfare" is a statutory ground for a finding of "child abuse or neglect" upon which a termination of parental rights may be founded. In re M.J.W., 1998 MT 142, 289 M 232, 961 P2d 105, 55 St. Rep. 563 (1998), followed in In re T.H. & C.D.F., 2005 MT 237, 328 M 428, 121 P3d 541 (2005).

Father Objects to Wrong Period Used to Determine Abandonment: The father appealed the termination of his parental rights on the basis that the court relied on statements by a social worker that pertained to a period before she had any personal knowledge of the case and therefore the statements were hearsay. The Supreme Court upheld the lower court's ruling, stating that only one sentence of the social worker's statement pertained to the early period and the rest of the report dealt with the period after the social worker had personal knowledge of the case. In re M.J.W., 1998 MT 142, 289 M 232, 961 P2d 105, 55 St. Rep. 563 (1998).

Evidence of Intent to Remedy Child's Situation During Time of Alleged Abandonment — Finding of Abandonment Reversed: The state alleged abandonment by father from September 1994 to January 1995. Evidence showed that father had an unimpressive history as a parent, offering little or no financial or emotional support during the first 5 years of his son's life. Nevertheless, father's actions during the time in question, including a petition to modify the dissolution decree to allow him visitation, contact with the mother to arrange visitation, and a trip from Wisconsin to visit his son, precluded a finding of abandonment during that finite period. In re W.Z., 285 M 16, 946 P2d 125, 54 St. Rep. 1019 (1997).

Termination of Parental Rights Based on Abandonment — Sporadic Attempts to Maintain Custody of Child Held Insufficient: Linda, the natural mother of P.E., left P.E. at a camping site with persons barely known to Linda. For the next 14 months, Linda traveled with persons with known criminal records, failed to give social workers her address and phone number on several occasions, failed to accept or maintain gainful employment, and failed to keep appointments with social workers or to appear at hearings to determine the status of P.E. Despite her expressed intent to resume physical custody, the District Court terminated her parental rights. Citing In re Adoption of C.R.D., 240 M 106, 782 P2d 1280 (1989), the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that Linda's sporadic attempts to maintain physical custody of P.E. did not constitute "a firm intention to resume physical custody" pursuant to this section. In re P.E., 282 M 52, 934 P2d 206, 54 St. Rep. 237 (1997).

Record to Reflect Parent's Intention to Abandon Child: The District Court held that the mother had been in prison for more than 6 months prior to the adoption hearing and that absence constituted abandonment. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that nothing in the record showed any intention on the mother's part to abandon her children and that a showing of such an intention was required in addition to an absence exceeding 6 months. In re Adoption of Jane, John, & Mary Doe, 277 M 251, 921 P2d 875, 53 St. Rep. 631 (1996).

Inability to Contribute Financial Support to Child Not Abandonment — Third-Party Petition to Adopt Properly Dismissed: Parents of S.P.M. were divorced and granted joint custody of the child. After a period of time, the father took sole custody after a Department of Family Services (now Department of Health and Human Services) worker filed a report concluding that the mother's new partner was abusing the child. The original joint custody decree was not modified. The father and child moved out of state for 4 years. On their return, the mother petitioned for custody and visitation. In response, the father's new wife petitioned to adopt the child. The District Court dismissed the wife's petition on the grounds that the mother's consent to adoption was required and that the mother had not abandoned the child. The 6-month requirement for abandonment in this section applies only to the willful surrender of custody, and even though the mother had not supported the child for 4 years, this did not constitute abandonment when the mother was not capable of providing financial support. Adoption of S.P.M., 266 M 269, 880 P2d 297, 51 St. Rep. 808 (1994).

Six-Month Abandonment Requirement Applicable Only to Willful Surrender of Physical Custody: The requirement in this section that applies a 6-month period to the definition of abandonment that is part of the definition of harm to a child's health or welfare is applicable only to the willful surrender of physical custody of the child. It was therefore proper to terminate the parental rights of a parent who left children for a 5-month period under circumstances that made reasonable the belief that the parent did not intend to resume care of them. In re A.E., C.E., S.R., & J.R., 255 M 56, 840 P2d 572, 49 St. Rep. 877 (1992), followed in In re W.Z., 285 M 16, 946 P2d 125, 54 St. Rep. 1019 (1997).

Natural Father's Consent to Adoption Not Required When Evidence Clear He Abandoned Child: The father had only visited with his daughter twice and called her on the telephone twice in 8 years and during that time never paid support. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's finding that the record contained clear and convincing evidence that the natural father had willfully abandoned his daughter, and therefore his consent to the child's adoption by her grandparents was not required. Adoption of C.R.D., 240 M 106, 782 P2d 1280, 46 St. Rep. 1979 (1989), followed in In re P.E., 282 M 52, 934 P2d 206, 54 St. Rep. 237 (1997).

Lack of Contact for Three Years Constituting Abandonment: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parental rights of a father who abandoned his child by having no contact for 3 years and by indicating at no time his intention to resume custody until he learned his parental rights had been terminated. In re M.W., 234 M 530, 764 P2d 1279, 45 St. Rep. 2107 (1988).

Question of Abandonment Not Within Subject Matter Jurisdiction Regarding Modification: Husband was served a petition for adoption of his children by wife's new husband. The petition alleged abandonment. The District Court improperly considered the question of abandonment during the postdissolution hearing, which centered around the issues of visitation and unpaid child support. The question was outside the scope of issues included within the original dissolution decree, was to be decided by the court hearing the adoption proceedings, and should have been dismissed under former Rule 12(h)(3), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded). In re Marriage of Callahan, 233 M 465, 762 P2d 205, 45 St. Rep. 1639 (1988).

Sufficiency of Evidence of Abused or Neglected Child: Evidence of failure to supply an adequate home environment and of abandonment for a 6-month period, plus evidence that a parent never complied with a court-approved treatment plan, was sufficient to warrant finding a youth to be abused or neglected and to allow temporary custody with the state. In re C.G., 230 M 117, 747 P2d 1369, 45 St. Rep. 63 (1988).

Evidence of Abandonment — Termination Proper: Evidence of abandonment warranting termination of parental rights was sufficient when the father had no contact and did not state any intention of resuming care of his children for a period of 2 years and did not make known his intention to acquire custody until 3 months after he was informed of the custody proceedings filed by the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). In re M.J.D., C.K.D., & A.R.D., 225 M 200, 731 P2d 937, 44 St. Rep. 167 (1987).

Abandonment — Termination Proceedings to Be Fundamentally Fair: Termination of a natural parent's right to care and custody of a child is a fundamental liberty interest in Montana, which must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures. In a proceeding to terminate parental rights, the mother testified that on the advice of a social worker she refused to disclose to the father, who was in prison, the name of the child's foster parents; the father testified that while in prison he had tried to contact his son and see how he was doing. The Supreme Court held that this testimony contradicted the District Court's finding that father had abandoned child, and the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court for additional findings of fact and conclusions in light of specific requirements of 41-3-102. The Supreme Court also found the District Court record insufficient to conclude whether or not implementation of a treatment plan was attempted or feasible. The rights of parents cannot be terminated unless the parents have failed to comply with a court-approved treatment plan. In re R.B., 217 M 99, 703 P2d 846, 42 St. Rep. 1055 (1985), followed in In re W.Z., 285 M 16, 946 P2d 125, 54 St. Rep. 1019 (1997), and In re A.W-M., 1998 MT 157, 289 M 333, 960 P2d 779, 55 St. Rep. 628 (1998).

Child Custody — Normal Development — Jurisdiction: When a child was present in Montana, having been abandoned by both of her natural parents, having been subjected to mistreatment and abuse, and having been threatened with further mistreatment and abuse, her situation met the test for jurisdiction expressed in 40-4-211. Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).

Abandonment: Mother leaving infant with babysitter for 1 night and not returning for approximately 1 month supports a finding of abandonment and a dependency upon the public for support when 2 days after mother's departure welfare department was awarded temporary custody. In re Henderson, 168 M 329, 542 P2d 1204 (1975).

Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 458 in (1)(c), after "neglected", deleted "or caused the dependency of"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

Case Notes

Termination of Parental Rights — Removal of Infant — Mother Located in Another State — Department Policies Not Followed — Evidentiary Admissions Clarified: The Montana Department of Public Health and Human Services, Child and Family Services Division, became involved with a mother and child when the mother tested positive for methamphetamine and marijuana at the child's birth. During portions of the proceeding, the mother lived in different states, did not own a vehicle, did not have a driver's license, and could not make it to Montana due to weather. The District Court ultimately terminated the mother's parental rights, finding that the mother did not successfully complete her treatment plan and the condition rendering her unfit, unable, or unwilling to parent was unlikely to change. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the Department failed to provide reasonable efforts to place the child as close as possible to the mother's home in violation of the Department's policies, that it did not implement a service provision plan that could successfully address the mother's substance abuse problem, that the removal of an infant implicates different services than the removal of an older child, that it failed to take efforts to identify or locate a potential kinship placement, that it failed to provide reasonable efforts designed to reunify the mother and her child, and that the presumption in favor of termination in 41-3-604 was misplaced. The court then clarified In re M.C., 2017 MT 252, 389 Mont. 78, 403 P.3d 1266, to hold that it did not intend that case to be interpreted to permit courts to admit any and all written reports or evaluations or service-related documents over otherwise valid hearsay or foundation objections. In re R.J.F., 2019 MT 113, 395 Mont 454, 443 P.3d 387.

Youth in Need of Care — Subject Matter Jurisdiction for Termination Proceedings: A child was designated a youth in need of care after being removed from her mother's care. Following a termination hearing, the District Court terminated the father's rights. On appeal, the father argued that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction over the termination proceedings because it had approved a "checklist" instead of a treatment plan for him. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that as long as the child had been designated a youth in need of care, the District Court had subject matter jurisdiction over the proceedings. The court also clarified that there is no requirement that a parent be designated as an "offending parent" before a court can make decisions regarding the best interests of a child who is suspected of being abused or neglected. In re K.B., 2016 MT 73, 383 Mont. 85, 368 P.3d 722.

Parties No Longer Resident in Montana — Relinquishment of Montana Jurisdiction Proper: In 2000, a Montana District Court established child custody with the father, who lived in California, and held that the mother, a Montana resident, was not to have contact with the children until she addressed her psychological disorders. The father subsequently registered the Montana decision with the California courts to allow enforcement of the Montana decision in California, if necessary, and the mother moved to Minnesota. In 2007, the mother petitioned the Montana court to relinquish jurisdiction because none of the parties lived in Montana, but the court decided to retain jurisdiction and denied the petition, so the mother appealed. The father cited 41-3-103 in support of his contention that the Montana court retained jurisdiction because the case was a child abuse and neglect proceeding. However, Montana later adopted the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act (UCCJEA), which applies to and provides greater protections in child abuse and neglect proceedings, so the provisions of 40-7-103 prevail over 41-3-103. Under 40-7-202 of the UCCJEA, a Montana District Court retains exclusive, continuing jurisdiction of child custody proceedings until one of two specific events occurs, the second of which is a determination that none of the relevant parties presently reside in Montana. Thus, it was an abuse of discretion for the District Court to fail to make a determination whether the relevant parties lived in Montana. The Supreme Court reversed with instructions to relinquish jurisdiction over the Montana custody order. In re B.P. & A.P., 2008 MT 166, 343 M 345, 184 P3d 334 (2008).

Jurisdiction Based on Presence of Child in Montana: In a case in which the natural parents were residents of Wyoming but the child was born in Montana and present in Montana, the District Court had jurisdiction in an action to terminate parental rights under the abuse and neglect statutes, based on the presence of the child in Montana. In re Parental Rights of Baby Girl W., 249 M 206, 814 P2d 976, 48 St. Rep. 643 (1991).

Youth Court Jurisdiction Concurrent With District Court: The Youth Court has concurrent jurisdiction with the District Court over all youths who are within the state for any purpose. (See 2001 amendment.) Upon the petition for temporary custody filed by the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services), the Youth Court had the authority to determine that the child in question was a youth in need of care, to remove her from her mother's abusive home, and, following a dispositional hearing, to place her in the custody of her natural father. In re C.C., 237 M 246, 772 P2d 857, 46 St. Rep. 773 (1989).

Voluntary Relinquishment of Custody — Intervening Divorce — Custody Determined in Abuse and Neglect Proceeding: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in awarding custody of a child to his father after the parents, while still married, surrendered temporary custody to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) because of the actions of the mother. Subsequent to the surrender of the child but prior to the award of custody, the couple began dissolution proceedings. The mother contended the court should have terminated the abuse and neglect proceeding. There was substantial evidence that the father was stable and nonabusive and the mother had potential for further abuse. Once a determination of abuse or neglect has been made, the court proceeds to a dispositional hearing. The intervening divorce and collateral custody matter were not relevant to the court in this matter. In re M.M., 200 M 244, 650 P2d 784, 39 St. Rep. 1716 (1982).

Jurisdiction Based on Service: The District Court lacked jurisdiction to find a minor child dependent and neglected and to award her to the care of the child welfare service when service of citation was by publication and there was no service of notice of the action on the father who was a resident of the county. In re Young, 143 M 230, 388 P2d 379 (1964).

Residence of Petitioner:

Since the District Court's jurisdiction had to be determined as of the time a proceeding was commenced, the issue of the petitioner's residence did not become moot even though the petitioner had established the necessary residence since the hearing in the proceeding. (See 2001 amendment.) State ex rel. Cowan v. District Court, 131 M 502, 312 P2d 119 (1957).

Where petitioner was not domiciled and thus not a resident of the county where the child resided, the District Court was without power to attempt to confer jurisdiction by an amendment to conform to the alleged proof that petitioner was domiciled in such county. State ex rel. Cowan v. District Court, 131 M 502, 312 P2d 119 (1957).

Case Notes

No Findings on Active Efforts and Improper Evidentiary Standard Applied in Youth in Need of Care and Temporary Legal Custody Proceeding — Invalidation Not Required: The District Court adjudicated a child as a youth in need of care and granted temporary legal custody to the Department of Public Health and Human Services. No qualified expert witness testified at the hearing, and the District Court failed to apply the clear and convincing evidence standard required by the federal Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA). On appeal, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the District Court had not complied with the requirements of the ICWA, but the Supreme Court found that it was not required or appropriate to invalidate the proceedings as a result because the mother had stipulated to the adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care and the grant of temporary legal custody and the District Court had found that the child would suffer serious emotional or physical harm if placed in the mother's care. In re K.L.N., 2021 MT 56, 403 Mont. 342, 482 P.3d 650.

Determination of Children's Membership and Eligibility for Enrollment in Tribe — Requirements of Indian Child Welfare Act: The mother in a termination proceeding claimed that she and her two daughters were "direct descendant[s] of the Rocky Boy Band of Chippewa Indians" and that they qualified for enrollment. After the District Court terminated the mother's parental rights, she appealed. The Supreme Court found that the District Court had failed to confirm that the Department of Public Health and Human Services had sent notice of the involuntary child custody proceedings by certified mail, that the Chippewa Cree Tribe had received notice of the proceedings, or that verification of the status of one of the children had been requested. Concluding that the Department had failed to meet standards of the Indian Child Welfare Act, the court reversed and remanded for an appropriate threshold determination of the children's membership and eligibility for enrollment. In re L.A.G. & N.L., 2018 MT 255, 393 Mont. 146, 429 P.3d 629.

Active Efforts by State to Preserve Indian Families — Success Not Guaranteed: The Indian Child Welfare Act, 25 U.S.C. 1912(d), requires active efforts by the state to prevent the breakup of the Indian family. The family in this proceeding did not dispute the increased level of services but alleged that the state set up the family to fail. The Supreme Court found that the record did not show that the state actually caused the termination of the parents' parental rights; the outcome of remedial services depends on the parents' ability and willingness to develop the necessary skills to provide the child with a safe living environment, and the state cannot guarantee a successful outcome. In re I.B., 2011 MT 82, 360 Mont. 132, 255 P.3d 56.

Termination of Parental Rights — Requirements of Indian Child Welfare Act: Under the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978, 25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq., the party seeking termination of an individual's parental rights to an Indian child under state law must satisfy the court that active efforts have been made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs designed to prevent the breakup of the Indian family and that the efforts have proved unsuccessful. The party seeking termination has the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that the continued custody of the child by the parent or Indian custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child. Case Notes

Questioning by Guardian Ad Litem at Hearing Allowed — Partial Compliance — Extension of Temporary Legal Custody Proper: The Department of Public Health and Human Services petitioned for emergency protective services following reports of inappropriate behavior by the minors' parents. Eventually, at a hearing to terminate the father's parental rights, the District Court allowed the minors' guardian ad litem to question a child protection specialist and therapist over the objections of the father. The District Court subsequently terminated the father's parental rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the District Court did not err in allowing the children's guardian ad litem to cross-examine witnesses, although some lines of questioning lacked foundation and should have not been permitted. The Supreme Court also found that the Department provided reasonable efforts to reunify the father with the children, that the father's partial compliance with the treatment plan was not sufficient for compliance, that while the Department did not file for a formal motion to extend an order for temporary legal custody the Department nevertheless requested it, and that the father failed to identify which of his three attorneys he believed were ineffective over the course of his 4-year case. In re B.F., 2020 MT 223, 401 Mont. 185, 472 P.3d 142.

Abuse of Discretion to Allow CASA to Subpoena Father's Therapy Notes and to Cross-Examine Him — Harmless Error: In a parental termination proceeding, the District Court allowed the child's court-appointed special advocate (CASA) to subpoena the father's therapy notes and allowed her to cross-examine him. After his parental rights were terminated, the father appealed. The Supreme Court agreed that the District Court had abused its discretion and that the CASA had exceeded the scope of her authority; however, based on other evidence in the record, it concluded the error to be harmless. In re J.D., 2019 MT 63, 395 Mont. 141, 437 P.3d 131.

Admission of Drug Results at Termination Hearing Improper — Sufficient Evidence in Support of Termination of Parental Rights: During a parental rights termination hearing, the District Court, citing 41-3-112(4), admitted the parents' drug test results through a court-appointed special advocate (CASA) and subsequently terminated the parents' rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that admitting the drug test results through the CASA was erroneous. The Supreme Court stated that 41-3-112(4) was enacted to allow a guardian ad litem to gather information from collateral sources to form and make recommendations as to the best interest of the child and that the subsection was not enacted as a bypass for the Department of Public Health and Human Services to admit evidence that would otherwise be inadmissible or to cure a party's failure to call a witness to testify. However, the Supreme Court affirmed, finding that admitting the drug test results was harmless and reversal was not warranted because substantial evidence supported the District Court's determination that the parents had failed to complete their treatment plans and that their conduct or the conditions rendering them unfit were unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In re I.M., 2018 MT 61, 391 Mont. 42, 414 P.3d 797.

Party Entitled to Cross-Examine GAL Issuing Report — Violation of Due Process — Harmless Error: In a termination of parental rights proceeding, the District Court did not allow the father to cross-examine the child's guardian ad litem (GAL) who had prepared and submitted a written report. The Supreme Court held that a court violates a party's due process rights when it does not allow the party to cross-examine a witness who has issued a written report to the court. In this case, the failure to allow the father to examine the GAL constituted harmless error, as the report did not contain any information not already before the District Court. In re R.M.T., 2011 MT 164, 361 Mont. 159, 256 P.3d 935.

No Denial of Fair Procedures in Grant of Long-Term Custody of Child to State — Failure of Parent to Properly Object to Procedures at Hearing: Long-term custody of a child was granted to the state. The father appealed on grounds that he was denied fundamentally fair procedures in the custody proceedings, contending that: (1) the District Court failed to hold a permanency hearing within the statutory deadline; (2) the state failed to submit the statutorily required prehearing report to the District Court; (3) the state failed to develop a plan with any elements of permanency; (4) the state tried to terminate his visitation rights without satisfying the requisite statutory criteria and burden of proof; and (5) the District Court erroneously granted the state a second chance to prove its case. The Supreme Court considered each claim in turn, and affirmed. Although the permanency hearing occurred after the statutory deadline in 41-3-412 (renumbered 41-3-445), the father did not raise the issue in District Court or advise the District Court of the appropriate remedy as required, and raising the issue in a proposed conclusion of law did not constitute a proper objection. The father also neglected to object to the absence of a prehearing report either at the hearing or by pretrial motion, so those issues were not properly preserved for appeal. The contention that the state failed to develop a plan with any elements of permanency was belied by evidence showing that the child had made reasonable progress toward a settled placement. The question of whether there was any merit to the state's attempt to terminate visitation was moot because the District Court reinstated visitation at the permanency hearing. Moreover, disallowing the state a second opportunity to present its case would have required that the District Court overlook the best interests of the child by ignoring substantial evidence that the child continued to suffer both emotionally and mentally. It was the father who objected to the form of the evidence as first offered, and because the evidence was originally offered in a form authorized by statute, the child's best interests were paramount, and the father could not demonstrate prejudice in the District Court's granting of another hearing to hear the evidence. In re M.W. & L.W., 2002 MT 126, 310 M 103, 49 P3d 31 (2002).

Denial of Request to Remove Guardian Ad Litem Not Error: At the hearing on the petition for TIA and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), the mother requested removal of the guardian ad litem who had worked with the family for 2 years. The District Court declined, which was not error in light of the lack of evidence that the guardian had not performed the required statutory duties. In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000), affirmed in In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

No Standing by Former Parent to Object to Child's Placement or Assert Child's Rights: Once the parent-child relationship is terminated by the District Court, a former parent has no standing to object to the court's subsequent placement of the child with the Department or by adoption. Similarly, a former parent has no standing to assert a violation of the child's rights as guardian ad litem because the former parent no longer represents the child. In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999).

No Requirement That Parent Pay Fees and Costs of Guardian Ad Litem: Pursuant to a petition for temporary investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), three minor children were removed from their home and later returned to their parents' care. The District Court ordered the parents to reimburse the county for the fees and costs of the guardian ad litem appointed to represent the children. However, neither the plain language of 41-3-303 (renumbered 41-3-112), its legislative history, nor its statutory context suggest any intent by the Legislature to require parents to pay for guardian ad litem representation following a petition for protective services. The District Court order constituted reversible error. In re Inquiry Into A.W., D.G., & M.G., Jr., 1999 MT 42, 293 M 358, 975 P2d 1250, 56 St. Rep. 186 (1999).

Failure to Notify Guardian Ad Litem of Adoption Proceedings — Reversible Error: A guardian ad litem is required to represent a child in every case in which child abuse or neglect is alleged, and that representation continues until the child is permanently placed. Therefore, failure by the court to notify an unplaced child's guardian ad litem of a hearing on a petition for permanent adoption constituted reversible error. In re F.H., 272 M 342, 901 P2d 96, 52 St. Rep. 791 (1995).

Case Notes

Mother Lacked Standing to Challenge Placement of Indian Child After Parental Rights Terminated: The District Court issued an order terminating the parental rights of the appellant mother and ordering the placement of two children, C.B.D. and P.M.P., in separate placements. On appeal, the mother challenged the placement of P.M.P. only and did not challenge the termination itself. The Supreme Court held that the mother lacked standing to appeal P.M.P.'s placement. Because her appeal came after the District Court terminated her parental rights, she no longer had any legal status relative to P.M.P. and therefore she was alleging an injury to a civil right that she no longer had and made no effort to regain. The appeal of P.M.P.'s placement did not stay the termination of her parental rights, and therefore she lacked standing to maintain her appeal. In re C.B.D. & P.M.P., 2017 MT 108, 387 Mont. 347, 394 P.3d 202.

Standing to Appeal Dismissal of Petition for Adjudication: After the District Court dismissed the state's petition for the adjudication of two children as youths in need of care, counsel for the children appealed although the children wished to return to their mother. The mother argued that the children did not have standing to appeal and that counsel for the children should have advocated only for what the children desired. The Supreme Court concluded that the children had standing to appeal and that counsel acted appropriately by advocating for adjudication despite the children's contrary desires. Amendment effective July 1, 2007.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 382 in (1) inserted second sentence pertaining to foster care reviews; in (2)(a) in second sentence decreased minimum number of committee members from five to three and inserted third sentence pertaining to the socioeconomic, racial, and ethnic makeup of the committee; in (2)(b)(i) after "department" inserted "who may not be responsible for the placement of the child or have any other direct conflict of interest"; deleted former (2)(b) that read: "(b) a representative of the youth court"; deleted former (2)(d) that read: "(d) a representative of a local school district"; deleted former (2)(f) that read: "(f) if there is one, the foster parent of the child whose care is under review. Within 30 days of the foster care review, the committee shall provide the youth court and the department with a written report of its findings and recommendations for further action by the youth court or the department.

(4) The department shall adopt rules necessary to carry out the purposes of this section. The rules must provide for policies and procedures consistent with the provisions regarding notice, written findings and recommendations, conflict of interest, recordkeeping, sibling reviews, disclosure and immunity under 41-3-1010, and the deliberation provisions of 41-3-1012"; inserted (4) providing guidelines for sending notice prior to a review; inserted (5) authorizing the committee to hold joint or separate reviews for siblings; inserted (6) requiring the committee to prepare findings and recommendations after a permanency hearing; inserted (7) pertaining to a party objecting to the committee's findings in a permanency hearing and obtaining a hearing on the objections by the court; in (9) in two places substituted "district court" for "youth court"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 25, 2005.

2001 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 311 in (1) substituted "district court judge" for "youth court judge"; and in (2) at end substituted "the Adoption and Safe Families Act of 1997, as enacted" for "federal law and may not be later than the 12-month anniversary date of the child's placement into foster care". Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Chapter 570 in (2) in third sentence after "comply with" substituted "the Adoption and Safe Families Act of 1997" for "federal law and may not be later than the 12-month anniversary date of the child's placement into foster care"; in (4) inserted second sentence requiring that rules be consistent with provisions regarding notice, written findings and recommendations, conflict of interest, recordkeeping, sibling reviews, disclosure and immunity, and deliberation; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 610 at beginning of (1) inserted exception clause; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1993.

1987 Amendments: Chapter 260 inserted (1)(e) requiring that, for Indian child whose care is under review, foster care review committee appoint, if possible, Indian person knowledgeable about Indian culture.

Chapter 609 in first sentence of (2), after "department", deleted "or the youth court" and after "41-3-1122" deleted "or 41-3-1121(2)".

1983 Amendment: Chapter 201, in (1), increased minimum committee membership from four to five; inserted (1)(e) requiring appointment of foster parent to foster care review committee.

Chapter 465, in (2), changed "41-3-104" to "41-3-1122" and "41-5-801(2)" to "41-3-1121(2)".

Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to SB 228 [Ch. 297, L. 1981] provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because in addition to amending sections 41-3-104, 41-3-501, 41-5-801 [renumbered 41-3-1122; 41-3-1102; and 41-3-1121, now repealed], and 53-4-112 [renumbered 52-2-112], the bill creates rulemaking authority for the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services [now Department of Public Health and Human Services] to administer a review of children in foster care under the department's supervision or for whom the department is making payment under section 41-3-104(2) or 41-5-801(2) [renumbered 41-3-1122(2); and 41-3-1121(2), now repealed].

It is the intent of this bill to indicate the legislature's support of permanency planning for children in foster care and to direct the department to continue its efforts in this area. This bill is intended to encourage reduction of the numbers of children in foster care; to expediently return children to their natural homes when possible, or to free the children for alternate permanent placements; thereby assuring the appropriate utilization of public funds and that the best interest of children in placement in Montana are being met by the department's program.

Rulemaking is primarily necessary to implement Section 2 [41-5-807] [renumbered 41-3-1115] and subsection (3) of Section 1 of the bill [41-3-104] [renumbered 41-3-1122]. These sections require that a foster care review committee be established by the court to conduct reviews of children in foster care and provide written reports to the youth court and the department. Rules would identify which children are to be reviewed, and would list precisely what information is to be shared with the review committee, when the committees are to conduct business, the general guidelines for the committees' operation, the time limitations for conducting the reviews, and who may participate in the review. As for the information to be reported, the rules will ask for:

(1) summary reports of the review to include the recommendations of the committee regarding the continuation or discontinuation of foster care and reasons; treatment needs of the child; and court action;

(2) sufficient information to allow the tracking of the reviews; to facilitate: follow-up services, compliance with court orders, agency decisions, and response to committee recommendations; and to provide necessary reports on the department's foster care program."

Case Notes

Claims Alleging Negligence Based on Failure to Report Child Abuse — Church Exception Applied: The plaintiffs, all of whom were members of the defendant church, were victims of sexual abuse by their stepfather. The victims reported the abuse to church elders as it was ongoing. Although church elders investigated, none of them reported the abuse to the police. Later, the plaintiffs sued the church for negligence for the elders' failure to report the abuse to the authorities. The District Court granted the plaintiffs partial summary judgment on their negligence per se claim, and the plaintiffs were awarded $35 million by the jury. On appeal, the defendant argued that the District Court erred as a matter of law because church elders are excepted from general mandatory reporting requirements under 41-3-201. The Supreme Court agreed that the elders were not mandatory reporters because the church had a doctrine, canon, or practice that required its clergy to keep reports of child abuse confidential. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed and entered summary judgment in favor of the defendant. Nunez v. Watchtower Bible & Tract Soc'y, 2020 MT 3, 398 Mont. 261, 455 P.3d 829. See also Watchtower Bible & Tract Soc'y of N.Y., Inc. v. 20th Judicial District Court, 2021 MT 13, 403 Mont. 57, 479 P.3d 946, in which the Supreme Court determined it was within the District Court's discretion on remand to allow the plaintiff to amend her complaint to revive her common law negligence claim.

Findings of District Court Regarding Custody of Child With Mother Not Erroneous Despite Evidence of Inappropriate Physical Contact Between Child and Mother's Relative: As part of a paternity action, the mother was awarded primary physical custody, and the father appealed. An amended parenting plan arrived at during mediation gave each parent physical custody of the child during alternating months. Near the end of one month's visit with the father, the child divulged that inappropriate physical contact with her stepgrandfather had occurred while in the mother's custody. The father moved for modification of the parenting plan. The District Court was faced with conflicting evidence in the case, receiving testimony from the stepgrandfather that no inappropriate touching occurred, as well as testimony from professionals who opined that sexual abuse had occurred. Additional expert testimony suggested that the child's constant travel was a possible cause of her troubling behavior and that the experts who suggested that sexual abuse occurred had not followed standard protocols when interviewing the child. Lay testimony indicated that it was unlikely that the stepgrandfather had an opportunity to commit the alleged abuse. The court ultimately determined that sexual abuse had not been proved. The father appealed on grounds that the court's findings were insufficient, that the court erred in not giving the father custody based on the evidence presented, and that the court erred by apparently rejecting the testimony of the child's clinical psychologist and the disclosures made by the child relating to sexual abuse. The Supreme Court noted that credibility determinations are within the province of the trier of fact and held that, in light of the conflicting testimony, the trial court's findings and conclusions were sufficient to support the court's decision. Although the trial court did not specifically articulate the elements of 40-4-212, it clearly made determinations that it considered to be in the child's best interests. Failure to list the contentions of a particular witness, such as the child's clinical psychologist, was not sufficient to determine a per se abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court. Without a clear showing of abuse of discretion, the Supreme Court declined to disturb the decision and affirmed the denial of the father's motion to modify the parenting plan. Jury to Be Informed of Duty to Report: In a negligence action alleging abuse of a foster child, the Supreme Court reversed, ruling that the District Court erred in refusing to instruct the jury of the Department's statutory duty to notify the County Attorney of a child abuse report. Newville v. St., 267 M 237, 883 P2d 793, 51 St. Rep. 758 (1994).

Reporting Mandate and Immunity Applied to Social Worker Reporting Event Sixteen Years Previous: A clinical social worker running a therapy group was subject to the reporting mandate of this section, despite assurances of strict confidentiality and despite the fact that alleged incidents of sexual abuse occurred 16 years earlier. Absent evidence that the social worker acted in bad faith or with malicious purpose, the immunity granted by 41-3-203 was properly extended. Gross v. Myers, 229 M 509, 748 P2d 459, 44 St. Rep. 2176 (1987).

Ability to Support Child: Since ability of parents to support children was not determined in compliance with sections 10-506 and 10-507, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), but was left to testimony to be elicited at a later hearing, order compelling parents to pay support costs in action depriving them of the children was set aside. In re Phelps, 145 M 557, 402 P2d 593 (1965).

Attorney General's Opinions

Centralized Intake System Authorized — Fulfillment of Reporting Requirements Absent Properly Adopted Administrative Rule: By amendment in 2001, the Legislature required the Department of Public Health and Human Services to assess reports of child abuse or neglect in order to determine whether investigation or some lesser response is appropriate and granted the Department the authority to determine the appropriate response time, but did not specify how the Department was to implement the legislation. The Department developed the centralized intake system as the method to meet the statutory directive. However, the Department established the system without formal adoption as an administrative rule. Because the centralized intake system implements a law and affects private rights or procedures available to the public, the Attorney General held that the system is a rule, subject to the Montana Administrative Procedure Act. Thus, until adopted as an administrative rule, the centralized intake system may not be used to restrict which Department personnel may receive a report. Further, counties are no longer involved in providing child protective services, so they are no longer local affiliates of the Department, as the term is used in this section. Therefore, mandatory reporters may fulfill their reporting obligations by reporting child abuse and neglect to a local child protective services worker or supervisor or to the Department through the Centralized Intake Bureau. 50 A.G. Op. 4 (2004).

Balance of Competing State Interests in Prevention and Reporting of Child Abuse — Abrogation of Communication Privileges by Statute: Although the state has competing interests in the prevention of child abuse and neglect and in protecting the communication privileges between physicians or mental health practitioners and their patients, the communication privilege is abrogated under 41-3-201 in cases where the professional obtains the information as a result of his treatment of the child. 42 A.G. Op. 7 (1987).

Statutory Reporting Requirements Not Preempted by Federal Confidentiality Provisions: The provisions of this section requiring disclosure of child abuse or neglect known by a chemical dependency counselor are not preempted by the confidentiality provisions of the federal Comprehensive Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism Prevention, Treatment, and Rehabilitation Act amendments of 1974, 42 U.S.C. 290dd-3. 42 A.G. Op. 7 (1987).

Case Notes

Effective Assistance of Counsel — Exclusion of Statements Contained in Report Regarding Child Abuse Investigation: After a jury convicted the defendant of incest, sexual intercourse without consent, and sexual assault, the defendant filed a petition for postconviction relief, claiming numerous instances of ineffective assistance of counsel. In one instance, the defendant claimed counsel should have moved to exclude several statements the defendant made in connection with a Department of Public Health and Human Services investigation of child abuse. The defendant argued 41-3-202(5)(b), which requires the destruction of an "unfounded" report, required the destruction of the report, including the defendant's statements, well before his trial. The Supreme Court disagreed, concluding that although a detective had used the word "unfounded" in the report, the department closed the investigation as "unsubstantiated". Because 41-3-202(5)(c) provides that "unsubstantiated" reports must be destroyed within 30 days after the end of the 3-year period starting from the date the report was determined unsubstantiated, the destruction date of the report would have been after the defendant's trial. Therefore, counsel was not ineffective for not attempting to exclude the defendant's statements under 41-3-202(5)(b). Riggs v. St., 2011 MT 239, 362 Mont. 140, 264 P.3d 693.

Unsubstantiated Reports From Another Jurisdiction — Prohibition on Use Not Retroactive: In an abuse and neglect proceeding in 2001, the court ordered the physician doing psychological evaluations of the parents to consider historical documents, including the father's unsubstantiated child neglect history from California from 1997 and a 1990 conviction for exhibiting a firearm. On appeal of the termination of parental rights, the mother asserted that the use of the information violated the spirit of the Montana statute requiring unsubstantiated reports to be destroyed after 3 years. The requirement to destroy unsubstantiated records was enacted in 2003 and was not retroactive. Without legislative intent, statutes do not apply retroactively, so the 2003 statute did not apply to the District Court's 2001 decision. The court did not err in requiring the physician to consider unsubstantiated allegations from California. In re D.B., 2004 MT 371, 325 M 13, 103 P3d 1026 (2004).

Home Visit Not Required: An investigation into the home under this section is not inadequate merely because the social worker did not visit the home. The parents refused to cooperate with the welfare department. Therefore, they will not be allowed to now complain that information is missing from the record. In re S.L.T., 215 M 289, 697 P2d 472, 42 St. Rep. 366 (1985).

Case Notes

Negligence Claim for Improper Removal of Children Rejected — State Entitled to Immunity — No Evidence Employees Were Grossly Negligent or Provided False Information: Plaintiff alleged that the state and Broadwater County negligently failed to adequately investigate a social worker's report before removing her children from her care. The state moved for summary judgment, arguing that it was immune from suit under 41-3-203. The District Court denied the state's immunity claim but granted summary judgment to the state on the grounds that the plaintiff had not provided expert testimony necessary to establish that the investigator was subject to and violated a standard of care. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the state is entitled as a matter of law to immunity from the plaintiff's claims under 41-3-203. The court reasoned that the plaintiff failed to establish a genuine issue of material fact to support her claim that the state employees involved in the investigation were grossly negligent or knowingly provided false information. Reporting Mandate and Immunity Applied to Social Worker Reporting Event Sixteen Years Previous: A clinical social worker running a therapy group was subject to the reporting mandate of 41-3-201, despite assurances of strict confidentiality and despite the fact that alleged incidents of sexual abuse occurred 16 years earlier. Absent evidence that the social worker acted in bad faith or with malicious purpose, the immunity granted by this section was properly extended. (See 1995 amendment.) Gross v. Case Notes

Closure of Mazurek Hearing — No Violation of Right to Public Trial: The defendant was accused of molesting his girlfriend's 11-year-old daughter. At trial, the defendant wanted to introduce evidence of the daughter accusing two other men of sexual assault when she was 4 years old. The District Court closed the hearing to determine whether that evidence would be allowed, a process also known as a Mazurek hearing after State ex. rel. Mazurek v. 4th Judicial District Court, 277 Mont. 349, 922 P.2d 474 (1996). After the District Court disallowed the evidence, a jury convicted the defendant. On appeal, the defendant claimed that the District Court had violated his right to a public trial when it closed the Mazurek hearing. The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed, ruling that the factors of the victim's age and her well-being, as well as the statutory safeguards in 41-3-205 and 45-5-511, weighed in favor of closing the hearing. St. v. Hoff, 2016 MT 244, 385 Mont. 85, 385 P.3d 945.

Denial of Motion to Compel Without In Camera Inspection — District Court Error — Remanded for Review of Records: The defendant was charged with incest. His counsel filed a motion to compel the discovery of records about the victims that could contain exculpatory information and that were in the possession of the Department of Public Health and Human Services. The District Court denied the motion without conducting an in camera review of the records and the defendant appealed following his conviction. The Supreme Court ruled that the District Court had a duty to review the records to determine whether they contained exculpatory evidence and dismissed the appeal without prejudice to allow the District Court to perform the in camera review and rule accordingly. St. v. Johnston, 2014 MT 329, 377 Mont. 291, 339 P.3d 829.

No Error in Conducting In Camera Inspection of Abuse of Minor Investigative File: During a trial in which the defendant was charged with assault with a weapon for injuries sustained by one of the defendant's minor sons, the District Court did not err in denying the defendant access to a Child and Family Services Division investigative file. The District Court appropriately conducted an in camera inspection of the file pursuant to 41-3-205(2) and determined that the entire contents of the file should not be released. Evidence that a social worker failed to take notes during a meeting with the minor would not have bolstered the defendant's testimony. St. v. Knowles, 2010 MT 186, 357 Mont. 272, 239 P.3d 129.

Statute Not Facially Unconstitutional: Plaintiff, an entity authorized to obtain child abuse information pursuant to 41-3-205, reported allegations of child abuse and neglect at the Swan Valley Youth Academy, which prompted an investigation. Plaintiff was provided a final report and wished to disseminate the report without seeking a court order. Plaintiff filed an action to allow public dissemination and to invalidate 41-3-205(7) as facially unconstitutional because of the alleged failure of the statute to balance the public's right to know against the right of individual privacy. The District Court determined that disclosure of child abuse and neglect records required a case-by-case analysis and review of redacted materials. The court refused to provide plaintiff with prospective relief and granted summary judgment to the state, so plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court noted that any future report prepared by the state regarding alleged abuse or neglect will present a unique factual scenario that requires a careful balancing of the constitutional provisions at issue, to be conducted according to the mechanism for balancing of interests provided in 41-3-205(2), which then properly permits public disclosure following in camera inspection and further redaction of private information. Thus, in light of the myriad of future factual scenarios to which 41-3-205 must be applied, the statute could not be determined to be facially unconstitutional. Disability Rights Mont. v. St., 2009 MT 100, 350 M 101, 207 P3d 1092 (2009). See also Havre Daily News, LLC v. Havre, 2006 MT 215, 333 M 331, 142 P3d 864 (2006).

Judicial Notice of Mother's Prior Termination Proceeding in Action to Terminate Father's Parental Rights — No Error: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights after taking judicial notice of the sealed record of the mother's prior termination proceeding. The father asserted error because the court took notice of facts that were not known and could not be discovered by the father. The Supreme Court disagreed. Rules 201 and 202, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), allow the District Court to take judicial notice of certain facts of record. Although sealed, the record was not entirely inaccessible because the father could have petitioned for disclosure of the records under this section, but he did not, even though he was aware of the prior proceeding. In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003).

Denial of Defendant's Access to Rape Victim's Counselor and Counselor's Records Upheld: Muir was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with a victim under 16 years of age. Prior to and during trial, Muir requested access to the victim's psychological counselor and to the counselor's records because the counselor was listed as a potential witness. However, after an in camera review of the records by the District Court, Muir was given access only to an investigator's note of an interview with the victim's counselor. The Supreme Court held that Muir was properly denied access to the counselor and the counselor's records because the victim's conversations with the counselor are privileged and the District Court found no exculpatory evidence in the records. Citing St. v. Reynolds, 243 M 1, 792 P2d 1111 (1990), the Supreme Court also reasoned that a defendant's right to pretrial discovery is not equivalent to a defendant's constitutional right of confrontation and that Muir had shown no correlation between the victim's emotional problems and her consent to sexual intercourse. St. v. Muir, 263 M 241, 867 P2d 1094, 51 St. Rep. 19 (1994).

Termination of Parental Rights — Father Not Allowed "In Camera" Inspection of Entire File: In proceedings to terminate a father's parental rights, when the father moved for an "in camera" inspection of the entire Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) file and the Department objected to disclosure of reports prepared by the foster parents, it was not clearly erroneous for the District Court to deny disclosure of evidence in view of failure on the part of the father's counsel to attempt to limit or specify in any manner the information requested. (See 41-3-431 enacted in 2023.) In re M.A.W. & K.M.W., 256 M 296, 846 P2d 985, 50 St. Rep. 64 (1993).

Limited Discovery of Department Files Proper: It was proper for the District Court to conduct its own inspection of the Department of Family Services' (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) files and to produce for defendant's use those documents the court felt were relevant and necessary to the defense. Limited discovery, rather than complete disclosure, was warranted under this section. (See 41-3-431 enacted in 2023.) St. v. Goodwin, 249 M 1, 813 P2d 953, 48 St. Rep. 539 (1991).

Examination of Social Worker's File Not Allowed — No Violation of Constitutional Rights: Defendant in a child abuse case claimed his constitutional rights were violated by the District Court's refusal to allow him to examine the file of the social worker assigned to his case. The Supreme Court relied on Pa. v. Ritchie, 480 US 39, 94 L Ed 2d 40, 107 S Ct 989 (1987), in holding that Montana's child abuse confidentiality statute, this section, as it applies to file review, does not violate a defendant's right to confront his accusers. Further, as long as the trial court has the statutory authority to review the file in camera and to release material information from the file to the accused, defendant's right to a fair trial is fully protected. (See 41-3-431 enacted in 2023.) St. v. Thiel, 236 M 63, 768 P2d 343, 46 St. Rep. 182 (1989), followed in St. v. Donnelly, 244 M 371, 798 P2d 89, 47 St. Rep. 1600 (1990), and in St. v. Little, 260 M 460, 861 P2d 154, 50 St. Rep. 1124 (1993). See also St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979, 48 St. Rep. 588 (1991), which overruled Donnelly with regard to augmentation of sentence for failure to admit guilt.

Censure of Attorney Disseminating Confidential Information Protected by Statute: A lawyer was publicly censured by the Montana Supreme Court for obtaining confidential information from his law firm's files and from the files of the County Attorney and for disseminating the information to parties not entitled to it, notwithstanding the confidentiality requirements of this section. Censure was changed from oral censure in the Supreme Court's courtroom to censure in writing by that court and placed in the court's records, because it would be a financial burden for him to appear in court as he lived out of state. In re Wyse, 215 M 82, 697 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 198 (1985).

Confidentiality of Records on Child Abuse and Neglect — Not Violative of Confrontation Rights: An attorney being disciplined for violating the confidentiality provisions of 41-3-205 did not prevail in his contention that the section conflicted with the right of confrontation guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., and the sixth amendment to the United States Constitution because the attorney, in his zeal to get information relevant to his client, did not make an application to the court for permission to disseminate the information. In re Wyse, 212 M 339, 688 P2d 758, 41 St. Rep. 1780 (1984).

"Unauthorized Dissemination" and "Public Disclosure" Not Synonymous: The terms "unauthorized dissemination" in subsection (1) and "public disclosure" in subsection (3) are not synonymous. Any unauthorized dissemination, public or private, is prohibited under subsection (1); the term "public disclosure" comes into play if a request is made to the court to permit the same and the court finds such public disclosure necessary for the fair resolution of the issue before it. In re Wyse, 212 M 339, 688 P2d 758, 41 St. Rep. 1780 (1984).

Contempt for Violation — Defense Barred: Attorney charged with contempt of court for unauthorized dissemination, in violation of this section, of information in records of dependent and neglected child proceeding could not argue this section was vague where he admitted that he knew such a statute existed and that a court order was probably needed to obtain the information but did not bother to look up the statute prior to his dissemination. Wyse v. District Court, 195 M 434, 636 P2d 865, 38 St. Rep. 2005 (1981). See also In re Wyse, 212 M 339, 688 P2d 758, 41 St. Rep. 1780 (1984).

Contempt for Violation — Standards for Attorneys: Attorney charged with contempt of court for violating this section was a licensed professional and an officer of the court and was not subject to the reasonable man standard but to a higher standard, one dictated by the nature of his profession. Wyse v. District Court, 195 M 434, 636 P2d 865, 38 St. Rep. 2005 (1981). See also In re Wyse, 212 M 339, 688 P2d 758, 41 St. Rep. 1780 (1984).

Inclusion of Juvenile Record in Presentence Report: Section 41-3-205 does not support appellant's contention that it was improper to include his juvenile record in a presentence report since that section applies only to dependence and neglect situations and not to proceedings for delinquents under the Montana Youth Court Act. Section 41-5-604 (renumbered 41-5-216) does not support appellant's contention either, because the prevention of public dissemination of a juvenile record once that individual attains an age of majority is accomplished by sealing the presentence report. St. v. Radi, 185 M 38, 604 P2d 318 (1979).

Exception to Confidentiality: The confidentiality of privileged communications did not prevent disclosure of information obtained by school nurse, public nurse, and social welfare workers as evidence at custody hearing for dependent and neglected children. In re Jones & Peterson Children, 168 M 1, 539 P2d 1193 (1975).

Investigatory Interview — Presence of School Staff Member Prohibited: A school district policy requiring that an individual investigating a child abuse or neglect case have a school staff member present at the child's interview if the interview is conducted without parental notification is prohibited. 42 A.G. Op. 2 (1987).

Disclosure of Case Records and Reports of Child Abuse and Neglect: Absent a court order, 41-3-205 prohibits the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) from disclosing case records and reports of child abuse and neglect to: (1) the natural parents or parent or other person having legal custody of a child who is the subject of a dependency and neglect action filed under 41-3-401; (2) health care professionals who are treating a child suspected of being abused or neglected; (3) the noncustodial parent of a child who has been removed from the custodial parent following an incident of abuse or neglect; and (4) the natural parents or parent or other person having legal custody of a child who has been abused or neglected while in the care of foster parents. 41 A.G. 1979 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to HB 813 (Ch. 567, L. 1979) provided: "The provision of law dealing with abused, neglected, or dependent children; delinquent youths; and youths in need of supervision [now youth in need of intervention] recognize the principle that the parents or guardian of the minor is responsible for a fair share of the costs of supporting the minor when the minor is placed in a foster home, group home, or other form of custodial care. This bill is intended to provide a mechanism for determining the parents' or guardians' share of financial support in those situations involving the department of social and rehabilitation services [now department of public health and human services]. Three guiding principles interact to provide the thrust of the legislation. First, the welfare of the minor is of utmost concern. The focus is on the youth, and the law is designed to provide an opportunity for the youth to realize his potential. Secondly, the traditional privacy and security of the family are to be preserved. Thirdly and referred to above, the parents or guardian of a minor is responsible for the financial support of the minor. These three principles can and often do conflict with one another. This bill addresses investigations as to the ability of the parents or guardian to bear all or part of the cost of supporting a youth taken from their custody and attempts to strike a balance between these three principles by requiring that an investigation by the county welfare department [now local office of public assistance] into matters of financial status may not be made until a court, or, in the case of an informal adjustment under the Youth Court Act, a probation officer places the child in a foster home, child care agency, group home, or private treatment facility.

Rules developed pursuant to authority granted under this bill should provide procedures that insure the parents or guardian have access to the reports and data developed by both the department of social and rehabilitation services [now department of public health and human services] and the county welfare department and that guarantee investigations into financial and other matters will not intrude into private lives beyond the level necessary to protect the welfare of the child."

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 367, L. 2019, provided: "WHEREAS, childhood sexual abuse is an epidemic in Montana, and there are many instances in recent years of victims of childhood sexual abuse being unable to seek criminal or civil justice as the result of short statute of limitations windows in Montana law; and

WHEREAS, the sexual abuse of children is despicable conduct that must be reported, investigated, and prosecuted to create specific deterrence; and

WHEREAS, the State of Montana must ensure appropriate action when mandatory reporters and others report childhood sexual abuse; and

WHEREAS, regardless of the location of the crime, to protect Montana's children, the Department of Public Health and Human Services and the Department of Justice, working closely with local law enforcement and prosecutors, must respond to allegations of sexual abuse with effective investigations and, when viable, effective prosecutions; and

WHEREAS, childhood sexual abuse causes lifelong trauma to survivors of the same; and

WHEREAS, the average reporting age of victims of childhood sexual abuse is 52 years old, requiring the Legislature to take a meaningful look into the time periods presently allowed in Montana law to pursue criminal and civil court action; and

WHEREAS, upon review, the Legislature has determined that the current truncated time periods to bring criminal prosecutions and civil litigation related to allegations of sexual abuse are not in line with mental health science as to reporting of childhood sexual abuse, are too narrow, and should be extended."

Case Notes

Qualifications to Be Considered Party or Interested Person in Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings: In a child abuse and neglect proceeding, the mother's longtime boyfriend, who was not biologically related to the child but was identified by the child as his "dad", appealed the District Court's determination that the boyfriend was neither a party nor an interested person to the child's case and, therefore, was not entitled to continued notice or the right to appear in any subsequent proceedings related to the child. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that the Department of Public Health and Human Services, the child, and a parent, guardian, or individual with legal custody of the child are all parties to child abuse and neglect proceedings. In addition, a foster parent, a preadoptive parent, a relative caring for the child, or a relative who has cared for the child is allowed to file a motion to intervene and may also be a party to the proceedings. Therefore, because the boyfriend did not meet the above criteria, the District Court did not err in dismissing him as a party to the proceedings. However, the Supreme Court determined that under 41-3-422(9)(a), the boyfriend is a person interested in the child's case and has a right to appear at hearings pertaining to the child but does not have the right to notice or the right to be heard. The District Court erred when it denied the boyfriend's request to appear at the child's proceedings. In re J.B., 2015 MT 342, 381 Mont. 525, 362 P.3d 859.

Treatment Plan Executed in Good Faith Despite Case Worker Turnover — Due Process Not Violated in Termination Proceedings: The mother appealed the termination of her parental rights, arguing that she was denied due process of law when the Department of Public Health and Human Services did not execute her treatment plan in good faith because it did not adequately account for her history as a victim of domestic violence and because she was assigned six different child protection specialists during the course of her case. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the Department took notice of the mother's history as a victim of domestic violence and, given the Department's provision of numerous services and its efforts to reunite the family, the fact that the mother was assigned numerous case workers did not in itself establish a due process violation. In re T.D.H., 2015 MT 244, 380 Mont. 401, 356 P.3d 457.

Removal of Children Without Parental Notification — State's Failure to Notify Mother Not Improper: Plaintiff's claim that the state was required under 41-3-301 to interview her before removing her children from her care was properly rejected. The court reasoned that the plaintiff offered no evidence to establish, in the face of a report that the plaintiff may flee with her children and cause harm to them, that the state's failure to interview the plaintiff amounted to the absence of slight care or diligence in the investigation. Weber v. St., 2015 MT 161, 379 Mont. 388, 352 P.3d 8.

Father's Motion to Have Parental Rights Termination Proceeding Dismissed Because of Failure to Hold Timely Show Cause Hearing Not Considered on Appeal: The show cause hearing in a proceeding to terminate the father's parental rights was timely set within the required 20 days of the filing of the petition. At the hearing, the County Attorney requested a continuance to which the father did not object. The Supreme Court refused to consider the issue of whether the show cause hearing was timely on the basis that the father did not object to the continuance. In re M.H. & G.H., 2006 MT 208, 333 M 286, 143 P3d 103 (2006).

Erroneous Award of Custody at Adjudicatory Hearing Cured by Immediate Scheduling of Dispositional Hearing to Address Dispositional Issue Separately: The District Court failed to structure dispositional issues apart from adjudicatory issues when it granted temporary legal custody of two children to the state during an adjudicatory hearing. However, upon discovering the error, the court immediately scheduled a dispositional hearing to address the dispositional issue separately. Although not excusing the error, the Supreme Court held that holding a second dispositional hearing made the initial order placing the children with the state during the adjudicatory hearing the functional equivalent to an order of placement pending the dispositional hearing because temporary placement outside the home is allowed at every stage of the proceeding pursuant to 41-3-432, 41-3-437, and this section. The error was harmless and nonprejudicial and did not warrant reversal. In re S.C. & L.Z., 2005 MT 241, 328 M 476, 121 P3d 552 (2005).

Judicial Notice of Mother's Prior Termination Proceeding in Action to Terminate Father's Parental Rights — No Error: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights after taking judicial notice of the sealed record of the mother's prior termination proceeding. The father asserted error because the court took notice of facts that were not known and could not be discovered by the father. The Supreme Court disagreed. Rules 201 and 202, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), allow the District Court to take judicial notice of certain facts of record. Although sealed, the record was not entirely inaccessible because the father could have petitioned for disclosure of the records under 41-3-205, but he did not, even though he was aware of the prior proceeding. In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003).

Failure to Dismiss Petition Not Reversible Error Despite Failure to Follow Forty-Eight-Hour Rule: Even though a petition for termination (now abuse and neglect petition—see 2001 amendment) and permanent custody was not filed until 13 days after emergency placement of the children, in violation of the 48-hour rule of this section, any error in not following the strict statutory procedure was harmless since the best interest of the children was the primary concern and the parent's due process rights were not violated. In re F.H., J.K., & B.K., 266 M 36, 878 P2d 890, 51 St. Rep. 649 (1994). See also In re B.W.S., 2014 MT 198, 376 Mont. 43, 330 P.3d 467, in which the Supreme Court concluded that missed procedural deadlines did not extinguish the District Court's jurisdiction over a parental termination proceeding.

Qualified Immunity of Department Social Workers in Removing Children to Out-of-State Placement: Social workers who removed minor children from father's home without notice or hearing and arranged for them to stay in another state with their mother, who had joint custody, were not entitled to absolute immunity in father's civil rights action because their actions were neither quasi-prosecutorial nor quasi-judicial in nature. However, the social workers were entitled to qualified immunity because of the emergency nature of their actions and because they did not violate any clearly established constitutional or statutory right. Caldwell v. LeFaver, 928 F2d 331 (9th Cir. 1991).

Timely Filing of Petition: The filing of a petition for temporary investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) as to children who may be abused and neglected was timely and proper because of the exclusion of intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays from the computation time (see 2003 amendment). In re T.Y.K., 183 M 91, 598 P2d 593 (1979).

Duty to Adhere: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) has a duty to strictly adhere to the requirements of this section. In re G., Youth in Need of Care, 174 M 321, 570 P2d 1110 (1977).

Attorney General's Opinions

Exclusive Tribal Jurisdiction of Indian Children — No Departmental Jurisdiction: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) has no jurisdiction to provide child protection services to Indian children who are subject to exclusive tribal jurisdiction under the Indian Child Welfare Act, 25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq., or to children residing on the reservation and eligible for tribal membership. The scope of the Department's responsibility is unaffected by the child's eligibility, or lack thereof, for participation in Bureau of Indian Affairs programs, and the Department is not obligated to provide child protective services and benefits to the extent the federal program offers comparable assistance. 41 A.G. Op. 76 (1986).

Attorney General's Opinions

Determination of Staffing Patterns of County Public Assistance Offices: Both the Department of Public Health and Human Services and county welfare boards have an interest in staffing patterns for county public assistance offices, and when possible, staffing patterns should be determined through a process of consultation and negotiation between the Department and the county welfare board. However, if an agreement cannot be reached through that process, the Department has the final authority for determining staffing patterns for the county public welfare office in a nonassumed county. (See 2001 amendments.) 48 A.G. Op. 18 (2000).

Retroactive Foster Care Payments: In the absence of a determination that foster care assistance was improperly denied, neither a County Department of Public Welfare nor the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) is required to retroactively pay foster care costs on behalf of a relinquished child. Where there is a determination made that foster care assistance was improperly denied, only the foster home involved is entitled to foster care payments. 38 A.G. Op. 11 (1979).

Public and Private Placement Agencies: County Departments of Public Welfare may not deny foster care payments solely because the child receiving foster care has been relinquished to a private rather than public placement agency. If eligibility is established, County Departments of Public Welfare are required to approve foster care payments to a foster home on behalf of a child who has been relinquished to a private placement agency. 38 A.G. Op. 11 (1979).

County Power — "4-C's": Counties, jointly with the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services), may contract with local "4-C's" projects to provide coordination and support of child abuse prevention and treatment services. 37 A.G. Part 4

Abuse or Neglect Proceedings

Part Case Notes

Procedural Deadlines Missed — Best Interests of Child: The mother's parenting rights were terminated. The initial hearing was scheduled 18 days after the 20-day statutory deadline, which the mother did not object to. Then the Department of Public Health and Human Services requested a continuance, which the mother objected to. Following her objection to the first continuance, the mother failed to object to subsequent motions. On appeal, the mother argued that the District Court committed reversible error when it failed to hold a show cause hearing within 20 days of the filing of the abuse and neglect petition and when it failed to hold a dispositional hearing 20 days after the show cause hearing. The Supreme Court held that pursuant to legislative intent, in cases involving abused and neglected children, a District Court may act to protect a child's best interests despite procedural interests. In re A.H., 2015 MT 75, 378 Mont. 351, 344 P.3d 403.

Standing to Appeal Dismissal of Petition for Adjudication: After the District Court dismissed the state's petition for the adjudication of two children as youths in need of care, counsel for the children appealed although the children wished to return to their mother. The mother argued that the children did not have standing to appeal and that counsel for the children should have advocated only for what the children desired. The Supreme Court concluded that the children had standing to appeal and that counsel acted appropriately by advocating for adjudication despite the children's contrary desires. In re K.H. and K.M., 2012 MT 175, 366 Mont. 18, 285 P.3d 474.

Dismissal of Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427) Without Review of Guardianship Action — Harmless Error in Light of Requirements of Indian Child Welfare Act: In compliance with 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423), the District Court ordered a show cause hearing at which to consider a petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) regarding two Indian children. At the hearing, the Deputy County Attorney offered an order and memorandum from a previously dismissed guardianship proceeding as evidence. The court did not admit the documentation as evidence, but took judicial notice of it. However, at the end of the hearing, the court dismissed the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) without reviewing any records from the guardianship proceeding and ordered the Department of Public Health and Human Services to immediately place the children with their father. The mother contended that it was error to dismiss the petition without reviewing the guardianship file. In order for courts to grant TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) petitions when Indian children are involved, the requirements of the Indian Child Welfare Act must be met. Under 25 U.S.C. 1912, active efforts must be made to provide remedial services and rehabilitation programs to prevent the breakup of the Indian family. In addition, any finding that continued custody of the child by the parent or Indian custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child must be based on the testimony of qualified expert witnesses. Because these requirements were not met, the court could not have granted TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) even if it had reviewed the guardianship file, so its failure to do so, if erroneous, was harmless. Error in Placing Custody With One Parent Following Dismissal of Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427): In compliance with 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423), the District Court ordered a show cause hearing at which to consider a petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) regarding two Indian children. At the end of the hearing, the court dismissed the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) and ordered the Department of Public Health and Human Services to immediately place the children with their father. The Department argued on appeal that the court exceeded its authority in ordering transfer of custody to the father after the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) was dismissed. The Supreme Court held that when the District Court vacated the orders issued following filing of the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), it did not have authority to place custody with the father because nothing in the statutory framework or legislative intent authorizes the placement of a child with one parent, as opposed to the other, following dismissal of a petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427). The order transferring custody to the father was reversed. In re M.P.M. & A.R.M., 1999 MT 78, 294 M 87, 976 P2d 988, 56 St. Rep. 327 (1999).

Federal Indian Child Welfare Act — Temporary Custody Not in Compliance With Act — Otherwise Valid Parental Termination Not Invalidated: Child of Indian parents was placed in the temporary custody of the state in proceedings that may not have complied with the federal Indian Child Welfare Act (25 U.S.C. § 1901, et seq.). Later, in proceedings that complied with the Act and before a different judge with different witnesses, the parents' rights were terminated and permanent custody was granted the state. The Supreme Court held that any failure to comply with the Act in the temporary proceedings would not invalidate the later termination because the proceedings are separate actions involving separate petitions and statutory guidelines. Indian Child Welfare Act — Effective Date: A proceeding for termination of parental rights initiated in state court prior to May 7, 1979, the effective date of the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (25 U.S.C. § 1901, et seq.) continues as a state proceeding, not subject to the transfer provisions to tribal court under the Act, even though, due to a bifurcation of hearings involving several fathers, one of these hearings was held after the effective date of the Act. Tribal Court Judgment Not to Be Filed as Foreign Judgment — Exception: A judgment, decree, or order of an Indian tribal court may not be filed as a foreign judgment under the Uniform Enforcement of Foreign Judgments Act unless the judgment, decree, or order concerns an Indian child custody proceeding. 44 A.G. Op. 15 (1991).

Exclusive Tribal Jurisdiction of Indian Children — No Departmental Jurisdiction: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) has no jurisdiction to provide child protection services to Indian children who are subject to exclusive tribal jurisdiction under the Indian Child Welfare Act, 25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq., or to children residing on the reservation and eligible for tribal membership. The scope of the Department's responsibility is unaffected by the child's eligibility, or lack thereof, for participation in Bureau of Indian Affairs programs, and the Department is not obligated to provide child protective services and benefits to the extent the federal program offers comparable assistance. 41 A.G. Op. 76 (1986).

Foster Care or Adoption Placement of Indian Children — No Department Payments Under Social Security Act: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) may not make payments under Title IV-E of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 670 through 676) to Indian children whose foster care or adoption placement is subject to exclusive tribal jurisdiction under the Indian Child Welfare Act (25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq.). 41 A.G. Op. 76 (1986).

Transfer of Child Custody Proceeding to Tribal Jurisdiction — No Continuance of State Child Protection Services: Once a child custody proceeding has been transferred from state District Court to tribal jurisdiction under sec. 101(b) of the Indian Child Welfare Act (25 U.S.C. 1911(b)), the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) may not continue to provide child protection services or benefits to the Indian child. 41 A.G. Foster Parents Precluded From Intervening — No Allegation of Abandonment — Rule 24, M.R.Civ.P., Displaced by Title 41 in Abuse and Neglect Case. In re U.A.C., 2022 MT 230, 410 Mont. 493, 520 P.3d 295.

Consolidation of Show Cause and Termination Hearing Not Violative of Due Process: On appeal from an order terminating the mother's parental rights, the Supreme Court held that, although the District Court consolidated the show cause hearing and termination hearing, and the initial show cause notice failed to inform the mother that her parental rights could be terminated at the show cause hearing, the mother's due process rights were not violated. The mother received additional notice that her parental rights were at stake in communications that included the original petition to terminate her parental rights and grant permanent legal custody of the child to the Department of Public Health and Human Services, the order setting the hearing on the Department's petition, and the original hearing scheduled on the Department's petition, for which the mother attended the hearing and was granted a two-week continuance. Because the mother had notice and an opportunity to be heard, neither the consolidation of the show cause and termination hearings nor the lack of notice of the risk of terminated parental rights in the initial show cause order violated the mother's due process rights. In re C.B., 2019 MT 294, 398 Mont. 176, 454 P.3d 1195.

Qualifications to Be Considered Party or Interested Person in Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings: In a child abuse and neglect proceeding, the mother's longtime boyfriend, who was not biologically related to the child but was identified by the child as his "dad", appealed the District Court's determination that the boyfriend was neither a party nor an interested person to the child's case and, therefore, was not entitled to continued notice or the right to appear in any subsequent proceedings related to the child. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that the Department of Public Health and Human Services, the child, and a parent, guardian, or individual with legal custody of the child are all parties to child abuse and neglect proceedings. In addition, a foster parent, a preadoptive parent, a relative caring for the child, or a relative who has cared for the child is allowed to file a motion to intervene and may also be a party to the proceedings. Therefore, because the boyfriend did not meet the above criteria, the District Court did not err in dismissing him as a party to the proceedings. However, the Supreme Court determined that under 41-3-422(9)(a), the boyfriend is a person interested in the child's case and has a right to appear at hearings pertaining to the child but does not have the right to notice or the right to be heard. The District Court erred when it denied the boyfriend's request to appear at the child's proceedings. In re J.B., 2015 MT 342, 381 Mont. 525, 362 P.3d 859.

Improper Termination of Parental Rights by Default Judgment — Abuse of Discretion — Action to Terminate Other Parent's Rights Inappropriate: A mother filed a petition to terminate the parental rights of her infant daughter's father, who was incarcerated at the time. Despite the father's efforts to respond timely, the District Court, without a hearing, evidence, or findings, entered default judgment. The father appealed the termination to the Supreme Court, which reversed, concluding that parental rights cannot be terminated pursuant to a default judgment. The Supreme Court also emphasized that a natural parent cannot petition to terminate the parental rights of the other natural parent except in the case of a stepparent adoption. In re K.J.B., 2014 MT 327, 377 Mont. 270, 339 P.3d 824, distinguished in In re A.M.S., 2016 MT 22, 382 Mont. 145, 364 P.3d 1261.

Adjudication of Youth in Need of Care Without Specific Request Affirmed: A parent asserted that the District Court lacked authority to adjudicate a child as a youth in need of care because there was no request for such adjudication contained in the initial petitions for emergency protective services and temporary investigative authority. The Supreme Court disagreed. The relief sought in a petition filed under 41-3-422 may include any relief required for the best interests of the child, and 41-3-432 allows a court to adjudicate a child as a youth in need of care at the show cause hearing for immediate protection and emergency protective services. Thus, the District Court was not foreclosed from adjudicating the child as a youth in need of care following filing of the initial petitions for emergency protective services and temporary investigative authority. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 98, 350 M 86, 206 P3d 565 (2009).

Dismissal Motion Properly Denied When Statutory Criteria Not Met: Based on the Supreme Court's prior holding in In re D.B. & D.B., 2007 MT 246, 339 M 240, 168 P3d 691 (2007) (In re D.B. I), the mother moved to dismiss a parental rights termination case on grounds that the District Court proceedings did not contain sufficient evidence to apply the proper statutory criteria required by In re D.B. I. The court denied the dismissal motion and the mother appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Only when the criteria of 41-3-424 are met may a petition be properly dismissed, and the mother failed to satisfy those criteria. The children remained youths in need of care and the District Court was required to provide some form of relief as established in 41-3-422, so dismissal was inappropriate and unavailable to the mother. In re D.B. & D.B., 2008 MT 272, 345 M 225, 190 P3d 1072 (2008). See also In re K.A., 2016 MT 27, 382 Mont. 165, 365 P.3d 478.

Requirement That Child Be Adjudicated Youth in Need of Care Met by Parents' Stipulation in Adoption of Treatment Plans — Harmless Error: A father contended that all proceedings related to a parental rights termination were invalid because the children had never been formally adjudicated as youths in need of care. The Supreme Court found that in this case, the absence of a formal adjudication was harmless error because the parents previously agreed that their children were abused or neglected when the parents stipulated to that fact during the adoption of four separate treatment plans. The evidence of abuse and neglect was overwhelming, and if the parents had objected to temporary legal custody or to subsequent District Court findings or if they had disputed the status of the children as youths in need of care, the District Court could have easily made a ruling on the children's status at that time. The parents were afforded full due process at every stage and had ample opportunity to object to the proceedings and findings, yet they stipulated and agreed to the District Court findings through counsel at every turn. Although failure to adhere to statutory requirements governing termination proceedings will generally constitute grounds for reversal, this case was one of the rare occasions that application of the harmless error doctrine was warranted. The procedural error did not affect the outcome of the termination proceedings or substantively prejudice the parents, and termination was affirmed. In re J.C. & A.D., 2008 MT 127, 343 M 30, 183 P3d 22 (2008), distinguishing In re M.O., M.O., & M.O., 2003 MT 4, 314 M 13, 62 P3d 265 (2003), and In re B.N.Y., 2003 MT 241, 317 M 291, 77 P3d 189 (2003).

Hearsay Evidence and Parental Rights Termination — Admission of Hearsay Evidence at Show Cause, Adjudicatory, and Termination Hearings Held Proper Because Children "Unavailable" — J.C.E. Case Distinguished — No Offer of Proof Made: Hearsay evidence in the form of videotaped interviews of young children talking with investigators about sexual abuse by their parents was admitted after the District Court found that the children were "unavailable" to testify because they would be traumatized by testifying against their parents in a courtroom setting. The Supreme Court held that the videotaped testimony was properly admitted by the District Court, based upon the thorough findings by the District Court, at the show cause hearing, the adjudicatory hearing, and the parental rights termination hearing. The Supreme Court distinguished St. v. J.C.E., 235 M 264, 767 P2d 309 (1988), because that case was a criminal case in which the right of confrontation under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., applied, whereas the case now before the Supreme Court was a civil case. The Supreme Court also held that the District Court properly analyzed the mother's attempt to call the children as witnesses as one of relevance, and because no offer of proof was made under Rule 103, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), by the mother, the Supreme Court could not conclude that the District Court acted arbitrarily. In re O.A.W., 2007 MT 13, 335 M 304, 153 P3d 6 (2007).

Standards Applicable to Termination of Indian Parental Rights — Active Department Efforts to Provide Services Required: The District Court terminated the parental rights of an Indian father after the children were removed from the father's custody a fourth time because of the father's abuse and neglect. The father appealed on grounds that: (1) the state did not make active efforts to provide remedial services; (2) the District Court relied on expert testimony based on the Department file rather than personal interviews; and (3) it was error not to grant the father's request for an extension of temporary legal custody. The Supreme Court affirmed on all issues. The father left no phone number or address with the social worker and moved multiple times. Without any involvement, the father prevented the Department from making active efforts at providing more intensive services. Second, the federal Indian Child Welfare Act requires testimony from a qualified expert witness, but does not require a specific form of that testimonial evidence or personal interviews, and a District Court need not conform its decision to a particular piece of evidence or a particular expert's report or testimony as long as a reasonable person could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that continued custody by an Indian parent or custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child. Last, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to extend temporary custody because the Department had already provided active efforts and did not need more time to assist the father in attaining his goals. The District Court had an accurate perspective on the father's parenting abilities, and refusal to extend the temporary placement did not make the court's decision any less reasonable. Misdiagnosis of Rare Skin Disease as Evidence of Parental Sexual Misconduct — Newly Acquired Evidence Did Not Undermine Validity of Adjudication of Children as Youths in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Upheld: After the parents' 4-year-old daughter was diagnosed as a probable victim of parental sexual misconduct, the court ordered a TIA and protective services for all five children, who were all under 5 years of age. Both parents were criminally charged with abuse and neglect of their children. The father remained in jail for 1 year. The children were tested and found to be developmentally delayed in their speech, and both parents were diagnosed with psychological disorders. Both parents were ordered to complete treatment plans, which they failed to complete. Eventually, their parental rights were terminated. Two years after the initial diagnosis, it was determined that the daughter's physical symptoms were the result of a rare skin disease called lichens sclerosis et atrophicus (LSA) rather than sexual abuse. The parents appealed the termination of their parental rights and argued that the District Court had erred in adjudicating the children as youths in need of care based on the misdiagnosis. The parents further argued that the allegations of sexual molestation because of the misdiagnosis tainted the entire proceedings to such a degree that they were deprived of their rights to due process and fundamental fairness, thereby invalidating the subsequent termination ruling. The Supreme Court upheld the District Court and held that, based on the developmental delays and psychological disorders, the District Court had adequate grounds independent of the LSA misdiagnosis for adjudicating the children as youths in need of care under this section and that the subsequent termination under 41-3-609 was valid. In re D.B., 2004 MT 371, 325 M 13, 103 P3d 1026 (2004).

Failure to Hold Adjudicatory Hearing to Determine Whether Children in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Improper Absent Adjudication of Status of Children: The District Court held several hearings concerning temporary investigative authority, granting several extensions, and also held several hearings concerning granting temporary legal custody, which was extended twice. The state then filed a petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. Temporary legal custody was extended a third time pending a hearing on the termination hearing. At the hearing, the mother's parental rights were terminated, and she appealed. The Supreme Court found that there had never been an adjudicatory hearing at which the District Court heard testimony or received evidence concerning whether the children were abused or neglected. The hearing for temporary legal custody did not equate to an adjudication by the court that the children were youths in need of care, even in light of an alleged stipulation by the mother to that effect. Absent an adjudicatory hearing and an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care, termination of parental rights was improper, and the order was reversed. In re M.O., M.O., & M.O., 2003 MT 4, 314 M 13, 62 P3d 265 (2003).

Attempt to Use Writ of Habeas Corpus to Demand Physical Presence of Children Removed From Parent in Abuse and Neglect Proceeding — Petition Properly Denied: The mother petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus demanding that her children be physically present for an abuse and neglect hearing because they were material witnesses and had been removed from her custody unlawfully. The petition was denied. On appeal, the mother cited In re Bertelson, 189 M 524, 617 P2d 121 (1980), for the proposition that a writ of habeas corpus was the appropriate procedural device to bring the custody matter before a court. The Supreme Court disagreed and distinguished Bertelson because the mother's position ignored the substantial differences between dissolution proceedings and abuse and neglect proceedings, differences that were not at issue in Bertelson. The court also cited its earlier holding in In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982 (2000), in which it was held that the children were properly removed from the mother's home. Because temporary custody of the children with the state was legal, relief pursuant to habeas corpus premised on illegal restraint was not available to the mother under these circumstances. In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Denial of Writ of Habeas Corpus to Compel Attendance of Children in Abuse and Neglect Hearing Not Violative of Due Process Rights or Right to Confront Witnesses: The mother petitioned the District Court for a writ of habeas corpus demanding that her children be physically present for an abuse and neglect hearing because they were material witnesses and claiming that the writ was necessary to ensure her due process rights by having the children available to rebut allegations against her at the hearing. The petition was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the mother was entitled to an opportunity for a meaningful hearing, that opportunity need not be provided at the expense of the children whose best interests were the paramount focus of the proceeding, and subjecting the children to direct and cross-examination could exacerbate the abuse that they had already experienced. Denial of the petition did not violate the mother's right to confront witnesses because the children were not her accusers and she had no right to confront them. Rather, the abuse and neglect case was brought by the state, and the mother had ample opportunity to confront and examine the state's witnesses and experts at the hearing, so her due process rights were met. In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Parties in Dissolution Proceeding Not Same as Parties in Abuse and Neglect Proceeding — Res Judicata Inapplicable: During marriage dissolution proceedings, the mother was granted custody of the children, but during a subsequent abuse and neglect proceeding, permanent custody was granted to the father. The mother appealed the placement on grounds that it constituted a readjudication of the earlier custody order in her favor in the dissolution action, in violation of the doctrine of res judicata. The Supreme Court disagreed. Four criteria must be met for res judicata to apply, the first of which is that the parties or their privies are the same. The mother failed to meet this criteria because in the dissolution action, the parties were the mother and father, while in the abuse and neglect proceeding, the parties were the state, the children, and the mother. Despite the fact that the state was investigating claims of abuse within the family during the dissolution action, it was not a party to that action and did not petition for investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) for the children until the dissolution was final. In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Parent Not Represented by Counsel During Show Cause Hearing Regarding Whether Child a Youth in Need of Care — Due Process Rights Not Violated: At the time of a show cause hearing on whether her child was a youth in need of care, the mother was an indigent mental patient civilly committed to the state hospital. She appeared at the hearing without representation of counsel. The mother contended that the District Court violated her due process rights by making that critical determination regarding the child when she was unrepresented. Although in In re A.S.A., J.L.A., G.A., & A.J.A., 258 M 194, 852 P2d 127 (1993), the Supreme Court held that the constitutional right to due process guarantees an indigent parent the right to court-appointed counsel in parental rights termination proceedings, the court has not extended the right to counsel to a pretermination proceeding in which the focal issue is whether a child is a youth in need of care. Rather, appointment of counsel at any time prior to the initiation of termination proceedings is within the discretion of the District Court. In this case, the initial determination that the child was a youth in need of care was made by order pursuant to a finding of probable cause even before the mother's first appearance in any proceedings when the District Court relied on a report submitted by a social worker showing that the child was abused or neglected or in danger of abuse or neglect and that removal from the home was necessary to protect the child's welfare. Subsequent to the initial determination, the District Court reached the same conclusion on at least three separate occasions when the mother was represented by counsel, including one hearing when the social worker was subjected to cross-examination by the mother's counsel. The Supreme Court applied In re M.F., 201 M 277, 653 P2d 1205 (1982), and in re D.S., H.S., R.S., R.S., J.S., R.S., & K.S., 253 M 484, 833 P2d 1090 (1992), and in holding that the state is not required to provide counsel at proceedings concerning temporary investigative authority or temporary custody. Thus, the mother's due process rights were not violated when the District Court made the determination that the child was a youth in need of care at a time when the mother was not represented by counsel. (See 2005 amendment.) In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Retroactive Application of Amendment: Subsection (2) of 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422) was amended in 1985 to require adjudicatory hearing within 20 days of filing of petition but was amended in 1987 to remove the 20-day requirement. Hearing in this case was held after effective date of 1985 amendment but not within 20 days of filing petition. Appellant contended 1985 amendment was procedural and applied retroactively to require hearing within 20 days. The Supreme Court, citing Boehm v. Alanon Club, 222 M 373, 722 P2d 1160, 43 St. Rep. 1341 (1986), held that even though this provision may be procedural and therefore not subject to 1-2-109 (which states no law is retroactive unless expressly so declared), the 1987 amendment was likewise retroactive and therefore voided the 20-day requirement. Custody of R.A.D., 44 St. Rep. 2018 (1987). Opinion withdrawn but issue affirmed in Custody of R.A.D. & J.D., 231 M 143, 753 P2d 862, 45 St. Rep. 496 (1988).

Evidence of Sexual Abuse — Treatment Plan Ordered: Acting on evidence of sexual abuse and other problems within the family, the trial court properly found S.L.T. to be an abused and neglected child. The court granted temporary custody to the county welfare department and required that the child and her parents follow a treatment plan submitted by the welfare department. Section 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) gives the trial court authority to order any of the forms of relief listed in 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423) once the court determines a child is abused or neglected. This includes the relief ordered in this case. In re S.L.T., 215 M 289, 697 P2d 472, 42 St. Rep. 366 (1985).

Failure to Serve Natural Father — Mother's Lack of Standing to Contest: In a youth in need of care proceeding, the mother has no standing to contest the failure to serve the natural father when she has not shown a personal interest that would be adversely affected by such failure to serve. In re B.L.O., 213 M 164, 689 P2d 1246, 41 St. Rep. 2024 (1984).

Finding of Abuse, Neglect, or Dependency Necessary Before Consideration of Best Interests of the Child: M.G.M. was born out of wedlock and had little contact with her natural father until the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Family Services) placed M.G.M. in a foster home and terminated her mother's parental rights. The Department then sought to terminate the father's parental rights. To terminate his parental rights, the court must first find that the child is abused, neglected, or dependent. Only when such a finding has been made can the court apply the best interests of the child test. In re M.G.M., 201 M 400, 654 P2d 994, 39 St. Rep. 2191 (1982).

Matter Submitted With Petition: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (SRS) (now Department of Family Services) first had contact with the mother of three minor children in 1967. During the period from 1976 through 1981, SRS received numerous complaints alleging abuse and neglect of the children. In 1981, proceedings were begun to terminate the mother's parental rights. The mother contended that the submission of a social worker's report to the court, along with the petition for permanent custody, was error. The Supreme Court held that where the report contained information essentially the same as that testified to by the author, who was cross-examined at the hearing, there is a presumption that the trial court has disregarded all inadmissible material in making its decision. The decision of the lower court was upheld. In re M.F., J.F., & R.W., 201 M 277, 653 P2d 1205, 39 St. Rep. 2103 (1982).

Interval Between Removal and Final Order: Although the interval of 20 months between the time of removal from the home until the final order was long and District Courts are exhorted to give preference to custody cases, reversal here would be an ill-advised and improper sanction because of the best interests of the child. In re A.J.S., 193 M 79, 630 P2d 217, 38 St. Rep. 947 (1981). See also In re B.W.S., 2014 MT 198, 376 Mont. 43, 330 P.3d 467, in which the Supreme Court concluded that missed procedural deadlines did not extinguish the District Court's jurisdiction over a parental termination proceeding. (Annotator's note: Chapter 659, sec. 5, L. 1985, amended 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422) and 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) to require that the 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) adjudicatory hearing must be held within 20 days of the filing of the petition and the 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) dispositional hearing must be held within 30 days of the adjudicatory hearing. Chapter 388, sec. 2, L. 1985, amended 41-3-607 to require that a dispositional hearing on a petition to terminate parental rights must be held within 180 days of the filing of the petition.)

Names of Parties: The Supreme Court directed that in this and in future cases under 41-3-101, et seq., in both the District and Supreme Courts, all names of parties involved be removed to avoid publicity of the minor parties involved. In re G., Youth in Need of Care, 174 M 321, 570 P2d 1110 (1977).

Failure to Make Required Findings: The District Court abused its discretion in awarding permanent custody to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Family Services) because it patently failed to make the required findings that the child was "abused, dependent, or neglected" and therefore was without power to effect a permanent transfer of custody to a nonparent. In re Fish, 174 M 201, 569 P2d 924 (1977).

Hearsay in Child Custody Procedure: The Montana Rules of Civil Procedure, including the hearsay rule, must be strictly followed in a child custody procedure to avoid abuse. Therefore, Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Family Services) reports containing hearsay that are not excepted from the rule as either business records or written reports by state officers are inadmissible. In re Swan, 173 M 311, 567 P2d 898 (1977).

Prehearing Report — Petition for Permanent Custody: The Supreme Court avoided deciding whether or not it is proper for a County Attorney to file a prehearing report in support of a petition under 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422) for permanent custody since the only report in the record was filed in support of a temporary investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) petition under 41-3-402(3) (renumbered 41-3-427(3)). In re Moyer, 173 M 208, 567 P2d 47 (1977).

Temporary Custody: When petitioners had requested temporary custody of neglected children and no petition had been filed by the welfare department for permanent custody, the District Court was without authority to enter an order of permanent custody. Flathead County Welfare Dept. v. Endres, 166 M 379, 533 P2d 959 (1975).

JURISDICTION

Termination of Parental Rights to Indian Children — Tribal Court to Affirmatively Decline Case Prior to State Court Proceedings — Jurisdiction Transfer Hearing Required Prior to Ruling on Jurisdictional Transfer of Children: The District Court erred in terminating the parental rights of a mother of four Indian children without first holding a jurisdiction transfer hearing under the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) after the mother requested the matter be transferred to tribal court at the outset of the proceedings. The Supreme Court ruled that a tribal court, and not the tribe, must affirmatively decline to accept a case before a state court can proceed with termination of parental rights to Indian children. A District Court must hold a jurisdiction transfer hearing before it grants or denies a request for a jurisdictional transfer of Indian children to tribal custody. In re J.W.C., L.W.C., K.W.C., and C.W.C., 2011 MT 312, 363 Mont. 85, 265 P.3d 1265.

Termination of Parental Rights — Requirements of Indian Child Welfare Act: Under the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978, 25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq., the party seeking termination of an individual's parental rights to an Indian child under state law must satisfy the court that active efforts have been made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs designed to prevent the breakup of the Indian family and that the efforts have proved unsuccessful. The party seeking termination has the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that the continued custody of the child by the parent or Indian custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child. In re Custody of A.L.R., A.A.R., & T.C.R., 2002 MT 183, 311 M 76, 54 P3d 17 (2002). See also In re A.L.D., 2018 MT 112, 391 Mont. 273, 417 P.3d 342.

Failure to Personally Serve Notice of Child Custody Proceedings to Parent Incarcerated Out-of-State Not Reversible Error: The father was incarcerated in Washington state and was notified by mail of proceedings prior to the filing of a petition for permanent legal custody and termination of parental rights regarding his children, rather than by personal service. He contended that failure to serve notice personally was reversible error. The Supreme Court disagreed. Although the preferred practice is to personally serve parents and legal guardians whose whereabouts are known with copies of all petitions in accordance with this section, the issue of personal service was not dispositive in this case. Because the father was incarcerated at all times during the proceedings, it would have been impossible for him to exercise his legal rights to parent the children during that time. He was unable to show how personal service would have significantly impacted the proceedings or how invalidation of the proceedings would have a significant impact on his parental rights. Therefore, failure to personally serve the father with notice of the proceedings prior to filing the petition for permanent legal custody was not reversible error. In re L.M.A.T. & B.L.F.T., 2002 MT 163, 310 M 422, 51 P3d 504 (2002).

2001 Notice Provisions Not Applicable to Proceedings Begun in 2000: The 2001 Legislature amended this section to require that parents or legal guardians be advised of their right to counsel and the right to contest the proceedings. The amendments also require that when a District Court issues an order in an abuse and neglect proceeding, it must include notice concerning statutory requirements for timeliness of hearings and presumptions of the best interests of the child and that completion of a treatment plan does not guarantee return of a child. The order issued in this case in 2002 did not contain the mandated notices, so a parent contended that the order was invalid and unenforceable. However, the proceedings in this case were begun before the 2001 amendments were adopted, so pursuant to the saving clause in the 2001 act, the notice requirements did not apply. In re L.M.A.T. & B.L.F.T., 2002 MT 163, 310 M 422, 51 P3d 504 (2002).

Expiration of Temporary Custody Order — No Effect on Jurisdiction: At the time that the Department of Family Services filed a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), the mother and her children were not living on the reservation. Subsequently, the mother moved back to the reservation and sought to have the action transferred to the tribal court. The mother argued that the District Court had lost jurisdiction over the matter when its order of temporary custody expired. The Supreme Court ruled that the child abuse and neglect statutes do not make provisions for the expiration of custody in the state or for the loss of jurisdiction by the court, other than by a finding by the court that the children are not in danger of being abused or neglected and by vacating any order made pursuant to 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423). In re W.L., C.L., & B.L., 260 M 325, 859 P2d 1019, 50 St. Rep. 1081 (1993).

Jurisdiction Respecting Indian Children — Domicile at Time Action Commenced: At the time that the Department of Family Services filed a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), the mother and her children were not living on the reservation. Subsequently, the mother moved back to the reservation and sought to have the action transferred to the tribal court. The Supreme Court held that domicile is determined at the commencement of an action and that the lower court had jurisdiction based on the fact that the mother and her children were not living on the reservation when the petition was filed. In re W.L., C.L., & B.L., 260 M 325, 859 P2d 1019, 50 St. Rep. 1081 (1993).

Lack of Personal Notice — Due Process Not Violated: Mother abandoned her children after two failed treatment plans and neglected to apprise the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) of her whereabouts for over 90 days prior to initiation of termination proceedings, during which time Department efforts to contact her were unsuccessful. Relying on 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422), she later argued that because she was not personally served with notice of the termination proceedings, her due process rights were violated. However, 41-3-608 outlines the notice requirements applicable to parent-child relationship termination proceedings. The District Court, after noting the Department's efforts to locate mother and the fact that she was under actual notice from the onset of Department involvement that her parental rights could be terminated if she failed to follow court-ordered treatment plans, properly held that the notice requirements of 41-3-608 were satisfied. In re A.E., C.E., S.R., & J.R., 255 M 56, 840 P2d 572, 49 St. Rep. 877 (1992).

Failure to Transfer Jurisdiction of Eskimo Child to Alaska Tribe Proper — Application of Indian Child Welfare Act: The District Court denied an Eskimo tribe's motion to transfer jurisdiction of child custody proceedings of an Eskimo child under the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978. The Supreme Court found that denial of the motion was proper under the rationale of 25 U.S.C. 1911(a) and (b) and the previous ruling in In re M.E.M., 195 M 329, 635 P2d 1313 (1981). The child was not residing or domiciled within the tribal reservation. Further, good cause existed for retaining jurisdiction in Montana rather than transferring jurisdiction to Alaska, including evidence of potentially devastating damage to the child's best interests and stability, as well as undue hardship on parties and witnesses. In re T.S., 245 M 242, 801 P2d 77, 47 St. Rep. 2149 (1990), replacing previous opinion, subsequently withdrawn, at 47 St. Rep. 1888.

Refusal to Relinquish Custody of Indian Children to Tribe — No Abuse of Discretion: Although a tribe participated in the dispositional hearing and presented a formal resolution asking for custody of the children, who were tribal members, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to relinquish custody to the tribe when it was determined that the children's best interests would be better served by leaving them in their foster home placement, with the ultimate goal of placing them in a Native American home. In re M.J.D., C.K.D., & A.R.D., 225 M 200, 731 P2d 937, 44 St. Rep. 167 (1987).

Transfer of Child Proceeding From Montana Court to Tribal Court — Due Process Requirements: One of the purposes of the Indian Child Welfare Act, 25 U.S.C. § 1901, et seq., is to ensure due process for all those involved, which requires a Montana court, when entertaining a tribal court motion for transfer to the tribal court of jurisdiction of children who are the subject of a Montana court proceeding, to hold a hearing on the transfer request and give a parent who claims indigency an appointed counsel if the court finds indigency. In re G.L.O.C., Youth in Need of Care, 205 M 352, 668 P2d 235, 40 St. Rep. 1354 (1983). See also In re J.W.C., L.W.C., K.W.C., and C.W.C., 2011 MT 312, 363 Mont. 85, 265 P.3d 1265.

Parental Consent Not Required: Parental consent is not a jurisdictional necessity under this chapter to declare a child abused, dependent, or neglected or to grant permanent custody of the child to persons other than the natural parents. In re C.M.S., A Dependent and Neglected Child, 187 M 115, 609 P2d 240 (1979).

Jurisdiction Dependent on Statutory Compliance: In a consolidated proceeding based on a petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus by a natural parent and a petition by a nonparent for guardianship, the District Court was without jurisdiction to find the children involved dependent and neglected and to enter an order granting custody to the nonparent petitioners. Unless 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422) is followed, the court is without jurisdiction to deprive the parent of custody. In re the Marriage of Schultz v. Schultz, 184 M 245, 602 P2d 595 (1979), following Guardianship of Aschenbrenner, 182 M 540, 597 P2d 1156 (1979), and Guardianship of Evans, 179 M 438, 587 P2d 372 (1978).

Jurisdiction Based on Service: Under section 10-504, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), District Court had jurisdiction over petition by state seeking permanent custody and right to consent to adoption of three children despite the facts that proper citation was not issued or served on the parents, when father of one of the children had consented to the proceeding, father of other two children was deceased, mother who was represented by counsel appeared at the hearing voluntarily, and the hearing on the petition in question was preceded by a series of hearings and postponements regarding temporary custody of the children. Bonser v. Cascade County, 162 M 1, 507 P2d 1064 (1973).

Jurisdiction Over Indians: Under section 10-503, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), when child was taken from Indian reservation and abandoned outside the reservation, court for the county where the child was found could take jurisdiction and provide for the child despite the fact that the mother remained on the reservation and committed no acts of neglect outside the reservation. In re Cantrell, 159 M 66, 495 P2d 179 (1972).

FACTORS TO BE CONSIDERED

Sufficient Evidence to Adjudicate Children as Youths in Need of Care: The District Court properly adjudicated children as youths in need of care based on evidence that: (1) there was a significant prior history of domestic violence and domestic abuse between the parents in the presence of the children; (2) one of the children exhibited various behavior and developmental problems, including running away, violent behavior, anger control problems, and poor language skills; (3) the father could not care for the children because of his long-term federal incarceration; (4) the mother, who was living at a shelter for domestic abuse victims and dealing with mental health issues, had voluntarily surrendered the children to state care because of her inability to adequately parent them; and (5) the state had made reasonable efforts to avoid placement of the children or to make it possible to safely return the children to the home, but protective placement was required. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 98, 350 M 86, 206 P3d 565 (2009). See also In re K.H. and K.M., 2012 MT 175, 366 Mont. 18, 285 P.3d 474, in which the Supreme Court concluded that there was insufficient evidence to adjudicate children as youths in need of care and that the District Court properly considered the mother's past conduct, including her choice of intimate partners, in the context of how that conduct affected the children.

Misdiagnosis — Evidence at Time of TIA Hearing Sufficient for Issuance of TIA: After the parents' 4-year-old daughter was diagnosed as a probable victim of parental sexual misconduct, the court ordered a TIA and protective services for all five children, who were all under 5 years of age. The parents' rights were eventually terminated. Two years after the initial diagnosis, it was determined that the daughter's physical symptoms were the result of a rare skin disease called lichens sclerosis et atrophicus (LSA) rather than sexual abuse. Subsequent discovery that the initial probable cause determination was based on faulty information does not change the fact that the District Court initially had probable cause based upon information available at the time of the determination. Substantial, credible evidence supported the District Court's finding of probable cause for issuing the TIA. In re D.B., 2004 MT 371, 325 M 13, 103 P3d 1026 (2004).

Termination of Parental Rights: When the following things were considered, the record supported the conclusion that the father's rights were adequately considered prior to termination of parental rights and that the decision to terminate them was supported by credible evidence: (1) the father was notified of the hearing, was present, and was represented by counsel; (2) professional testimony indicated the father would not be able to provide enough influence to offset the marked deprivation anticipated to continue for the child; (3) the father was found to have made no effort to assist the mother in learning to become a good parent; (4) the father had visited the child only once in 6 months when the child was in a foster home and had been reported to have abused the child. In re L.F.G., 183 M 239, 598 P2d 1125 (1979).

Youth in Need — Best Interest of Child — Mental Condition of Parent as Sole Factor: When the District Court considered the best interests of a child only after first determining that the child was in fact abused or neglected, it met the required standard. Considering the mental condition of the mother as the primary if not the sole factor, but having evidence that the child would not receive even minimally satisfactory maternal care and would be exposed to extremely high chances of developing a mental condition similar to that of the mother, sufficient credible evidence was before the District Court to support the District Court's decision that the child was a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court rejected the view that mental condition of a parent could not be the sole factor supporting a severance of parental rights. In re L.F.G., 183 M 239, 598 P2d 1125 (1979).

APPOINTMENT OF GUARDIAN OR COUNSEL

Termination of Parental Rights — Indigent Father — Waiver of Right to Counsel: The District Court terminated the father's parental rights during an adoption hearing. The indigent father was not represented by counsel at the hearing, and the District Court did not advise the father of his right to counsel during the proceeding. On appeal, the father argued that he was entitled to have an attorney appointed to represent him at the District Court. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court, holding that a parent in a termination proceeding, having received no notice of the right to counsel, does not waive the right through mere silence. The court concluded that the father had not knowingly and voluntarily waived his right to counsel. In re Adoption of L.F.R., 2019 MT 2, 394 Mont. 61, 432 P.3d 1030.

Appointed Counsel — Termination of Parental Rights — Factors Considered: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (SRS) (now Department of Family Services) first had contact with the mother of three minor children in 1967. During the period from 1976 through 1981, SRS received numerous complaints alleging abuse and neglect of the children. In 1980, SRS filed a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) regarding the children. In 1981, judgment was entered terminating the mother's parental rights. On appeal, the mother contended that the District Court erred in failing to appoint counsel for her at the time the application for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) was filed. The Supreme Court, relying on Lassiter v. Dept. of Social Services, 452 US 18 (1981), held that appointed counsel is required if the factors enumerated in Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 US 319, 47 L Ed 2d 18, 96 S Ct 893 (1976), outweigh the presumption against appointment of counsel. The factors to be considered are the private interests, the government's interest, and the risk of erroneous decision. The court found that the mother's due process rights were adequately protected by having counsel appointed prior to the hearings for termination of her parental rights and resting permanent custody in the Department (now Department of Family Services). (See 2005 amendment.) Appointment of Counsel — Indian Child Welfare Act: In a proceeding for termination of parental rights in a dependency and neglect action involving a Sioux Indian child, the District Court was required to apply the Indian Child Welfare Act (25 U.S.C.A. §§ 1901-1963). The mother of the child was indigent and had an IQ of 53. Counsel should have been appointed under the Indian Child Welfare Act and 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422), even though not requested. The Supreme Court held that it was reversible error not to appoint counsel for the mother, particularly in light of her indigency and IQ level. In re M.E.M., 195 M 329, 635 P2d 1313, 38 St. Rep. 1895 (1981).

Child and Indigent Parents' Right to Appointed Counsel: When indigent parents are involved in dependency proceedings, the District Court must make a judicial decision in each case as to whether such parents are entitled to counsel appointed by the court whenever the indigent parent, unable to present his or her case properly, faces a substantial possibility of the loss of custody or prolonged separation from the child. The factors which the District Court may consider in determining whether to appoint such counsel will vary from case to case, but should the District Court refuse a request for counsel, the grounds for refusal must be stated in the record so that meaningful judicial review of the refusal can be had. The same is true for children involved in the proceedings. (See 2005 amendment.) In re M.D.Y.R., Youth in Need of Care, 177 M 521, 582 P2d 758 (1978), following Cleaver v. Wilcox, 499 F2d 940 (9th Cir. 1974).

Appointment of Counsel: Only in cases heard and decided after Gullette, 173 M 132, 566 P2d 396 (1977) (overruled in McDowell v. McDowell, 263 M 252, 868 P2d 1250, 51 St. Rep. 42 (1994)), is a finding on the appointment of counsel for a minor child required. Further, appointment of counsel is only necessary when the child needs an advocate to represent his position as to the issues in dispute or to ensure the development of an adequately complete record concerning his best interests. (See 2005 amendment.) In re Inquiry Into J.J.S., Youth in Need of Care, 176 M 202, 577 P2d 378 (1978).

Adequate Representation in Neglect Case: County Department of Welfare adequately and properly represented children in neglect proceeding. Judge exercised discretion and did not err in failing to appoint counsel. (See 2005 amendment.) Stubben v. Dept. of Public Welfare, 171 M 111, 556 P2d 904 (1976).

Attorney General's Opinions

Child Abuse, Neglect, and Dependency Proceedings — Duty of County Attorney: It is the duty of the County Attorney to represent the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) in child abuse, neglect, and dependency proceedings brought under Title 41, ch. 3. 42 A.G. Op. 45 (1987).

Authority to Prevent Withholding of Treatment: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) has authority to initiate legal proceedings to prevent the withholding of medically indicated treatment for disabled infants with life-threatening conditions under the 1985 amendments to the child abuse, neglect, and dependency statutes. 41 A.G. Op. 85 (1986).

Disclosure of Case Records and Reports of Child Abuse and Neglect: Absent a court order, 41-3-205 prohibits the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) from disclosing case records and reports of child abuse and neglect to: (1) the natural parents or parent or other person having legal custody of a child who is the subject of a dependency and neglect action filed under 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422); (2) health care professionals who are treating a child suspected of being abused or neglected; (3) the noncustodial parent of a child who has been removed from the custodial parent following an incident of abuse or neglect; and (4) the natural parents or parent or other person having legal custody of a child who has been abused or neglected while in the care of foster parents. 41 A.G. County Power — "4-C's": Counties, jointly with the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services), may contract with local "4-C's" projects to provide coordination and support of child abuse prevention and treatment services. 37 A.G. Op. 105 (1978).

2023 Amendments — Composite Section: Section 4, Ch. 674, L. 2023, in (1)(b) substituted current definition of reasonable efforts for former definition (see sec. 4, Ch. 674, L. 2023, for former text); and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2023.

Section 34, Ch. 716, L. 2023, in (2) in first sentence inserted reference to Montana ICWA; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2023, and terminates June 30, 2025.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 674, L. 2023, provided: "WHEREAS, the federal Indian Child Welfare Act requires active efforts that are affirmative, active, and thorough and timely efforts that are tailored, in a manner consistent with prevailing social and cultural conditions, to each case to maintain or reunite an Indian child with the child's family; and

WHEREAS, the federal Indian Child Welfare Act outlines placement preferences for foster care, preadoptive, or adoptive placements of Indian children, prioritizing placement with members of a child's extended family; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature desires to incorporate the federal Indian Child Welfare Act's requirements regarding active efforts and placement preferences into Montana's existing child abuse and neglect laws."

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 716, L. 2023, provided: "WHEREAS, there is, at the present time, a court case before the United States Supreme Court known as Haaland v. Brackeen, No. 21-376, that has the potential to overturn or modify the Indian Child Welfare Act in its current form, and the Legislature seeks to provide guidance for Indian child protection cases in the interim as this case is decided. The Legislature does not expect this to be the final word on how we deal with Indian child welfare issues or how we seek to provide for all of Montana's children within the child protection system."

2021 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 19 in (1)(b)(ii)(A) substituted "written prevention plans" for "voluntary protective services agreements". Amendment effective July 1, 2021.

Chapter 222 substituted (1)(b) for former second sentence that read: "Reasonable efforts include but are not limited to voluntary protective services agreements, development of individual written case plans specifying state efforts to reunify families, placement in the least disruptive setting possible, provision of services pursuant to a case plan, and periodic review of each case to ensure timely progress toward reunification or permanent placement"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2021.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 166 in (5) near middle after "efforts" inserted "including consideration of both in-state and out-of-state permanent placement options for the child"; in (6) near end of first sentence after "plan" inserted "including, if appropriate, placement in another state" and near middle of third sentence after "planning" inserted "including identifying in-state and out-of-state placements"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2007.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 449 in (2) in second sentence after first "counsel" inserted requirement for court to immediately provide for appointment or assignment of counsel, after second "counsel" deleted "must be appointed by the court at the time that a request is made for a determination under this subsection", and inserted reference to representation of indigent parent in accordance with 41-3-425. Amendment effective April 28, 2005.

Saving Clause: Section 78, Ch. 449, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 555 in (1) near middle of second sentence inserted reference to voluntary protective services agreements and at end deleted "The court shall review the services provided by the agency"; and inserted (7) relating to court review of the department's reasonable efforts to prevent removal of a child. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

2001 Amendments — Composite Section — Coordination: Chapter 83 in (1)(b) in first sentence after "served" deleted "pursuant to the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure" and after "order" inserted "as provided in 41-3-428 and 41-3-429"; and in (6)(e) inserted "including the name and address of a putative father, as defined in 42-2-201, for the purpose of obtaining service of process in the proceeding". Amendment effective March 20, 2001. The amendment by Ch. 281 rendered the amendment by Ch. 83 void.

Chapter 281 deleted former (1) and (2) that read: "(1) (a) Upon the filing of a petition for temporary investigative authority and protective services, the court, after consideration of the parents' statements, if any, included with the petition and any accompanying affidavit or report to the court, may issue an order granting relief that may be required for the immediate protection of the youth.

(b) The order, along with the petition and supporting documents, must be served pursuant to the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure on the person or persons named in the order. When the youth is placed in a medical facility or protective facility, the department shall notify the parents or parent, guardian, or other person having legal custody of the youth, at the time the placement is made or as soon after placement as possible.

(c) The order must require the person served to comply immediately with the terms of the order and to appear before the court issuing the order on the date specified for a show cause hearing. The show cause hearing must be conducted within 20 days of the issuance of the order by the judge or a master appointed by the judge. The person filing the petition has the burden of presenting evidence establishing probable cause for the issuance of the order. At the show cause hearing, the court shall provide an opportunity for a parent or guardian, if present, and any other person having relevant knowledge to provide relevant testimony. The court may consider all relevant evidence in accordance with the rules of civil procedure as modified by this part, but may in its discretion limit testimony and evidence to only that which is relevant to the issues of removal from the home and the child's need for continued protection. The court may amend the order. Except as otherwise provided in this part, the rules of civil procedure apply. Hearsay evidence of statements made by the affected youth is admissible at the hearing or at a contested case proceeding held pursuant to Title 2, chapter 4, part 6, that results from adverse licensing action taken by the department.

(d) If the child is not returned home after the show cause hearing, the person served may request that a local citizen review board, if available pursuant to part 10, review the case within 30 days of the show cause hearing and make a recommendation to the district court, as provided in 41-3-1010.

(e) Upon a failure to comply or show cause, the court may hold the person in contempt or place temporary physical custody of the youth with the department until further order.

(2) At the conclusion of a show cause hearing, in an order granting or denying relief, the court shall make a finding regarding the reasonableness of agency efforts to prevent the child's removal from the home or to make it possible to safely return the child to the child's home. In determining preservation or reunification services to be provided and in making reasonable efforts at providing preservation or reunification services, the child's health and safety are of paramount concern"; inserted (1) requiring reasonable efforts to prevent the necessity of removal of a child from the child's home and to reunify families that have been separated by the state; in (2) inserted first two sentences allowing the department to request a determination that preservation or reunification services need not be provided and providing for appointment of counsel for indigent parents; inserted (4) requiring that a finding that preservation or reunification services are not necessary be supported by clear and convincing evidence; in (5) near beginning inserted reference to subsection (3); deleted former (6) through (9) that read: "(6) The court may grant the following kinds of relief:

(a) right of entry by a peace officer or department worker;

(b) medical and psychological evaluation of the youth or parents, guardians, or person having physical or legal custody;

(c) requirement that the youth, parents, guardians, or person having physical or legal custody receive counseling services;

(d) placement of the youth in a temporary medical facility or a facility for protection of the youth;

(e) requirement that the parents, guardian, or other person having physical or legal custody furnish information that the court may designate;

(f) inquiry into the financial ability of the parents, guardian, or other person having custody of the youth to contribute to the costs for the care, custody, and treatment of the youth and requirement of a contribution for those costs pursuant to the requirements of 41-3-411; or

(g) other temporary disposition that may be required in the best interests of the youth that does not require an expenditure of money by the department unless the department is notified and a court hearing is set in a timely manner on the proposed expenditure. The department is the payor of last resort after all family, insurance, and other resources have been examined.

(7) An order for temporary investigative authority and protective services may not be issued for a period longer than 90 days following the show cause hearing and must be limited to one extension of 90 days. Before the expiration of the time provided for in an order for temporary investigative authority and protective services, the county attorney, the attorney general, or an attorney hired by the county shall file a petition for one of the following:

(a) limited emancipation;

(b) temporary legal custody;

(c) termination of the parent-child legal relationship and permanent legal custody with the right to consent to adoption; or

(d) dismissal.

(8) Notwithstanding the above time limits, the court may continue an order for temporary investigative authority pending a hearing on a petition provided for in subsection (7).

(9) If the time limitations of this section are not met, the court shall review the reasons for the failure and order an appropriate remedy that considers the best interests of the child"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Chapter 311 throughout (1) substituted references to a child for references to a youth; in (1)(c) near middle substituted reference to Montana Rules of Evidence for reference to rules of civil procedure and deleted former next-to-last sentence that read: "Except as otherwise provided in this part, the rules of civil procedure apply"; in (6) at end inserted last sentence referring to concurrent planning; in (7) at end of first sentence deleted "and must be limited to one extension of 90 days"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001. The amendment by Ch. 281 rendered the amendment by Ch. 311, other than the insertion of the sentence in (6) referring to concurrent planning, void.

The amendment to subsection (6) of this section made by sec. 9, Ch. 311, L. 2001, was rendered void by sec. 18(3), Ch. 281, L. 2001, a coordination section.

Saving Clause: Section 8, Ch. 83, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

Section 19, Ch. 281, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 566 near beginning of (1)(b) substituted "served pursuant to the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure" for "served by a peace officer or a representative of the department"; in (2) at beginning of first sentence inserted "At the conclusion of a show cause hearing", after "agency efforts to" deleted "rehabilitate the family to", and end inserted "or to make it possible to safely return the child to the child's home" and inserted last two sentences and (2)(a) through (2)(e) providing that child's health and safety are paramount concern in determining preservation and reunification services to be provided and establishing criteria for when reasonable efforts to provide preservation or reunification services are not required; inserted (3) establishing criteria for when preservation or reunification services are not required for putative father; inserted (4) requiring permanency hearing within 30 days of finding that preservation or reunification services are not necessary; inserted (5) requiring department to make reasonable efforts to permanently place child if court determines efforts to return child to home are inconsistent with permanency plan and allowing permanent placement efforts to be conducted concurrently with efforts to return child to home; in (6)(e) substituted "furnish information" for "furnish services"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1997 Amendments: Chapter 501 in (1)(a), near middle, inserted "after consideration of the parents' statements, if any, included with the petition and any accompanying affidavit or report to the court". Amendment effective May 2, 1997.

Chapter 516 in (1)(c), in first sentence after "terms of the order", substituted "and" for "or" and at end substituted "for a show cause hearing" for "and show cause why the person has not complied with the order" and inserted fourth through sixth sentences regarding evidence at the show cause hearing and the court's ability to amend an order; inserted (1)(d) regarding case review by a local citizen review board; in (1)(e), near middle after "temporary", substituted "physical" for "legal"; inserted (2) requiring a finding regarding the reasonableness of agency efforts; in (3)(b) and (3)(c), after "having", inserted "physical or"; in (3)(e), after "having", inserted "physical or legal"; in (3)(f), at end, substituted "41-3-411" for "41-3-406(3) through (6)"; in (3)(g), near beginning of first sentence after "best", substituted "interests" for "interest"; inserted (4) limiting an order for temporary investigative authority; inserted (5) regarding continuance of an order for temporary investigative authority; and inserted (6) requiring the court to review reasons why time limits have not been met and order an appropriate remedy.

Applicability: Section 20, Ch. 516, L. 1997, provided that this section applies to proceedings commenced on or after October 1, 1997.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 458 in (1)(c), in last sentence, inserted final clause regarding contested case hearing resulting from adverse licensing action. Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

1993 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 112 at end of (1)(c) inserted "Hearsay evidence of statements made by the affected youth is admissible at the hearing"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 362 throughout section, after "department", deleted "of family services"; in (2)(g), at end after "youth", inserted "that does not require an expenditure of money by the department unless the department is notified and a court hearing is set in a timely manner on the proposed expenditure. The department is the payor of last resort after all family, insurance, and other resources have been examined"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 16, 1993.

In the phrase "Except as otherwise provided herein", Ch. 112, near end of (1)(c) changed "herein" to "in this part" and Ch. 362 changed "herein" to "in this section". The codifier used "in this part" because it is the broader reference.

1991 Amendment: Inserted (2)(f) allowing a court to inquire into the financial ability of parent, guardian, or custodian to contribute to costs for care, custody, and treatment of a youth and to order contribution for those costs. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1987 Amendment: Substituted "department of family services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services".

1985 Amendment: In (1)(b), near beginning after "order", inserted "along with the petition and supporting documents", and inserted second sentence requiring the Department to notify parents or guardians when youth is placed in medical facility or protective facility; and in (1)(c), in first sentence, near middle after "terms thereof or", deleted "upon failure to so comply", and inserted second and third sentences requiring a show cause hearing within 20 days of protection order and requiring the petitioner to present evidence establishing probable cause for the protective order.

Case Notes

District Court's Termination of Parental Rights Not Abuse of Discretion — Mother's Failure to Make Progress in Treatment Plan and Unwillingness to Engage Department's Efforts to Assist — Conduct or Condition Unlikely to Change Within Reasonable Time. In re A.M.G., 2022 MT 175, 410 Mont. 25, 517 P.3d 149.

Stipulation to Not Provide Reunification Services — No Error in Termination of Parental Rights — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel When Mother Incarcerated and Children Out of Her Care For More Than 2 Years in 3-Year Period: After her parental rights were terminated, the mother claimed she had received ineffective assistance of counsel. She argued that by stipulating to the request of the Department of Public Health and Human Services that it not provide reunification services, her attorney had acknowledged she had subjected the children to chronic, severe neglect, which led to the termination of her rights. Prior to the hearing on termination, however, the mother had been sentenced to 48 months in federal prison. In its termination order, the District Court emphasized that the children had been out of the mother's care for 31 of the past 34 months and that they would be out of her care for another 23 months. The District Court also based the termination on the testimony of a court-appointed special advocate and the guardian ad litem that it would be in the children's best interests. Based on the evidence, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the mother had not been prejudiced by her attorney's stipulation. In re D.A.D., 2021 MT 2, 402 Mont. 399, 478 P.3d 809.

Relapse and Domestic Violence at Level of Chronic, Severe Neglect — Termination Proper: In a case involving years of drug abuse relapses and domestic violence, the District Court terminated parental rights without requiring the Department of Public Health and Human Services to make reasonable efforts to reunify the family, finding the aggravated circumstance of chronic, severe neglect. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, finding substantial support for the determination in the repeated history of drug abuse and domestic violence in the child's home. In re C.S., 2020 MT 127, 400 Mont. 115, 464 P.3d 66.

No Reliance on Previous Adjudication of Youth in Need of Care — Termination Improper: The District Court terminated a mother's parental rights, and the mother appealed. The issue concerned whether the District Court properly determined the child to be abused or neglected while providing the mother fundamentally fair procedures. In a previous case, the child had been placed with the child's father, resolving issues of neglect. The Supreme Court ruled that the state cannot rely on an adjudication as a youth in need of care or a determination of abuse and neglect from a prior case and reversed the termination of parental rights. In re D.D., 2020 MT 126, 400 Mont. 105, 464 P.3d 60.

Reasonable Efforts When Noncommunicative Parent Moves Out of State: A mother with substance abuse problems failed in many ways to act on the treatment plan created by the Department of Public Health and Human Services and then moved to Idaho, from where she failed to maintain communication with the Department. Subsequently, the District Court terminated the mother's parental rights. Relying on In re R.J.F., 2019 MT 113, 395 Mont. 454, 443 P.3d 387, the mother appealed on the basis that the Department had not made reasonable efforts. Reviewing for abuse of discretion, the Supreme Court affirmed, explaining that the facts showed reasonable efforts by the Department and that the mother had unilaterally moved out of state and failed to maintain contact with the Department. In re R.L., 2019 MT 267, 397 Mont. 507, 452 P.3d 890.

Obligation to Provide Affirmative, Active, Thorough, and Timely Efforts to Reunite Indian Child With Family: Child Protective Services (CPS) became involved with a child when the child's mother tested positive for methamphetamine. The mother is a member of the Little Shell Tribe of Chippewa Indians and the child is eligible for membership, so the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) applied to subsequent efforts regarding the child's father. CPS sought termination of the father's parental rights, which the District Court granted. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded, finding that the requirements of law were not satisfied by CPS's efforts and evidence, noting that the ICWA requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt that a state seeking termination of parental rights to an Indian child has made active efforts to provide remedial and rehabilitative programs designed to prevent the breakup of the Indian family and that those efforts were unsuccessful. In re K.L., 2019 MT 256, 397 Mont. 446, 451 P.3d 518.

Reasonable Efforts: The District Court terminated a mother's parental rights. The mother appealed, arguing that the Department of Public Health and Human Services had not made reasonable efforts to help her. The Supreme Court reviewed the facts of the case and affirmed the District Court's decision to terminate, having concluded that the mother had not complied with her treatment plan and was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In re C.M., 2019 MT 227, 397 Mont. 275, 449 P.3d 806.

Termination of Parental Rights Proper — Parent's Failure to Engage With Counsel and Department Not Basis for Due Process Claim: A father failed to sign and return his treatment plan and did not provide current contact information to his attorney or the Department of Public Health and Human Services. After his parental rights were terminated, he asserted that he was denied due process of law on the basis that (1) he was not served with the petition for temporary legal custody before his child was adjudicated a youth in need of care, (2) he received ineffective assistance of counsel, and (3) the Department failed to make reasonable efforts to prevent the removal of his child. The Supreme Court found the due process claim to be unfounded because the father was served with the petition prior to termination and was aware of the proceedings throughout, a parent cannot establish ineffective assistance of counsel through his own failure to contact and engage with counsel, and the father did not fulfill his obligation to engage with and maintain sufficient contact with the Department for the Department to be able to assist the father. In re B.J.J., 2019 MT 129, 396 Mont. 108, 443 P.3d 488.

Termination of Parental Rights — Removal of Infant — Mother Located in Another State — Department Policies Not Followed — Evidentiary Admissions Clarified: The Montana Department of Public Health and Human Services, Child and Family Services Division, became involved with a mother and child when the mother tested positive for methamphetamine and marijuana at the child's birth. During portions of the proceeding, the mother lived in different states, did not own a vehicle, did not have a driver's license, and could not make it to Montana due to weather. The District Court ultimately terminated the mother's parental rights, finding that the mother did not successfully complete her treatment plan and the condition rendering her unfit, unable, or unwilling to parent was unlikely to change. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the Department failed to provide reasonable efforts to place the child as close as possible to the mother's home in violation of the Department's policies, that it did not implement a service provision plan that could successfully address the mother's substance abuse problem, that the removal of an infant implicates different services than the removal of an older child, that it failed to take efforts to identify or locate a potential kinship placement, that it failed to provide reasonable efforts designed to reunify the mother and her child, and that the presumption in favor of termination in 41-3-604 was misplaced. The court then clarified In re M.C., 2017 MT 252, 389 Mont. 78, 403 P.3d 1266, to hold that it did not intend that case to be interpreted to permit courts to admit any and all written reports or evaluations or service-related documents over otherwise valid hearsay or foundation objections. In re R.J.F., 2019 MT 113, 395 Mont 454, 443 P.3d 387.

Termination of Parental Rights Proper When Record Clearly Shows Reasonable Efforts Made to Reunite Family — Failure of Mother to Cooperate With Getting New Attorney Appointed — Counsel Retained at All Critical Stages of Proceeding — No Due Process Violation: The District Court did not abuse its discretion when it terminated the mother's parental rights when the record clearly shows reasonable efforts were made to reunite the family pursuant to 41-3-423(1) (see 2023 amendment to 41-3-423) and because 41-3-609(1)(f) does not require a specific finding by the District Court that reasonable efforts were made before terminating the mother's parental rights. Because she had counsel at all critical states of the proceedings, the mother's due process right was not infringed when she was without counsel due to her own failure to cooperate. In re M.V.R., 2016 MT 309, 385 Mont. 448, 384 P.3d 1058.

Three Voluntary Services Agreements Prior to First Removal — Child Safety at Issue — Reasonable Efforts Adequate: A father contested the termination of his parental rights and argued that the Department of Public Health and Human Services had not made reasonable efforts to prevent the necessity of removing his children. After his rights were terminated by the District Court, the father appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the Department had made reasonable efforts under this section, given that the Department had entered into three voluntary services agreements before removing the firstborn child and that the father had purchased wine for his wife when she was pregnant with their second child. In re A.G., 2016 MT 203, 384 Mont. 361, 378 P.3d 1177.

Treatment Plan Executed in Good Faith Despite Case Worker Turnover — Due Process Not Violated in Termination Proceedings: The mother appealed the termination of her parental rights, arguing that she was denied due process of law when the Department of Public Health and Human Services did not execute her treatment plan in good faith because it did not adequately account for her history as a victim of domestic violence and because she was assigned six different child protection specialists during the course of her case. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the Department took notice of the mother's history as a victim of domestic violence and, given the Department's provision of numerous services and its efforts to reunite the family, the fact that the mother was assigned numerous case workers did not in itself establish a due process violation. In re T.D.H., 2015 MT 244, 380 Mont. 401, 356 P.3d 457.

Reasonable Efforts to Provide Reunification — Child's Health and Safety Paramount Concern: After the termination of a mother's parental rights, the mother appealed, claiming that the Department of Public Health and Human Services failed to provide reasonable reunification services by preventing phone contact between the mother and her child and by preventing the mother's placement at a residential home for substance-abusing women and their children. However, the Department's opposition to the mother's placement at the home was reasonable because the mother had not made progress on her drug treatment plan or demonstrated that the child could be safely returned to her care. In addition, because of the child's discomfort with his parental interactions, the child chose not to speak with his mother on the telephone, and the Department's paramount concern was the child's health and safety. Although the Department was required to make reasonable reunification service efforts, it was not required to provide every conceivable reunification service. In re J.O., 2015 MT 229, 380 Mont. 263, 354 P.3d 1242.

Father's Partial Compliance With Treatment Plan Insufficient — Sufficient Evidence to Support Termination: The Department of Public Health and Human Services initiated a parental rights termination proceeding, alleging the father presented a risk to his children. The District Court ultimately terminated the father's rights. On appeal, the father argued that the Department failed to act in good faith and failed to provide reunification services, that he had partially completed his treatment plan, and that it was reasonable for him to improve. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the Department was not biased and did not act in bad faith, that a parent does not complete a treatment plan by partial or even substantial compliance with a treatment plan, and that the evidence supported the determination that the father was unlikely to improve. In re A.K., 2015 MT 116, 379 Mont. 41, 347 P.3d 711.

Termination of Parental Rights Proper — Prior Termination of Rights Relevant Where Parent Is Unlikely to Change Behavior: A couple of months before the birth of I.T., the mother's rights to her three children were terminated due to her drug use. Shortly after I.T.'s birth, I.T. was placed in a neonatal intensive care unit for drug withdrawal treatment. At that time, the state petitioned for emergency protective services and later requested and received approval that it need not provide preservation or reunification services to the mother given the prior termination for parental rights and the mother's unlikeliness to change her behavior that led to termination. Subsequently, the mother's parental rights to I.T. were terminated. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's ruling based on substantial evidence in the record that the mother's chemical dependency was not likely to change. In re I.T., 2015 MT 43, 378 Mont. 239, 343 P.3d 1192. See also In re C.B., 2019 MT 294, 398 Mont. 176, 454 P.3d 1195.

Reasonable Efforts Adequate — Termination Proper: A mother appealed the termination of her parental rights, arguing that the Department of Public Health and Human Services was precluded from seeking termination of her parental rights when it failed to make reasonable efforts to reunite her with her child by not providing recommended mental health treatment. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that because the mother was on a waiting list with multiple mental health providers as a result of the Department's efforts and because the mother's ability to parent most likely would not have improved within the period of time between removal of the child and termination of parental rights had the recommended counseling taken place, additional reasonable efforts were not required. In re K.L., 2014 MT 28, 373 Mont. 421, 318 P.3d 691.

Continued Neglect of Children Sufficient Basis for Termination of Mother's Parental Rights Without Reunification Efforts: A mother appealed the District Court's termination of her parental rights to her two children under 41-3-423 on the basis of neglect. The Supreme Court held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the mother's parental rights without requiring reunification efforts because the record established that the mother's history of continued and worsening drug use and neglect of her children amounted to "chronic, severe neglect" under 41-3-423(2)(a) and that reunification efforts and treatment plans were not in the best interests of the children. In re E.Z.C., 2013 MT 123, 370 Mont. 116, 300 P.3d 1174. See also In re J.A.B. and L.M.F., 2015 MT 28, 378 Mont. 119, 342 P.3d 35.

No Error in Not Holding Separate Reunification Hearing or Permanency Hearing: A court terminated the parental rights of a mother to her two children in Colorado in 2009. In 2012, the Department of Public Health and Human Services petitioned to forgo reasonable efforts to reunify the mother with her child and to terminate her parental rights because her parenting behavior had not changed since her parental rights to her other two children had been terminated. The Supreme Court found that although the lower court did not hold a separate "pre-hearing" to determine if reunification with the child was possible, the mother was on notice from the petition that the Department was requesting that reasonable efforts be abandoned and she had the opportunity to be heard at the termination hearing. In addition, the Supreme Court found that although the District Court did not conduct a permanency hearing, the Department's actions, including working with the father on a treatment plan in hopes of reunifying him with the child, were consistent with the purposes of such a hearing, and the failure to hold a permanency hearing was not a per se violation of parental rights. In re J.W., 2013 MT 201, 371 Mont. 98, 307 P.3d 274.

Chronic, Severe Neglect — Termination of Parental Rights Affirmed — Consideration of Prior Petition Proper: The parents appealed the District Court's finding that they had subjected their children to chronic, severe neglect and its order terminating their parental rights. The parents argued that the Department of Public Health and Human Services was collaterally estopped from introducing evidence contained in a prior petition for temporary legal custody of the children to establish chronic, severe neglect in the present petition. The parents also argued that their conduct did not rise to the level of chronic, severe neglect. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding the elements of collateral estoppel were not met because the issues in the current and prior petitions were not identical and the prior petition was not dismissed as a final judgment on the merits. The Supreme Court upheld the District Court's finding of chronic, severe neglect, noting that discrete instances of neglect, when viewed within a consistent pattern of similar behavior, provide a clear basis for a finding of chronic, severe neglect. In re M.N., J.N., Jr., & R.N., 2011 MT 245, 362 Mont. 186, 261 P.3d 1047. See also In re E.Z.C., 2013 MT 123, 370 Mont. 116, 300 P.3d 1174, and In re L.N., 2014 MT 187, 375 Mont. 480, 329 P.3d 598, in which the Supreme Court affirmed the termination of parental rights to L.N., the fourth child of the parents of J.N., M.N., and R.N. (see above), on the basis that the parents had previously subjected their older children to chronic and severe neglect.

Department's Reunification Efforts Held Reasonable — Termination of Parental Rights Over Siblings Held Sufficient Justification — No Abuse of Discretion: After the District Court terminated a mother's parental rights over her child C.J., the mother appealed, claiming as unreasonable the 4½ months that passed between the petition by the Department of Public Health and Human Services (Department) to be exempted from the "reasonable efforts" for reunification requirement under 41-3-423(2)(e), because the mother's rights over C.J.'s two siblings had also been terminated, and the date of the hearing. The Supreme Court held that the Department's efforts were reasonable notwithstanding the Department's petition, that there was no timeline provided in the statutes for the hearing, that the delay in holding the hearing did not subject the mother to a fundamentally unfair proceeding, and that the mother was correctly not given a treatment plan because her circumstances met the requirements of 41-3-609(1)(d) and 41-3-423(2)(e) regarding termination of a mother's rights over one child because her rights over other siblings were previously terminated. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that there was no abuse of discretion by the District Court in terminating the mother's parental rights over C.J. In re C.J., 2010 MT 179, 357 Mont. 219, 237 P.3d 1282.

Proper Consideration of Circumstances of Prior Involuntary Termination of Parental Rights — Clear and Convincing Evidence to Support Termination of Rights to Subsequent Child: The parents contended that there was no clear and convincing evidence to support termination of their parental rights to A.H.D. based on the prior involuntary termination of their rights to two other children. The Supreme Court disagreed. The District Court did not err in relying on relevant testimony presented at earlier hearings and incorporating earlier findings based on evidence presented at those hearings. The court correctly considered that the circumstances related to the prior termination were ongoing and relevant to the parents' ability to adequately care for A.H.D. Thus, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parents' rights to A.H.D. In re A.H.D., 2008 MT 57, 341 M 494, 178 P3d 131 (2008). See also In re C.B., 2019 MT 294, 398 Mont. 176, 454 P.3d 1195.

Sufficient Evidence to Terminate Rights of Incarcerated Parent: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parental rights of an incarcerated parent after citing: (1) the fact that the child would have been in foster placement for more than 15 of the most recent months before the parent was eligible for parole, thus satisfying the presumption in 41-3-604(1); (2) the parent's criminal history, including seven prior felonies and four sentence revocations; (3) the parent's history of voluntary underemployment, despite the parent's asserted wish to support the child; (4) the parent's failure to establish a substantial relationship with the child through visits or regular contact; (5) the failure of the parent to manifest an ability to assume legal and physical custody because of incarceration; (6) the child's need for immediate permanent placement in order to meet the child's developmental, cognitive, and psychological stability needs; and (7) the inability of the parent to provide for immediate placement because of incarceration. The parent appealed on grounds that the District Court improperly relied on the presumption in 41-3-604(1). The Supreme Court agreed that the presumption was not satisfied because the child had not been in foster care for the requisite amount of time. However, the court noted that parental rights may properly be terminated if the District Court correctly relies on any one basis set out in 41-3-609. In this case, the District Court correctly relied on several bases other than the statutory presumption and thus did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parent's rights. In re M.P., 2008 MT 39, 341 M 333, 177 P3d 495 (2008).

Evidence of Parent's Conviction for Sexual Abuse of Child Sufficient Basis for Termination of Parental Rights: The state petitioned to terminate C.T.'s parental rights on grounds that his child S.T. and the child's mother had lived with C.T. for 2 years, that C.T. was a convicted sex offender, and that both mother and child had been exposed to domestic violence. Without objection, the District Court took judicial notice of C.T.'s conviction for sexual intercourse with a minor and granted the state's petition. C.T. appealed on grounds that the court abused its discretion by terminating his parental rights on the basis of facts not alleged in the petition or supported by the evidence, asserting that even though the court took judicial notice of the conviction, that court never received the documents into evidence and therefore erred by relying on that evidence in entering its findings of fact. The Supreme Court declined to recognize a distinction between taking judicial notice and entering the noticed facts into evidence. In a civil proceeding, judicially noticed facts are accepted as conclusive, and once a fact is judicially noticed, the party offering the evidence is relieved of the duty to also move for its admission. Thus, C.T.'s conviction was not subject to reasonable dispute, and the District Court was entitled to rely on the conviction as clear and convincing evidence that C.T. had sexually abused a child and to rely on 41-3-423(2)(a) as a statutory basis for terminating C.T.'s parental rights. The District Court was affirmed. In re S.T., 2008 MT 19, 341 M 176, 176 P3d 1054 (2008).

Constitutionality of Procedures Allowing Consideration of Prior Termination of Parental Rights to Sibling: A mother asserted that procedures for terminating her parental rights violated due process, particularly when the District Court considered the prior involuntary termination of the mother's rights to A.P.'s sibling when it terminated her rights to A.P. The Supreme Court noted that because it is a fundamental liberty interest, a parent's right to the care and custody of a child must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures that ensure that the parent is not placed at an unfair disadvantage during termination proceedings. In this case, consideration of the prior termination of the mother's rights to a sibling did not violate due process. The District Court is not required to terminate, but rather the court has discretion to grant or deny the state's termination petition if the state proves the statutory elements, nor is the decision limited to the facts of the prior termination because the court also considers any available evidence relating to present family circumstances and the specific child at issue. The parent is also provided an opportunity to challenge the termination petition, and the burden of proof is on the state without placing the parent at an unfair disadvantage. The Supreme Court determined that the procedure allowing consideration of a prior termination does not violate a parent's due process rights. In re Custody & Parental Rights of A.P., 2007 MT 297, 340 M 39, 172 P3d 105 (2007).

Prior Involuntary Termination of Parental Rights to Sibling as Circumstance for Termination of Parental Rights: The involuntary termination of parental rights to a child's sibling constitutes one circumstance that a District Court may consider in terminating parental rights, as long as the circumstances related to the termination are relevant to the parent's ability to adequately care for the child at issue. The circumstances of a prior termination continue to be relevant in a later termination of a sibling unless the circumstances have changed. In this case, the District Court afforded a mother an opportunity to demonstrate that her circumstances had changed since her rights to her child's sibling were previously terminated, but the mother offered no evidence of changed circumstances, so the District Court did not err in terminating the mother's parental rights to the second child. In re Custody & Parental Rights of A.P., 2007 MT 297, 340 M 39, 172 P3d 105 (2007).

Failure to Develop Parenting Skills for Four Earlier Children — Termination of Parental Rights to Fifth Child Warranted Absent Improvement in Parenting Abilities: A mother suffered from a chromosomal abnormality known as velocardiofacial syndrome (VCFS) that caused numerous physical and cognitive difficulties and developmental delays, resulting in mental impairment and limited intellectual capacity. The father suffered severe intellectual and personality handicaps that were diagnosed as developmental and irreversible. All of the couple's children were afflicted with VCFS. Despite the efforts of the state to assist the parents in developing parenting skills over a period of several years, the parents proved unable to care for their special needs children, resulting in the termination of parental rights to the couple's first four children. The state attempted to help the parents with their fifth child, who was the subject of this case, but again the parents were unable to properly care for the child, and the state ultimately sought to terminate parental rights in order to place the child with a family that was able to provide the specialized intensive care necessary for the child's development and well-being. The District Court held that the child was a youth in need of care, and based in part on unchanged circumstances from the four previous adjudications regarding the child's siblings, the court terminated the parents' rights. The parents appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court heard extensive testimony from numerous professionals who worked with the family and opined that because the parents' conditions were permanent, chronic, and irreversible, their inability to care for the child had not changed and would not change in the future. Thus, the court properly concluded that the child was at substantial risk of ongoing or continuing physical or psychological harm by acts or omissions of the parents that were unchanged from their previous parental terminations and that termination in this case was also warranted. In re K.J.B., 2007 MT 216, 339 M 28, 168 P3d 629 (2007), followed in In re T.S.B., 2008 MT 23, 341 M 204, 177 P3d 429 (2008). See also In re J.W., 2013 MT 201, 371 Mont. 98, 307 P.3d 274.

Admissibility of Evidence of Prior Conviction Based on Certified Copy of Judgment: When determining whether an aggravating circumstance existed in deciding whether to terminate a father's parental rights, the District Court admitted a certified copy of a judgment from a Texas court showing that the father pleaded guilty to and was convicted of a sexual offense. The father asserted that the evidence should not have been admitted because it could not be determined from the document whether a nolo contendere plea was accepted, which would have disallowed the evidence under Rule 803(22), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), and because the judgment or other evidence did not show the essential facts necessary to sustain the judgment. The state argued that the hearsay exception did apply because the father clearly entered a guilty plea and because no proof of the underlying facts was required. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. There was no evidence that the father entered a nolo contendere plea, and the Texas conviction was presumed valid absent direct evidence presented by the father that the conviction was invalid. Additionally, In re L.M.A.T. & B.L.F.T., 2002 MT 163, 310 M 422, 51 P3d 504 (2002), provided that when the state relies on a prior conviction to establish an aggravating circumstance, the state is not required to present evidence of the circumstances of the conviction. Thus, the certified copy of the judgment adjudicating guilt was adequate evidence of the conviction and was properly admitted. The state met its burden of proving that an aggravating circumstance existed, and the District Court's findings of fact were supported by substantial credible evidence supporting the conclusion that the father's prior conviction constituted an aggravating circumstance. In re. M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006).

Findings Based on More Than Prior Conviction for Crime Against Child — Sufficient Findings to Substantiate Termination of Parental Rights: A father asserted that the District Court lacked sufficient evidence to terminate his parental rights because the court relied on a prior crime committed in Texas that, if committed in Montana, would have been only a misdemeanor. The Supreme Court found that substantial evidence existed to support termination. In addition to the prior sexual crime against a child that was an aggravating circumstance under Montana law, the District Court also found that the father had no significant contact with his children for more than 3 years and failed to complete a treatment plan, that the children had been in foster care for 28 months prior to the termination hearing, and that there was evidence that one of the children claimed that the father sexually abused her. Termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re. M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006).

Out-of-State Conviction of Indecency With Child Considered Aggravating Circumstance for Purposes of Terminating Parental Rights: A father was convicted in Texas of indecency with a child. A Montana District Court considered the Texas conviction as an aggravating circumstance in terminating the father's parental rights. On appeal, the father contended that in Texas, the crime of indecency with a child was analogous to indecent exposure and asserted that the state did not introduce clear and convincing evidence that the Texas crime would constitute sexual abuse under Montana law to qualify as an aggravating circumstance. The Supreme Court disagreed. In Montana, the definition of child abuse includes indecent exposure, and the District Court properly concluded that the Texas conviction constituted an aggravating circumstance under Montana law. In re. M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006). See also In re L.M.A.T. & B.L.F.T., 2002 MT 163, 310 M 422, 51 P3d 504 (2002).

Parent's Prior Conviction of Sexual Offense Properly Applied in Parental Rights Termination Proceeding — No Retroactive Statutory Application: During proceedings to terminate a father's parental rights, the state became aware of the father's prior 1985 conviction in Texas of a sexual offense involving a minor. The District Court held that the prior conviction was an aggravating circumstance under this section for purposes of terminating the father's parental rights pursuant to 41-3-609. On appeal, the father argued that the court improperly applied the 1999 amendments to 41-3-609 and this section retroactively to a criminal act that occurred at least 13 years prior to enactment of the amendments, in violation of the father's vested constitutional parental rights. Setting out the conditions of retroactivity, the Supreme Court noted that a statute does not operate retroactively merely because it is applied to conduct that occurs prior to the statute's enactment and that an amended statute that is applied to a factual situation that occurred prior to amendment is not viewed as retroactive in application. In this case, no additional sanction was imposed on the prior conviction by enactment of the new statutory provisions, but the prior conviction was made a condition for the termination of parental rights in the event that the children were subsequently neglected or abused. Moreover, the prior conviction did not require or inevitably lead to the children being abused or neglected, necessitating the filing of an abuse and neglect petition. Rather, the prior conviction became relevant as an independent ground for the state to petition for termination of parental rights only after the children were abused and neglected. Additionally, the statutes went into effect in 1999, and the termination proceeding was initiated in 2003, so the father was on notice that the prior conviction could be used as an aggravating circumstance to justify termination if the father allowed the children to be abused and neglected. Therefore, applying the 1999 versions of 41-3-609 and this section to a conviction that occurred prior to 1999 did not constitute an unlawful retroactive application of the statutes. In re. M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006).

Preservation or Reunification Services Not Required When Child Subjected to Aggravating Circumstances: The state does not need to make reasonable efforts to provide family preservation or reunification services if a court finds that a parent has subjected a child to any of the aggravating circumstances listed in subsection (2)(a) of this section. In re M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006).

No Due Process Violations in Parental Rights Termination Proceeding — Statutory Mandates Addressed: A mother asserted that her due process rights were violated in a parental rights termination proceeding because: (1) the state failed to make reasonable efforts to reunify mother and child as required in this section; (2) the District Court, in effect, terminated her right while purporting only to grant a planned permanent living arrangement and permanent care and control of the child to the state in violation of 41-3-609; (3) the state failed to petition the District Court for termination in a timely fashion in violation of 41-3-604; and (4) the District Court failed to hold a permanency plan hearing in a timely manner in violation of 41-3-445. The Supreme Court considered each claim and affirmed. Although reunification efforts failed, the state's efforts were reasonable and in compliance with the governing statutes. The mother's parental rights were severely limited, but not actually terminated, so her argument regarding improper termination procedures failed. The state does not have to petition to terminate parental rights if a compelling reason has been documented for determining that filing a petition would not be in the child's best interests. In this case, there was such a compelling reason—namely, that the state had tried to reunify mother and child for years and did not seek termination casually. The tardy permanency hearing argument also failed in light of the state's diligent, although unsuccessful, efforts to create a permanent and stable environment for the child in an effort to ensure that the child did not languish in foster care. In re B.N.Y., 2006 MT 34, 331 M 145, 130 P3d 594 (2006). See also In re R.T.L.P., 238 M 384, 777 P2d 892 (1989), and In re A.R., 2004 MT 22, 319 M 340, 83 P3d 1287 (2004).

Preservation and Reunification Efforts Not Required in Involuntary Termination of Parental Rights: If a court involuntarily terminates a parent's rights under 41-3-609, the state may forego reasonable efforts to provide preservation or reunification services to that parent with regard to any future children placed with the state, pursuant to this section. Voluntary relinquishment is only one of several criteria that a court may consider when ordering termination of parental rights. In this case, the District Court properly terminated a mother's parental rights based in part on adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care. With the exception of minor immaterial misstatements, the court's decision was based on facts supported by substantial testimonial evidence from professionals, so termination of parental rights was not an abuse of discretion, and the decision was affirmed. In re P.S., 2006 MT 4, 330 M 239, 127 P3d 451 (2006). See also In re C.B., 2019 MT 294, 398 Mont. 176, 454 P.3d 1195.

Chronic and Severe Neglect Inclusive of Emotional Neglect: In terminating parental rights without reunification services, the state relied on 41-3-609 and this section in a case of chronic, severe neglect of a child. A parent asserted that parental rights may not be terminated based on a finding of severe emotional neglect, but the Supreme Court held that by definition, neglect includes psychological harm to a child. (See 2023 amendment to 41-3-102.) Here, the parent's ongoing drug use and repeated incarceration resulted in the parent's unavailability to the child and inconsistent caregiving, and this neglect in turn produced high anxiety and emotional disturbance in the child. Parental rights were thus properly terminated based on chronic, severe emotional neglect. In re Custody & Parental Rights of D.S., 2005 MT 275, 329 M 180, 122 P3d 1239 (2005). See also In re M.N., J.N., Jr., & R.N., 2011 MT 245, 362 Mont. 186, 261 P.3d 1047, which held that discrete instances of neglect, when viewed within a consistent pattern of similar behavior, provide a clear basis by which a District Court can find chronic, severe neglect, and In re E.Z.C., 2013 MT 123, 370 Mont. 116, 300 P.3d 1174.

Statute Not Unconstitutionally Vague for Failure to Give Notice of Conduct Considered Aggravated Circumstance: A mother's parental rights were terminated without reunification services being offered pursuant to this section after the state contended that the mother subjected her child to an aggravated circumstance, namely abuse and neglect. On appeal, the mother contended that subsection (2)(a) of this section was vague and void on its face because the term "including but not limited to" failed to clearly define the standard that would warrant either termination of parental rights or withholding of reunification services, in violation of due process. The mother also asserted that by failing to provide direction to courts in determining what an aggravated circumstance is, basic policy matters were impermissibly delegated to judges for resolution on an ad hoc basis. The Supreme Court noted that a statute is vague on its face when it fails to give a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice that contemplated conduct is forbidden and that an appellant faces a high burden of proof of showing that no standard of conduct is specified at all. The court cited Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 US 781 (1989), for the holding that even when statutory standards are flexible and officials implementing them will exercise considerable discretion, perfect clarity and precise guidance are not required. Here, the statute listed several examples of conduct that constituted an aggravated circumstance, including conduct that the mother exposed her child to. Because the mother failed to prove that subsection (2)(a) of this section did not give fair notice of any standard of conduct at all, the statute was not void for vagueness. In re Custody & Parental Rights of D.S., 2005 MT 275, 329 M 180, 122 P3d 1239 (2005).

Attempted Rape of Child Considered Aggravated Circumstance — Determination That Preservation or Reunification Services for Incarcerated Parent Unnecessary Not Erroneous: Generally, the state must make reasonable efforts to reunite a family after children have been removed from the home. However, a District Court may determine that preservation or reunification services are not necessary if a parent has subjected a child to aggravated circumstances. Here, the District Court determined that the services were not necessary for a parent who was incarcerated for attempted rape of a child, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The parent's sexual abuse conviction met the definition of aggravated circumstances, and the determination that preservation or reunification services were unnecessary was not erroneous. In re L.M.A.T. & B.L.F.T., 2002 MT 163, 310 M 422, 51 P3d 504 (2002).

Circumstances Related to Termination of Parental Rights to First Child Relevant to Ability to Care for Second Child: The District Court noted that a mother's parental rights to her first child, S.P., had been terminated and concluded that, because the circumstances related to the termination in S.P.'s case were still present and relevant to the mother's ability to care for her second child, C.P., the mother's parental rights to C.P. should be terminated as well. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Pursuant to 41-3-609(1)(d), the parent-child relationship may be terminated if the parent has subjected the child to any of the circumstances listed in subsection (2) of this section, including when a parent has had parental rights to the child's sibling or other child of the parent involuntarily terminated and the circumstances related to the termination of parental rights are relevant to the parent's ability to adequately care for the child at issue. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in holding that the circumstances related to the termination in S.P.'s case were still present and relevant to the mother's ability to care for C.P., that continuation of the parent-child relationship would likely result in substantial risk of harm to C.P., and that it was in C.P.'s best interests that parental rights be terminated. In re C.P., 2001 MT 187, 306 M 238, 32 P3d 754 (2001).

Parent Not Represented by Counsel During Show Cause Hearing Regarding Whether Child a Youth in Need of Care — Due Process Rights Not Violated: At the time of a show cause hearing on whether her child was a youth in need of care, the mother was an indigent mental patient civilly committed to the state hospital. She appeared at the hearing without representation of counsel. The mother contended that the District Court violated her due process rights by making that critical determination regarding the child when she was unrepresented. Although in In re A.S.A., J.L.A., G.A., & A.J.A., 258 M 194, 852 P2d 127 (1993), the Supreme Court held that the constitutional right to due process guarantees an indigent parent the right to court-appointed counsel in parental rights termination proceedings, the court has not extended the right to counsel to a pretermination proceeding in which the focal issue is whether a child is a youth in need of care. Rather, appointment of counsel at any time prior to the initiation of termination proceedings is within the discretion of the District Court. In this case, the initial determination that the child was a youth in need of care was made by order pursuant to a finding of probable cause even before the mother's first appearance in any proceedings when the District Court relied on a report submitted by a social worker showing that the child was abused or neglected or in danger of abuse or neglect and that removal from the home was necessary to protect the child's welfare. Subsequent to the initial determination, the District Court reached the same conclusion on at least three separate occasions when the mother was represented by counsel, including one hearing when the social worker was subjected to cross-examination by the mother's counsel. The Supreme Court applied In re M.F., 201 M 277, 653 P2d 1205 (1982), and in re D.S., H.S., R.S., R.S., J.S., R.S., & K.S., 253 M 484, 833 P2d 1090 (1992), and in holding that the state is not required to provide counsel at proceedings concerning temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) or temporary custody. Thus, the mother's due process rights were not violated when the District Court made the determination that the child was a youth in need of care at a time when the mother was not represented by counsel. (See 2005 amendment.) In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Source of Children's PTSD Not Traceable to Father — No Abuse of Discretion by Court That Held Children Not Suffering From Abuse and Neglect Caused by Father — Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427) and Temporary Legal Custody Properly Terminated: John, who pleaded guilty to negligent homicide in the death of his psychotic wife, Nancy, petitioned the District Court for the termination of temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) and temporary legal custody of the Department of Public Health and Human Services, and the petition was granted. The Supreme Court held that the Department's authority was properly terminated because the District Court could not and did not find that the posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) suffered by John's children was caused by their father's behavior. The expert testimony given at trial showed that the children's PTSD could have been caused by living with their psychotic mother and not by their father's killing of their mother and his subsequent attempt to cover up the murder. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly found that the children were not abused or neglected by their father and that the District Court therefore did not abuse its discretion when it granted John's petition and terminated the Department's authority. Limited Emancipation Decisions Not Subject to Appellate Mediation Requirements: Former Rule 54, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), provided that certain domestic relations cases are subject to appellate mediation, but those cases do not include limited emancipation decisions, which are more akin to severing parental rights than to delineating how, when, and under what circumstances parental rights may be exercised. Thus, limited emancipation actions are not subject to appellate mediation requirements. In re Emancipation of Dammarell, 2000 MT 46, 298 M 391, 3 P3d 597, 57 St. Rep. 230 (2000).

Denial of Request to Remove Guardian Ad Litem Not Error: At the hearing on the petition for TIA and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), the mother requested removal of the guardian ad litem who had worked with the family for 2 years. The District Court declined, which was not error in light of the lack of evidence that the guardian had not performed the required statutory duties. In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000), affirmed in In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Interlocutory Order Granting Temporary Investigative Authority and Protective Services Not Appealable: An order for temporary investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) issued under 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423) is not a "final judgement", a specified interlocutory order, or "an allowance for a widow or a child" and is not appealable under former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded). In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000).

Order for Psychiatric Evaluation in Child Abuse Case Not Violative of Privilege Against Self-Incrimination: The District Court hearing a child abuse and neglect case ordered the mother to submit to a psychiatric evaluation, participate in counseling, and follow through with the therapist's recommendations. The mother claimed that the order violated her privilege against self-incrimination under the fifth amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The Supreme Court found no suggestion of criminal liability attending the mother's participation in counseling and noted that a child abuse and neglect proceeding is not a criminal case. Further, 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423) specifically authorizes medical and psychological evaluations of and counseling services for the parents in such cases. Thus, a constitutional violation was not established. In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000).

Petition Need Not Allege Abuse or Neglect — Facts Establishing Probable Cause Sufficient to Issue Order for Protective Services: A petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) must state the authority requested and facts establishing probable cause that the youth is abused or neglected or in danger of being so and must be accompanied by an affidavit or Department report stating in detail the facts on which the request is based. There is no statutory requirement that the petition contain an allegation of abuse or neglect or the evidence that the Department would present in support of its petition. The fact that the mother stipulated to a 90-day TIA, but not to protective services or the removal of the children from the home, believing that she would retain custody of the children during the 90-day period, did not preclude the District Court from ordering removal of the children from the home. The best interests of the child is paramount and takes precedence over parental rights in abuse and neglect proceedings. In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000).

Protective Removal of Children From Home Not Violative of Parent's Right of Religious Freedom — Best Interests of Children Prevail: The District Court hearing a child abuse and neglect case ordered the children removed from the home in their best interests. The mother contended that the order violated her constitutional right to religious freedom by removing her ability to participate in and control the children's religious upbringing because she couldn't see them pending her psychiatric evaluation. The Supreme Court found nothing in the record suggesting that the District Court was hostile to the mother's religious views or had based its order on those views. Rather, the order was based on evidence that the children were emotionally disturbed and threatened with harm, and the temporary restriction on the mother's access to the children was warranted. The mother remained free to pursue her religious beliefs, and the order did not infringe on that freedom. In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000), affirmed in In re B.P. & A.P., 2001 MT 219, 306 M 430, 35 P3d 291 (2001).

Dismissal of Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427) Without Review of Guardianship Action — Harmless Error in Light of Requirements of Indian Child Welfare Act: In compliance with 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423), the District Court ordered a show cause hearing at which to consider a petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) regarding two Indian children. At the hearing, the Deputy County Attorney offered an order and memorandum from a previously dismissed guardianship proceeding as evidence. The court did not admit the documentation as evidence, but took judicial notice of it. However, at the end of the hearing, the court dismissed the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) without reviewing any records from the guardianship proceeding and ordered the Department of Public Health and Human Services to immediately place the children with their father. The mother contended that it was error to dismiss the petition without reviewing the guardianship file. In order for courts to grant TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) petitions when Indian children are involved, the requirements of the Indian Child Welfare Act must be met. Under 25 U.S.C. 1912, active efforts must be made to provide remedial services and rehabilitation programs to prevent the breakup of the Indian family. In addition, any finding that continued custody of the child by the parent or Indian custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child must be based on the testimony of qualified expert witnesses. Because these requirements were not met, the court could not have granted TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) even if it had reviewed the guardianship file, so its failure to do so, if erroneous, was harmless. In re M.P.M. & A.R.M., 1999 MT 78, 294 M 87, 976 P2d 988, 56 St. Rep. 327 (1999).

Error in Placing Custody With One Parent Following Dismissal of Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427): In compliance with 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423), the District Court ordered a show cause hearing at which to consider a petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) regarding two Indian children. At the end of the hearing, the court dismissed the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) and ordered the Department of Public Health and Human Services to immediately place the children with their father. The Department argued on appeal that the court exceeded its authority in ordering transfer of custody to the father after the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) was dismissed. The Supreme Court held that when the District Court vacated the orders issued following filing of the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), it did not have authority to place custody with the father because nothing in the statutory framework or legislative intent authorizes the placement of a child with one parent, as opposed to the other, following dismissal of a petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427). The order transferring custody to the father was reversed. In re M.P.M. & A.R.M., 1999 MT 78, 294 M 87, 976 P2d 988, 56 St. Rep. 327 (1999).

Expiration of Temporary Custody Order — No Effect on Jurisdiction: At the time that the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) filed a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), the mother and her children were not living on the reservation. Subsequently, the mother moved back to the reservation and sought to have the action transferred to the tribal court. The mother argued that the District Court had lost jurisdiction over the matter when its order of temporary custody expired. The Supreme Court ruled that the child abuse and neglect statutes do not make provisions for the expiration of custody in the state or for the loss of jurisdiction by the court, other than by a finding by the court that the children are not in danger of being abused or neglected and by vacating any order made pursuant to 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423). In re W.L., C.L., & B.L., 260 M 325, 859 P2d 1019, 50 St. Rep. 1081 (1993).

Continuing Court Jurisdiction Throughout Custody Hearings Proper: Father contended that, once granted, investigative authority and protective services granted to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) cannot be continued by further order of the District Court. However, 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423) permits the court to grant relief as may be required in the best interest of the youth, including the power to make continuing arrangements for the youth's protection. In re H.D., 256 M 70, 844 P2d 114, 49 St. Rep. 1141 (1992).

Mother's Complicity in Murder of Father as Emotional Deprivation of Children: The mother argued that the lower court had improperly granted the state temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427). The Supreme Court ruled that the lower court had not abused its authority because the mother's role in the murder of the children's father could prompt a condition of emotional deprivation in the children. In re B.H.M., C.M.M., & J.T.H., 245 M 179, 799 P2d 1090, 47 St. Rep. 1967 (1990).

Show Cause Hearing Not Required: There is no requirement that a show cause hearing be held prior to removal of youths pursuant to 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423). In re J.W. & J.C., 226 M 491, 736 P2d 960, 44 St. Rep. 843 (1987).

Mere Presence of Hearsay Evidence in Court File Not Reversible Error: The presence in the court file of statements not supported by testimony is not a violation of due process or error when: (1) the authors of the reports did testify and were subject to cross-examination; (2) no evidence was presented to rebut the presumption that any hearsay within the reports themselves was disregarded by the District Court; and (3) the court explicitly based its findings upon the testimony of the witnesses and upon the reports of only those who testified. (See 1993 amendment.) In re M.L.H., H.M.H., & R.H., 220 M 288, 715 P2d 32, 43 St. Rep. 375 (1986).

Order for Protection of Youth — Rules Suspended — Procedure on Appeal: A petition for temporary investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) was filed by the prosecutor under 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). Temporary custody of K.H. was later awarded to county welfare department under 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423). The District Court found probable cause for state intervention and ordered temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427), custody in the mother, and restrictions on the father's visitation. The parents appealed the order, an appealable order within former Rule 1, M.R.App.Civ.P. (now M.R.App.P., now superseded), but not an adequate remedy because of the time involved. Relief should properly be pursued through a Writ of Certiorari, Habeas Corpus, or Supervisory Control. The Supreme Court treated the matter as a Writ of Certiorari and denied it on the grounds that the District Court proceedings were in substantial compliance with law and that the petitioners were not prejudiced thereby. In re K.H., 216 M 267, 701 P2d 720, 42 St. Rep. 796 (1985). However, see In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000), in which it was held that because an interlocutory order granting temporary investigative authority and protective services is not appealable under former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded).

Evidence of Sexual Abuse — Treatment Plan Ordered: Acting on evidence of sexual abuse and other problems within the family, the trial court properly found S.L.T. to be an abused and neglected child. The court granted temporary custody to the county welfare department and required that the child and her parents follow a treatment plan submitted by the welfare department. Section 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) gives the trial court authority to order any of the forms of relief listed in 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423) once the court determines a child is abused or neglected. This includes the relief ordered in this case. In re S.L.T., 215 M 289, 697 P2d 472, 42 St. Rep. 366 (1985).

Case Notes

Father's Partial Compliance With Treatment Plan Insufficient — Sufficient Evidence to Support Termination: The Department of Public Health and Human Services initiated a parental rights termination proceeding, alleging the father presented a risk to his children. The District Court ultimately terminated the father's rights. On appeal, the father argued that the Department failed to act in good faith and failed to provide reunification services, that he had partially completed his treatment plan, and that it was reasonable for him to improve. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the Department was not biased and did not act in bad faith, that a parent does not complete a treatment plan by partial or even substantial compliance with a treatment plan, and that the evidence supported the determination that the father was unlikely to improve. In re A.K., 2015 MT 116, 379 Mont. 41, 347 P.3d 711.

Child Removed From Mother's Care — Child Subsequently Placed With Father — Motion to Dismiss Mother's Termination Proceedings Correctly Denied: The state removed the petitioner's child from her home based on allegations of abuse and neglect. After the District Court adjudicated the child a youth in need of care, the child's paternity was established. The mother did not comply with the terms of her treatment plan and the state filed a petition to terminate her parental rights. Days prior to the termination hearing, the child was placed with the father after he successfully completed his treatment plan. The mother filed a motion to dismiss the petition because the child had been placed with the father and therefore had been reunited with the child's parent. The District Court denied the motion to dismiss the petition, noting that the child had not been reunited with the mother. Moreover, the District Court concluded, and on appeal the Supreme Court agreed, that 41-3-424 was not intended to benefit a noncompliant, offending parent based on the compliance of a nonoffending parent. In re L.V-B., 2014 MT 13, 373 Mont. 344, 317 P.3d 191.

Dismissal Motion Properly Denied When Statutory Criteria Not Met: Based on the Supreme Court's prior holding in In re D.B. & D.B., 2007 MT 246, 339 M 240, 168 P3d 691 (2007) (In re D.B. I), the mother moved to dismiss a parental rights termination case on grounds that the District Court proceedings did not contain sufficient evidence to apply the proper statutory criteria required by In re D.B. I. The court denied the dismissal motion and the mother appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Only when the criteria of 41-3-424 are met may a petition be properly dismissed, and the mother failed to satisfy those criteria. The children remained youths in need of care and the District Court was required to provide some form of relief as established in 41-3-422, so dismissal was inappropriate and unavailable to the mother. In re D.B. & D.B., 2008 MT 272, 345 M 225, 190 P3d 1072 (2008). See also In re K.A., 2016 MT 27, 382 Mont. 165, 365 P.3d 478.

Dismissal of Parenting Action Following Placement of Children Under Permanency Plan — Appeal Moot: While a parenting action was pending in Flathead County, a District Court in Missoula County approved a permanency plan that placed the children in California with the mother. The father did not appeal the placement order. The Flathead County action was subsequently dismissed, and the father appealed. The Supreme Court held that the Flathead County order was moot because the state no longer possessed authority over the custody and placement of the children, and in the absence of an ongoing, concrete controversy, effective relief could not be granted. The appeal was dismissed. In re J.A.S. & E.R.S., 2008 MT 269, 345 M 189, 190 P3d 299 (2008).

Case Notes

Termination of Parental Rights Proper When Record Clearly Shows Reasonable Efforts Made to Reunite Family — Failure of Mother to Cooperate With Getting New Attorney Appointed — Counsel Retained at All Critical Stages of Proceeding — No Due Process Violation: The District Court did not abuse its discretion when it terminated the mother's parental rights when the record clearly shows reasonable efforts were made to reunite the family pursuant to 41-3-423(1) (see 2023 amendment to 41-3-423) and because 41-3-609(1)(f) does not require a specific finding by the District Court that reasonable efforts were made before terminating the mother's parental rights. Because she had counsel at all critical states of the proceedings, the mother's due process right was not infringed when she was without counsel due to her own failure to cooperate. In re M.V.R., 2016 MT 309, 385 Mont. 448, 384 P.3d 1058.

Qualifications to Be Considered Party or Interested Person in Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings: In a child abuse and neglect proceeding, the mother's longtime boyfriend, who was not biologically related to the child but was identified by the child as his "dad", appealed the District Court's determination that the boyfriend was neither a party nor an interested person to the child's case and, therefore, was not entitled to continued notice or the right to appear in any subsequent proceedings related to the child. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that the Department of Public Health and Human Services, the child, and a parent, guardian, or individual with legal custody of the child are all parties to child abuse and neglect proceedings. In addition, a foster parent, a preadoptive parent, a relative caring for the child, or a relative who has cared for the child is allowed to file a motion to intervene and may also be a party to the proceedings. Therefore, because the boyfriend did not meet the above criteria, the District Court did not err in dismissing him as a party to the proceedings. However, the Supreme Court determined that under 41-3-422(9)(a), the boyfriend is a person interested in the child's case and has a right to appear at hearings pertaining to the child but does not have the right to notice or the right to be heard. The District Court erred when it denied the boyfriend's request to appear at the child's proceedings. In re J.B., 2015 MT 342, 381 Mont. 525, 362 P.3d 859.

The petition or affidavit of the department must contain information regarding statements, if any, made by the parents detailing the parents' statement of the facts of the case. The parents, if available in person or by electronic means, must be given an opportunity to present evidence to the court before the court rules on the petition"; inserted (1)(d) relating to a request for a contested show cause hearing; in (1)(e) after "physical" inserted "or legal", substituted "child" for "youth", and in middle after "person" inserted "having physical or legal custody of the child"; in (2) substituted first sentence allowing the court to order immediate protection for the child if the court finds probable cause for "The person filing the petition for immediate protection and emergency protective services has the burden of presenting evidence establishing probable cause for the issuance of an order for immediate protection of the child, except as provided by the federal Indian Child Welfare Act, if applicable" and in third sentence after "probable cause" inserted "or, if the case is subject to the federal Indian Child Welfare Act, clear and convincing evidence"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2011.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 422 inserted (1)(d) requiring notice of right to have support person present during in-person meeting with social worker. Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 504 in (2)(g) at end of first sentence substituted "the court finds after notice and a hearing that the expenditure is reasonable and that resources are available for payment" for "the department is notified and a court hearing is set in a timely manner on the proposed expenditure". Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

2001 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 281 throughout section after "petition for" substituted "immediate protection and emergency protective services" for "temporary investigative authority and protective services"; in (1)(a) inserted second sentence requiring that the child's health and safety be of paramount concern; in (1)(c) at beginning of third sentence substituted "The parents, if available in person or by electronic means" for "Except as provided in 41-3-403, the parents" and after "opportunity to" substituted "present evidence to the court" for "address the court"; inserted (2) regarding burden of establishing probable cause and forms of relief to be stated in the order; inserted (3) requiring a finding that continued residence of the child with the parent is contrary to the welfare of the child or that an out-of-home placement is in the best interests of the child; inserted (4) providing that the order for immediate protection of the child must require the person served to comply immediately with the terms of the order and to appear before the court for a show cause hearing and allowing the court to hold the person in contempt or place temporary physical custody of the child with the department upon failure to comply or show cause; inserted (5) regarding service of the petition; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Chapter 311 in (1)(c) in first sentence substituted "signed by a representative of the department stating in detail" for "signed by the county attorney, the attorney general, or an attorney hired by the county or must be supported by a department report stating in detail" and near beginning of second sentence after "affidavit" deleted reference to a report; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

Saving Clause: Section 19, Ch. 281, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 501 in (3) inserted second and third sentences concerning content of petition, affidavit, or report and opportunity for parents to address court; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 2, 1997.

Chapter 546 in (3) substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of family services"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1987 Amendment: In middle of (3) changed provision that affidavit be signed by a county welfare department attorney or office of human services attorney to allow signing by an attorney hired by the county welfare department or office of human services and near end substituted "department of family services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services".

1985 Amendment: In (1) near middle after "county attorney" inserted "or an attorney hired by the county welfare department or office of human services"; and in (3) near middle after "county attorney", inserted "attorney general, county welfare department attorney, or office of human services attorney".

Case Notes

Improper Reliance on Parenting Plan Statutes in Granting Temporary Guardianship — Reversal Required: Pursuant to a stipulated parenting plan, the father was designated primary custodian of the couple's son and the mother was awarded visitation every other weekend. When the father received orders to report for active military duty, he moved to have the couple that he and the son lived with and the mother's sister appointed as temporary guardians. The mother moved to dismiss, but the District Court granted the father's motion, and the mother appealed. Reviewing the appealable order granting temporary guardianship, the Supreme Court reversed. The District Court's reliance on 40-4-219 for granting the guardianship was misplaced because that section applies only to modification of a parenting plan with respect to the parents and does not provide authority to decide custody matters between a parent and a third party, including appointment of a third party as a guardian. The District Court's reliance on 40-4-228 for granting the guardianship was also misplaced because that section provides standards by which a court may award a parental interest to a nonparent who has brought a parenting plan proceeding pursuant to 40-4-211, but no such proceeding was brought in this case. The District Court also mistakenly relied on this section in granting the guardianship because this section deals with child abuse and neglect, but does not provide independent authority for appointment of a guardian in disregard of the guardianship statutes. Rather, the father's request was governed by the guardianship statutes in Title 72, ch. 5, which the District Court did not address. The Supreme Court noted that the guardianship provisions in 72-5-222 apply only when a court order has addressed a party's right to parent, as opposed to arrangements defining a parent's custody and visitation under a parenting plan. The mother's right to parent was never previously limited by court order, so the District Court lacked jurisdiction to appoint a guardian for the child pursuant to 72-5-222, and granting the father's petition for temporary guardianship was reversible error. The Supreme Court remanded for the entry of an order vacating the guardianship. Fischer v. Fischer, 2007 MT 101, 337 M 122, 157 P3d 682 (2007).

Action of Recused Judge in Temporary Child Custody Proceedings Affirmed: A District Court Judge signed an order recusing himself from parental rights termination proceedings, but subsequently presided over an emergency temporary custody and protective services proceeding before the recusal order was filed. The parties questioned when the recusal was effective and whether it affected the validity of the emergency proceeding. The Supreme Court concluded that the recusal question did not affect the disposition of the case because, regardless of when the order became effective, the emergency hearing did not affect the child's permanent legal custody or the parent's rights. Thus, the judge's action in conducting the hearing after recusing himself did not warrant reversal in light of the fundamentally fair procedures afforded in the subsequent youth adjudication and parental rights termination proceedings. In re A.N.W., 2006 MT 42, 331 M 208, 130 P3d 619 (2006).

Parent Not Allowed to Examine or Present Witnesses During Child Adjudication Hearing — No Due Process Violation: A father claimed a due process violation when the District Court discontinued a hearing to determine whether his child was a youth in need of care before the father was allowed to examine a witness or to present two of his own witnesses. Fundamental fairness and due process require that a parent not be placed at an unfair disadvantage during parental rights termination proceedings; however, pretermination proceedings entitle a parent to less process than the actual termination proceedings. In this case, the father did not allege that allowing him to examine a witness or to present his own witnesses would have provided any relevant information or that failing to do so prejudiced him. The proceeding was fundamentally fair, and the District Court's decision to terminate the hearing was not reversible error. In re A.N.W., 2006 MT 42, 331 M 208, 130 P3d 619 (2006). See also In Re Custody & Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80, 23 P3d 206 (2001).

Failure to Adjudicate Child as Youth in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Improper: A mother was arrested for a parole violation, and the state filed a petition to investigate whether her children were abused or neglected. The District Court granted the petition on a preliminary basis, and the children were placed in a foster home. The mother was released on bond but failed to appear for a show cause hearing. The state's petition was then granted, and the court found that it was in the children's best interests to be removed from the home. The mother was later arrested again, released the following day, and left for Florida, leaving the children behind. She was arrested in Florida about 3 months later, and while incarcerated there, Montana filed for approval of a treatment plan. The treatment plan was faxed to the mother, but she refused to sign it. The plan was approved without her signature. A district citizen review board then recommended that the mother's parental rights be terminated based on the mother's criminal history, the social history of the case, and the children's need for permanence. The District Court terminated the mother's parental rights for failing to comply with the treatment plan, and the mother appealed. The Supreme Court held that termination of parental rights was in error because the children had never been adjudicated as youths in need of care through an adjudicatory hearing, as required by this section. A stipulation by the mother to let the court give temporary custody of the children to the state did not constitute a stipulation or an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care. In re T.C. & W.C., 2001 MT 264, 307 M 244, 37 P3d 70 (2001).

Substantial Risk of Harm to Child — Parental Rights Terminated Despite Lack of Evidence of Abuse or Neglect: A girl was born to a mother who was later divorced and remarried. When the girl was 15, she had sexual intercourse with her stepfather and conceived a baby. The state petitioned for temporary investigative authority (TIA) and emergency protective services (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") over both the girl and her baby, pursuant to 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). The mother then agreed to divorce the stepfather so that he could marry the girl. The petition regarding the girl was dismissed because she was married and was no longer subject to the mother's parental control. At the show cause hearing on the petition regarding protection of the baby, a state social worker testified that, although there was no indication of actual abuse or neglect of the baby, there was concern for the baby's safety should the baby be placed in the home with the girl and stepfather. The state ultimately petitioned to terminate the girl's parental rights to the baby. The District Court determined that the baby was a youth in need of care and terminated the girl's parental rights. The girl appealed on grounds that the court's determination that the baby was a youth in need of care was erroneous, absent any evidence of abuse, neglect, or abandonment, and that the petition for TIA was insufficient on its face because it contained no allegations that the baby was abused or neglected. However, the definition of abuse or neglect in 41-3-102 includes either actual harm or the substantial risk of harm. Thus, the report required by this section need set forth in detail only facts supporting the petition's request for TIA based on the assertion that a child is abused or neglected or is in danger of being abused or neglected. The social worker's testimony was considered sufficient to support a finding that there was substantial risk of harm to the baby if returned to the girl's custody; therefore, the District Court's determination that the baby was a youth in need of care was correct. The court's finding that under the circumstances, the baby had little hope of a normal emotional, moral, and psychological development with his parents was also supported by substantial evidence and was not clearly erroneous, based on the social worker's testimony that the girl's relationship with the stepfather was unhealthy, that the family unit exhibited extremely poor boundaries, and that the girl had obvious psychological damage from being sexually abused by her father and would, without successful treatment, be unable to set appropriate boundaries for the baby or be able to understand the risk of harm that her relationship with the stepfather posed to the baby. The Supreme Court affirmed. In re D.T.H., 2001 MT 138, 305 M 502, 29 P3d 1003 (2001).

Stipulation Not Considered Sufficient Adjudication of Youth in Need of Care — Lack of Jurisdictional Prerequisite to Terminate Parental Rights: The mother entered into a stipulation with the state that her children were youths in need of care only upon several conditions: (1) her parental rights would remain intact; (2) the children would reside with their grandmother; (3) the Casey Family Program would manage the children's cases; (4) the mother would always have contact with the children even if the program was required to intervene between the mother and grandmother; and (5) at an appropriate time when the mother was ready, the program, the Department, and the mother would devise a treatment plan that would be completed by the mother in order to regain custody of the children. At a subsequent hearing, the Department proposed a permanency plan that involved removing the children from their grandmother. The mother contended that the proposal amounted to a failure to abide by the conditions of the stipulation, thereby voiding the conditional stipulation that the children were youths in need of care and precluding the District Court's authority to terminate her parental rights. The Supreme Court agreed. Although a stipulation may be an acceptable alternative to an adjudicatory hearing in many circumstances, the fundamental nature of the rights of a parent requires that the process by which a stipulation is drafted and signed needs to be closely scrutinized. In this case, the stipulation was drafted by the County Attorney and signed by the mother without the benefit of legal counsel and essentially allowed the court to determine that the youths were in need of care without a finding that they were abused or neglected and without a hearing as required by 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). The mother had conflicting feelings about the removal of the children from their grandmother's care and relied on her understanding from the stipulation that the Department would not remove the children or terminate her parental rights, so she did not complete her treatment plan. Only a few days after the initial hearing, she promptly began work toward completion of the treatment plan and had made significant progress, particularly considering the unexpected death of her mother, by the time of the next hearing. Despite the change in circumstances resulting from the death, the Department did not grant the mother any additional time to complete the treatment plan, nor did the Department offer any evidence that the mother had abused or neglected the children. Under the unique facts of this case, the Supreme Court held that the District Court incorrectly found that the stipulation sufficed as an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care. Without that adjudication, the District Court lacked the jurisdictional prerequisite to terminate the mother's parental rights, so the Supreme Court reversed. In Re Custody and Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80, 23 P3d 206 (2001).

Source of Children's PTSD Not Traceable to Father — No Abuse of Discretion by Court That Held Children Not Suffering From Abuse and Neglect Caused by Father — Temporary Investigative Authority (Now "Immediate Protection and Emergency Protective Services") and Temporary Legal Custody Properly Terminated: John, who pleaded guilty to negligent homicide in the death of his psychotic wife, Nancy, petitioned the District Court for the termination of temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") and temporary legal custody of the Department of Public Health and Human Services, and the petition was granted. The Supreme Court held that the Department's authority was properly terminated because the District Court could not and did not find that the posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) suffered by John's children was caused by their father's behavior. The expert testimony given at trial showed that the children's PTSD could have been caused by living with their psychotic mother and not by their father's killing of their mother and his subsequent attempt to cover up the murder. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly found that the children were not abused or neglected by their father and that the District Court therefore did not abuse its discretion when it granted John's petition and terminated the Department's authority. In re Inquiry Into J.L. & D.L., 2000 MT 289, 302 M 254, 14 P3d 473, 57 St. Rep. 1219 (2000).

Petition Need Not Allege Abuse or Neglect — Facts Establishing Probable Cause Sufficient to Issue Order for Protective Services: A petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) and protective services (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") must state the authority requested and facts establishing probable cause that the youth is abused or neglected or in danger of being so and must be accompanied by an affidavit or Department report stating in detail the facts on which the request is based. There is no statutory requirement that the petition contain an allegation of abuse or neglect or the evidence that the Department would present in support of its petition. The fact that the mother stipulated to a 90-day TIA, but not to protective services or the removal of the children from the home, believing that she would retain custody of the children during the 90-day period, did not preclude the District Court from ordering removal of the children from the home. The best interests of the child is paramount and takes precedence over parental rights in abuse and neglect proceedings. In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000).

Appeal From Extension of Temporary Investigative Authority (Now "Immediate Protection and Emergency Protective Services") Held Moot — Permanent Custody Transferred to Father: When A.E.'s mother, Teresa, filed a pro se appeal from the District Court's extension of temporary custody and temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") of the Department of Public Health and Human Services (Department), Teresa's ex-husband, who was the natural father of A.E., sought and received an amendment to the previous dissolution decree by which his marriage to Teresa was dissolved. The amendment transferred permanent custody of A.E. from Teresa to A.E.'s father. Upon the transfer of custody, the Department sought and received dismissal of its petition for extension of temporary custody and to vacate the District Court's order awarding it temporary legal custody for the purposes of the investigation. On appeal of the award of the extension of temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment—"now immediate protection and emergency protective services"), the Supreme Court held that the appeal had been rendered moot because the Department no longer had temporary custody of A.E. and because the Department no longer possessed the authority to investigate. For this reason, the Supreme Court dismissed the appeal. In re A.E., 1998 MT 159, 289 M 340, 961 P2d 1265, 55 St. Rep. 638 (1998).

Evidence Sufficient to Warrant Grant of Temporary Investigative Authority (Now "Immediate Protection and Emergency Protective Services"): Evidence of the mother's previous history of psychiatric problems, fires in the family home, one child's extensive absences from school, and the inability of social workers to investigate these problems due to mother's noncooperation constituted sufficient facts to warrant granting of temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services"). In re J.W. & J.C., 226 M 491, 736 P2d 960, 44 St. Rep. 843 (1987).

Only Show Cause Hearing Required Upon Filing Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (Now "Immediate Protection and Emergency Protective Services"): A mother contended that an order granting temporary custody to the state and allowing temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") under 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427) should be vacated for lack of an adjudicatory hearing pursuant to 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) and a dispositional hearing pursuant to 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438). In denying the motion to vacate, the District Court properly held that a show cause hearing is the only hearing required when a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") is filed. In re J.W. & J.C., 226 M 491, 736 P2d 960, 44 St. Rep. 843 (1987).

In-Chambers Interview — Record Required: A District Court may conduct an in-chambers interview of children in an abuse, neglect, and dependency proceeding. A record must be made of any interview conducted. In re M.L.H., H.M.H., & R.H., 220 M 288, 715 P2d 32, 43 St. Rep. 375 (1986), followed in In re T.N.-S., 2015 MT 117, 379 Mont. 60, 347 P.3d 1263.

Exclusion of Evidence on Child Abuse Proceeding Concerning Father — Harmless Error: It was harmless error, in a child custody modification proceeding, for a District Court judge to exclude evidence that a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services"), alleging sexual abuse by the father, had been filed under Title 41, ch. 3, and dismissed for lack of evidence after being heard by the same judge who made the custody modification determination. In re Marriage of Stout, 216 M 342, 701 P2d 729, 42 St. Rep. 856 (1985).

Order for Protection of Youth — Rules Suspended — Procedure on Appeal: A petition for temporary investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") was filed by the prosecutor under 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). Temporary custody of K.H. was later awarded to county welfare department under 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423). The District Court found probable cause for state intervention and ordered temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services"), custody in the mother, and restrictions on the father's visitation. The parents appealed the order, an appealable order within former Rule 1, M.R.App.Civ.P. (now M.R.App.P., now superseded), but not an adequate remedy because of the time involved. Relief should properly be pursued through a Writ of Certiorari, Habeas Corpus, or Supervisory Control. The Supreme Court treated the matter as a Writ of Certiorari and denied it on the grounds that the District Court proceedings were in substantial compliance with law and that the petitioners were not prejudiced thereby. In re K.H., 216 M 267, 701 P2d 720, 42 St. Rep. 796 (1985). However, see In re B.P. & A.P., 2000 MT 39, 298 M 287, 995 P2d 982, 57 St. Rep. 179 (2000), in which it was held that because an interlocutory order granting temporary investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") is not appealable under former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded).

Prehearing Report — Petition for Permanent Custody: The Supreme Court avoided deciding whether or not it is proper for a County Attorney to file a prehearing report in support of a petition under 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422) for permanent custody since the only report in the record was filed in support of a temporary investigative authority and protective services (see 2001 amendment—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") petition under 41-3-402(3) (renumbered 41-3-427(3)). Case Notes

Consolidation of Show Cause and Termination Hearing Not Violative of Due Process: On appeal from an order terminating the mother's parental rights, the Supreme Court held that, although the District Court consolidated the show cause hearing and termination hearing, and the initial show cause notice failed to inform the mother that her parental rights could be terminated at the show cause hearing, the mother's due process rights were not violated. The mother received additional notice that her parental rights were at stake in communications that included the original petition to terminate her parental rights and grant permanent legal custody of the child to the Department of Public Health and Human Services, the order setting the hearing on the Department's petition, and the original hearing scheduled on the Department's petition, for which the mother attended the hearing and was granted a two-week continuance. Because the mother had notice and an opportunity to be heard, neither the consolidation of the show cause and termination hearings nor the lack of notice of the risk of terminated parental rights in the initial show cause order violated the mother's due process rights. In re C.B., 2019 MT 294, 398 Mont. 176, 454 P.3d 1195.

Termination of Parental Rights — Removal of Infant — Mother Located in Another State — Department Policies Not Followed — Evidentiary Admissions Clarified: The Montana Department of Public Health and Human Services, Child and Family Services Division, became involved with a mother and child when the mother tested positive for methamphetamine and marijuana at the child's birth. During portions of the proceeding, the mother lived in different states, did not own a vehicle, did not have a driver's license, and could not make it to Montana due to weather. The District Court ultimately terminated the mother's parental rights, finding that the mother did not successfully complete her treatment plan and the condition rendering her unfit, unable, or unwilling to parent was unlikely to change. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the Department failed to provide reasonable efforts to place the child as close as possible to the mother's home in violation of the Department's policies, that it did not implement a service provision plan that could successfully address the mother's substance abuse problem, that the removal of an infant implicates different services than the removal of an older child, that it failed to take efforts to identify or locate a potential kinship placement, that it failed to provide reasonable efforts designed to reunify the mother and her child, and that the presumption in favor of termination in 41-3-604 was misplaced. The court then clarified In re M.C., 2017 MT 252, 389 Mont. 78, 403 P.3d 1266, to hold that it did not intend that case to be interpreted to permit courts to admit any and all written reports or evaluations or service-related documents over otherwise valid hearsay or foundation objections. In re R.J.F., 2019 MT 113, 395 Mont 454, 443 P.3d 387.

Procedural Deadlines Missed — Best Interests of Child: The mother's parenting rights were terminated. The initial hearing was scheduled 18 days after the 20-day statutory deadline, which the mother did not object to. Then the Department of Public Health and Human Services requested a continuance, which the mother objected to. Following her objection to the first continuance, the mother failed to object to subsequent motions. On appeal, the mother argued that the District Court committed reversible error when it failed to hold a show cause hearing within 20 days of the filing of the abuse and neglect petition and when it failed to hold a dispositional hearing 20 days after the show cause hearing. The Supreme Court held that pursuant to legislative intent, in cases involving abused and neglected children, a District Court may act to protect a child's best interests despite procedural interests. Guardian Not Entitled to Same Due Process as Parent — Exclusion From First Show Cause Hearing — Termination of Guardianship Based on Best Interests of Child: The state filed for protective custody of a boy whose grandmother and stepgrandfather had been his legal guardians since he was 5 weeks old. The District Court did not allow the stepgrandfather to participate in the first show cause hearing or a permanency plan hearing. Later, however, the stepgrandfather participated in the remainder of the proceedings. Ultimately, the District Court concluded the child's best interests warranted termination of the guardianship. On appeal, the stepgrandfather argued that he had not received adequate due process because of his exclusion from the first show cause hearing. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that a guardian is not afforded the same level of due process as a parent in a termination case. Moreover, the District Court had afforded the stepgrandfather adequate due process by allowing him to meaningfully participate in the remainder of the proceedings. In re D.B.J., 2012 MT 220, 366 Mont. 320, 286 P.3d 1201.

Show Cause Hearing to Be Commenced, Not Completed, Within 20 Days: In a termination proceeding, the District Court held a show cause hearing within 20 days of the filing of the petition. The first hearing, however, was limited to the rights of the mother and did not consider the rights of the legal guardians of the child. Ultimately, the District Court terminated the guardianship. On appeal, the guardian argued that the District Court lost jurisdiction by not completing the show cause hearing within 20 days. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that a District Court must commence, not complete, a show cause hearing within 20 days. In re D.B.J., 2012 MT 220, 366 Mont. 320, 286 P.3d 1201. Abuse and Neglect Cases — "Initial Appearance" for Purposes of Filing Motion to Substitute — Show Cause Hearing — Dismissal of Motion to Substitute as Untimely Reversed: A parent was served with a show cause order and notice of show cause hearing regarding abuse and neglect of her child. Two days later, a public defender filed a notice of appearance on her behalf. The parent filed a motion to substitute the District Court judge 1 day before the show cause hearing, but more than 10 days after the notice of appearance of counsel had been filed. The District Court denied her motion as untimely, reasoning that the parent had 10 days from counsel's appearance to file her motion. Citing D.H. v. Fourth Judicial District Court, 2012 MT 106, 365 Mont. 82, 278 P.3d 1010, as controlling, the Supreme Court reversed the District Court's denial of the motion. For purposes of filing a motion to substitute the judge in an abuse and neglect case, a parent's "initial appearance" is the show cause hearing. A.C. v. 10th Judicial District Court, 2012 MT 110, 365 Mont. 87, 278 P.3d 1013.

Adjudication of Youth in Need of Care Without Specific Request Affirmed: A parent asserted that the District Court lacked authority to adjudicate a child as a youth in need of care because there was no request for such adjudication contained in the initial petitions for emergency protective services and temporary investigative authority. The Supreme Court disagreed. The relief sought in a petition filed under 41-3-422 may include any relief required for the best interests of the child, and 41-3-432 allows a court to adjudicate a child as a youth in need of care at the show cause hearing for immediate protection and emergency protective services. Thus, the District Court was not foreclosed from adjudicating the child as a youth in need of care following filing of the initial petitions for emergency protective services and temporary investigative authority. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 98, 350 M 86, 206 P3d 565 (2009).

Hearsay Evidence and Parental Rights Termination — Admission of Hearsay Evidence at Show Cause, Adjudicatory, and Termination Hearings Held Proper Because Children "Unavailable" — J.C.E. Case Distinguished — No Offer of Proof Made: Hearsay evidence in the form of videotaped interviews of young children talking with investigators about sexual abuse by their parents was admitted after the District Court found that the children were "unavailable" to testify because they would be traumatized by testifying against their parents in a courtroom setting. The Supreme Court held that the videotaped testimony was properly admitted by the District Court, based upon the thorough findings by the District Court, at the show cause hearing, the adjudicatory hearing, and the parental rights termination hearing. The Supreme Court distinguished St. v. J.C.E., 235 M 264, 767 P2d 309 (1988), because that case was a criminal case in which the right of confrontation under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., applied, whereas the case now before the Supreme Court was a civil case. The Supreme Court also held that the District Court properly analyzed the mother's attempt to call the children as witnesses as one of relevance, and because no offer of proof was made under Rule 103, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), by the mother, the Supreme Court could not conclude that the District Court acted arbitrarily. In re O.A.W., 2007 MT 13, 335 M 304, 153 P3d 6 (2007).

Erroneous Award of Custody at Adjudicatory Hearing Cured by Immediate Scheduling of Dispositional Hearing to Address Dispositional Issue Separately: The District Court failed to structure dispositional issues apart from adjudicatory issues when it granted temporary legal custody of two children to the state during an adjudicatory hearing. However, upon discovering the error, the court immediately scheduled a dispositional hearing to address the dispositional issue separately. Although not excusing the error, the Supreme Court held that holding a second dispositional hearing made the initial order placing the children with the state during the adjudicatory hearing the functional equivalent to an order of placement pending the dispositional hearing because temporary placement outside the home is allowed at every stage of the proceeding pursuant to 41-3-301, 41-3-437, and this section. The error was harmless and nonprejudicial and did not warrant reversal. In re S.C. & L.Z., 2005 MT 241, 328 M 476, 121 P3d 552 (2005).

Petition for Permanent Custody and Termination of Parental Rights Not Considered Initial Filing — Show Cause Hearing Timely: Under the 2001 amendments to this section, a District Court is generally required to conduct a show cause hearing within 10 days of the filing of an initial child abuse and neglect petition. A petition for permanent legal custody in this case was filed on September 18, 2001, and was the first document personally served on a father incarcerated in Washington state. The father contended that the petition therefore qualified as the initial pleading, so the hearing held November 5, 2001, was well past the 10-day requirement (see 2003 amendment). The Supreme Court disagreed. The petition for permanent legal custody did not constitute an initial filing; rather, the initial filing was the state's petition for temporary investigative authority and protective services filed on November 17, 2000. The statute in effect at that time required a show cause hearing within 20 days of issuance of an order granting relief as required for the immediate protection of a child, and a show cause hearing was held December 4, 2000, well within the 20-day timeframe. The court noted that even if the father's argument that the petition that he was personally served was considered the initial filing, this section would still not apply because it was not in effect on September 18, 2001. Case Notes

Procedural Deadlines Missed — Best Interests of Child: The mother's parenting rights were terminated. The initial hearing was scheduled 18 days after the 20-day statutory deadline, which the mother did not object to. Then the Department of Public Health and Human Services requested a continuance, which the mother objected to. Following her objection to the first continuance, the mother failed to object to subsequent motions. On appeal, the mother argued that the District Court committed reversible error when it failed to hold a show cause hearing within 20 days of the filing of the abuse and neglect petition and when it failed to hold a dispositional hearing 20 days after the show cause hearing. The Supreme Court held that pursuant to legislative intent, in cases involving abused and neglected children, a District Court may act to protect a child's best interests despite procedural interests. In re A.H., 2015 MT 75, 378 Mont. 351, 344 P.3d 403.

Stipulation to Treatment Plan Not Stipulation That Child Is Youth in Need of Care: The mother stipulated to a treatment plan. Later, when seeking to terminate her parental rights, the state argued that by stipulating to the plan the mother had implicitly stipulated to the adjudication of her Indian child as a youth in need of care. The District Court agreed and terminated the mother's parental rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that a parent's stipulation to a treatment plan does not equate to a stipulation that a child of the parent is a youth in need of care but concluded that the error did not undermine the fundamental fairness of the current proceedings so as to warrant reversal of the termination. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court vacated the termination, because the District Court applied the incorrect evidentiary standard in its ruling, and remanded the case for application of the correct standard. In re H.T., 2015 MT 41, 378 Mont. 206, 343 P.3d 159.

Voluntary Consent Requirements in ICWA — No Applicability to Nonvoluntary Termination Proceedings: The Supreme Court held that 25 U.S.C. 1913(a) of the Indian Child Welfare Act, requiring a parent's voluntary written consent to terminate parental rights, has no applicability to nonvoluntary termination proceedings. In re D.A. and M.A., 2013 MT 191, 371 Mont. 46, 305 P.3d 824, following In re J.M., 2009 MT 332, 353 Mont. 64, 218 P.3d 1213.

Mother's Stipulation That Child Be Adjudicated Youth in Need of Care Prior to Determination of Child's Status as Indian — Parental Termination Proceedings Not Invalidated: The state petitioned for termination of a mother's parental rights based on her lack of progress with the court-ordered treatment plan. The state recognized the child's Indian status and notified the Blackfeet Tribe. The tribe's motion to intervene in order to monitor the proceedings was granted, and the mother's parental rights were terminated the following day after the mother stipulated to adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care. The mother subsequently appealed on grounds that it was error to terminate her parental rights prior to a determination that the child was subject to the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA). The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed. The District Court complied with ICWA in finding by clear and convincing evidence that the child was a youth in need of care and that the child's best interests would be served by termination of the parent-child relationship. The fact that the court accepted the mother's stipulation before definitively establishing the child's Indian status did not invalidate the proceedings. The District Court was affirmed. In re J.M., 2009 MT 332, 353 M 64, 218 P3d 1213 (2009).

Parent's Acquiescence in Adjudicatory Proceedings — Finding That Child Is Youth in Need of Care Based on Parent's Admissions — Stipulation Not Required: A mother contested termination of her parental rights on grounds that her child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The mother was incarcerated at the time of the hearing and contended that although she agreed to a treatment plan, she never admitted that the child met the definition of a youth in need of care or stipulated that the child was in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that the trial court should have specifically inquired of the mother or her counsel whether the mother stipulated that the child was a youth in need of care, but it was not error for the District Court to make that finding based on the mother's own admissions that she was addicted to methamphetamine and needed treatment and that her addiction impacted the child unfairly. The mother was not placed at an unfair disadvantage during the termination proceedings and was represented by counsel at all stages. She never questioned the regularity of the proceedings until appeal. The court held that because 35 months had passed between the adjudicatory hearing and the notice of appeal, it would not be in the child's best interests to prolong the matter, particularly when much of the delay was caused by the mother's repeated relapses and her failure to put the child's interests above her desire to indulge her addiction. The adjudication was proper and did not prejudice the mother, and the District Court was affirmed. In re A.S., 2006 MT 281, 334 M 280, 146 P3d 778 (2006).

Separate Dispositional Hearing Not Required When Parental Stipulations Made Regarding Adjudication and Placement of Children and Treatment Plans: Under 41-3-438, a separate dispositional hearing is not required if parental stipulations are entered pursuant to this section. In this case, the parents stipulated to their children being youths in need of care, to the children being placed in temporary state custody, and to signing treatment plans. Given the parents' stipulations to the pertinent dispositional issues, a separate dispositional hearing was not required. In re B.B. & J.B., 2006 MT 66, 331 M 407, 133 P3d 215 (2006).

Adjudication Properly Based on Parents' Stipulation That Children Considered Youths in Need of Care: Following termination of their parental rights, the parents contended that termination was not proper because the children were never adjudicated as youths in need of care, which is the threshold for termination proceedings. Although there was no hearing at which that determination was made based on a preponderance of the evidence, under this section, a parent may stipulate that a child is a youth in need of care, and the parents in this case twice stipulated that their children were in need of care—once when they signed a stipulation to temporary legal custody and again when they signed a stipulation to the extension of temporary legal custody. Based on these stipulations and the holding in In Re Custody & Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80 (2001), the children were properly adjudicated as youths in need of care. In re M.B., J.B., & W.B., 2004 MT 304, 323 M 468, 100 P3d 1006 (2004).

Foster Parents Precluded From Intervening — No Allegation of Abandonment — Rule 24, M.R.Civ.P., Displaced by Title 41 in Abuse and Neglect Case. In re U.A.C., 2022 MT 230, 410 Mont. 493, 520 P.3d 295.

Admission of Psychological Evaluation — Hearsay Exception Not Required — Unique Statutory Scheme of Youth in Need of Care Proceedings: The District Court ordered a mother's treatment plan, which required her to undergo a psychological evaluation, and she signed the treatment plan, agreeing to follow the evaluation's recommendations. The psychological evaluation became part of the court proceedings, allowing the court to consider any part of the evaluation through the abuse and neglect proceeding. After the District Court terminated the mother's parental rights, she appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding that the District Court properly admitted the mother's psychological evaluation at the hearing to determine whether to terminate the mother's parental rights and that it did not need to be admitted as a hearsay exception. In re M.C., 2017 MT 252, 389 Mont. 78, 403 P.3d 1266, distinguished in In re R.J.F., 2019 MT 113, 395 Mont. 454, 443 P.3d 387, relating to valid hearsay or foundational objections.

Procedural Deadlines Missed — Best Interests of Child: The mother's parenting rights were terminated. The initial hearing was scheduled 18 days after the 20-day statutory deadline, which the mother did not object to. Then the Department of Public Health and Human Services requested a continuance, which the mother objected to. Following her objection to the first continuance, the mother failed to object to subsequent motions. On appeal, the mother argued that the District Court committed reversible error when it failed to hold a show cause hearing within 20 days of the filing of the abuse and neglect petition and when it failed to hold a dispositional hearing 20 days after the show cause hearing. The Supreme Court held that pursuant to legislative intent, in cases involving abused and neglected children, a District Court may act to protect a child's best interests despite procedural interests. In re A.H., 2015 MT 75, 378 Mont. 351, 344 P.3d 403.

Failure to Hold Adjudicatory Hearing — Reversal of Termination Not Warranted: The state filed to terminate the parental rights of the mother to her Indian child. The District Court did not hold an adjudicatory hearing prior to termination. On appeal, the mother argued that the District Court's failure to hold the adjudicatory hearing required reversal of the termination. The Supreme Court held that although the District Court had not complied with this section, the error did not undermine the fundamental fairness of the proceedings. However, the Supreme Court vacated the termination and remanded the matter based on the District Court's application of the incorrect evidentiary standard. In re H.T., 2015 MT 41, 378 Mont. 206, 343 P.3d 159.

Allegations of Abuse and Neglect Directed Only at Mother — Court-Ordered Placement With Father — No Dispositional Hearing Required: The mother and father shared legal custody of their two children. The state filed a petition for emergency protective services and for temporary investigative authority based on allegations that the mother had endangered the children through her alcohol abuse. The state placed the children with the father. The parents stipulated to the children being designated youths in need of care, and the District Court ordered that the children continue to reside with their father, with the mother having only supervised contact with them due to her continued abuse of alcohol. The father then filed a motion to dismiss the state's case and grant him full legal custody. Neither the state nor the children's attorney objected. The District Court granted the motion and the mother appealed, claiming that the District Court had to hold an evidentiary hearing before dismissing the state's case. The Supreme Court affirmed the dismissal because there were no questions of fact regarding the best interests of the children, as the allegations of abuse involved only the mother. The Supreme Court further concluded that the mother could now initiate a parenting plan since the state's case had been dismissed. In re S.S., 2012 MT 78, 364 Mont. 437, 276 P.3d 883.

Sufficient Evidence That Children in Need of Care — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: In 2004, a mother left her two children with a 16-year-old babysitter and did not return for over 24 hours. The children were placed in temporary legal custody with the state, where they remained thereafter. The state attempted to work on reunifying the family, but the mother repeatedly failed to comply with treatment plans, continued her heavy drinking, was arrested several times, and spent periods incarcerated. The children were tribal members, and the state gave proper tribal notification and had an Indian Child Welfare Act expert testify on several occasions that continued parental custody was likely to result in serious emotional or physical harm to the children and that there were no family members available to take the children. The children were adjudicated youth in need of care, and the state eventually sought to terminate the mother's parental rights in 2008. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The children had been in foster care for over 4 years, exceeding the threshold for triggering the presumption that termination was in the children's best interests. A reasonable person could conclude, as did the District Court, that the children were in need of care and that the mother's parental rights should be terminated. Substantial evidence showed that the mother: (1) had been charged with four separate criminal offenses and was the subject of a bench warrant; (2) entered an intensive outpatient drug treatment program but stopped after five sessions, indicating a high potential for substance abuse that could only be controlled by incarceration or inpatient treatment; (3) did not complete any parts of the court-approved treatment plan; (4) missed a number of scheduled visits with the children; (5) failed to address her mental health issues; (6) failed to obtain adequate housing; (7) failed to make reunification with the children a priority; and (8) was unlikely to change her pattern of substance abuse and her unstable lifestyle. In re T.W.F & A.R.M., 2009 MT 207, 351 M 233, 210 P3d 174 (2009).

No Error in Denial of Continuance of Parental Rights Termination Proceeding to Determine Placement of Children: During his testimony at a hearing on termination of a father's parental rights, the father requested a continuance in order for a hearing to be held regarding whether placement of the children with their grandparents was in the children's best interests. The District Court denied the request, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The question of possible placement of the children had no bearing on whether the statutory criteria for terminating the father's parental rights had been established, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in declining to delay final determination of the father's parental rights. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 98, 350 M 86, 206 P3d 565 (2009). See also In re O.A.W., 2007 MT 13, 335 M 304, 153 P3d 6 (2007).

Sufficient Evidence to Adjudicate Children as Youths in Need of Care: The District Court properly adjudicated children as youths in need of care based on evidence that: (1) there was a significant prior history of domestic violence and domestic abuse between the parents in the presence of the children; (2) one of the children exhibited various behavior and developmental problems, including running away, violent behavior, anger control problems, and poor language skills; (3) the father could not care for the children because of his long-term federal incarceration; (4) the mother, who was living at a shelter for domestic abuse victims and dealing with mental health issues, had voluntarily surrendered the children to state care because of her inability to adequately parent them; and (5) the state had made reasonable efforts to avoid placement of the children or to make it possible to safely return the children to the home, but protective placement was required. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 98, 350 M 86, 206 P3d 565 (2009). See also In re K.H. and K.M., 2012 MT 175, 366 Mont. 18, 285 P.3d 474, in which the Supreme Court concluded that there was insufficient evidence to adjudicate children as youths in need of care and that the District Court properly considered the mother's past conduct, including her choice of intimate partners, in the context of how that conduct affected the children.

Hearsay Evidence and Parental Rights Termination — Admission of Hearsay Evidence at Show Cause, Adjudicatory, and Termination Hearings Held Proper Because Children "Unavailable" — J.C.E. Case Distinguished — No Offer of Proof Made: Hearsay evidence in the form of videotaped interviews of young children talking with investigators about sexual abuse by their parents was admitted after the District Court found that the children were "unavailable" to testify because they would be traumatized by testifying against their parents in a courtroom setting. The Supreme Court held that the videotaped testimony was properly admitted by the District Court, based upon the thorough findings by the District Court, at the show cause hearing, the adjudicatory hearing, and the parental rights termination hearing. The Supreme Court distinguished St. v. J.C.E., 235 M 264, 767 P2d 309 (1988), because that case was a criminal case in which the right of confrontation under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., applied, whereas the case now before the Supreme Court was a civil case. The Supreme Court also held that the District Court properly analyzed the mother's attempt to call the children as witnesses as one of relevance, and because no offer of proof was made under Rule 103, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), by the mother, the Supreme Court could not conclude that the District Court acted arbitrarily. In re O.A.W., 2007 MT 13, 335 M 304, 153 P3d 6 (2007).

Parent's Excited Utterance Following Domestic Disturbance Not Considered Hearsay in Proceeding Adjudicating Child as Youth in Need of Care: In adjudicating a child as a youth in need of care, the District Court relied on statements made by the mother to an officer who was investigating a domestic disturbance at the family residence. Following adjudication, the court implemented a treatment plan, which the father refused to sign. The court subsequently terminated the father's parental rights for failing to comply with the treatment plan. The father contended that the District Court improperly admitted hearsay evidence from the officer that provided the evidentiary support for designating the child as a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court disagreed. The excited utterance exception to the hearsay rule under Rule 803, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), applied to the officer's testimony regarding the mother's statements because the statements were made immediately after the mother had been fighting with the father and while she was still visibly upset. Thus, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the officer's testimony. Erroneous Award of Custody at Adjudicatory Hearing Cured by Immediate Scheduling of Dispositional Hearing to Address Dispositional Issue Separately: The District Court failed to structure dispositional issues apart from adjudicatory issues when it granted temporary legal custody of two children to the state during an adjudicatory hearing. However, upon discovering the error, the court immediately scheduled a dispositional hearing to address the dispositional issue separately. Although not excusing the error, the Supreme Court held that holding a second dispositional hearing made the initial order placing the children with the state during the adjudicatory hearing the functional equivalent to an order of placement pending the dispositional hearing because temporary placement outside the home is allowed at every stage of the proceeding pursuant to 41-3-301, 41-3-432, and this section. The error was harmless and nonprejudicial and did not warrant reversal. In re S.C. & L.Z., 2005 MT 241, 328 M 476, 121 P3d 552 (2005).

Proper Finding That Youths in Need of Care — Expert Testimony Based in Part on Hearsay — Adequate Exercise of Independent Factfinding Judgment: The District Court found that two youths were in need of care. The mother appealed on grounds of insufficient evidence and contended that the District Court erroneously adopted the state's findings of fact and conclusions of law without substantial change, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The record contained sufficient credible evidence to support the findings that the children were abused and neglected by the mother's actions that injured the children's capacity to function emotionally or psychologically and thus were youths in need of care. Additionally, it was not error for the District Court to rely on the testimony of a psychology expert, even though the testimony was based in part on hearsay, because the facts and data relied on by the expert were of the type typically relied on by experts in the field of psychology. Moreover, although the verbatim adoption of findings and conclusions of the prevailing party is not favored, the District Court in this case did not in fact adopt the state's findings and conclusions verbatim, but rather exercised independent factfinding judgment. Adjudication Properly Based on Parents' Stipulation That Children Considered Youths in Need of Care: Following termination of their parental rights, the parents contended that termination was not proper because the children were never adjudicated as youths in need of care, which is the threshold for termination proceedings. Although there was no hearing at which that determination was made based on a preponderance of the evidence, under 41-3-434, a parent may stipulate that a child is a youth in need of care, and the parents in this case twice stipulated that their children were in need of care—once when they signed a stipulation to temporary legal custody and again when they signed a stipulation to the extension of temporary legal custody. Based on these stipulations and the holding in In Re Custody & Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80 (2001), the children were properly adjudicated as youths in need of care. In re M.B., J.B., & W.B., 2004 MT 304, 323 M 468, 100 P3d 1006 (2004).

Failure to Adjudicate Youth in Need of Care Precluding Termination of Parental Rights: A parent contended that parental rights were improperly terminated because the child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that such adjudication is a threshold requirement before a court may grant temporary legal custody, order a parental treatment plan, or terminate parental rights. The state argued that the child was found to be a youth in need of care during earlier guardianship proceedings in a different District Court. The Supreme Court cited In re F.M., 2002 MT 180, 311 M 35, 53 P3d 368 (2002), for the holding that evidence received at a hearing on a collateral matter, such as a guardianship proceeding, did not satisfy the adjudicatory requirements of this section (formerly numbered 41-3-404). Further, it was improper for the District Court to approve a treatment plan 10 months prior to proper adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care, in violation of 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) and 41-3-420 (renumbered 41-3-443), which also rendered the requirements of 41-3-609 unsatisfied. Because the child was not properly adjudicated a youth in need of care, court approval of a treatment plan was improper and termination of parental rights was reversed. In re B.N.Y., 2003 MT 241, 317 M 291, 77 P3d 189 (2003).

Sufficient Findings to Warrant Grant of Temporary Legal Custody: A mother appealed an order granting temporary legal custody of her child to the state. The Supreme Court held that an order of temporary legal custody is normally an interlocutory order subject to review pursuant to a writ of supervisory control, rather than by direct appeal. Nevertheless, in this case, the court decided to address the appeal as if it were a direct appeal because the state's motion to dismiss had been denied earlier. The court found sufficient evidence to support the order of temporary custody. Even though the mother did nothing wrong personally, she made mistakes concerning other people in her life that endangered her child's welfare. A finding that a parent personally caused a child's injuries is not necessary for a grant of temporary legal custody. A District Court may consider a child to be a youth in need of care regardless of the parent's care for the child or even whether actual abuse or neglect occurred. The temporary custody order was affirmed. In re D.A., 2003 MT 109, 315 M 340, 68 P3d 735 (2003).

Failure to Hold Adjudicatory Hearing to Determine Whether Children in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Improper Absent Adjudication of Status of Children: The District Court held several hearings concerning temporary investigative authority, granting several extensions, and also held several hearings concerning granting temporary legal custody, which was extended twice. The state then filed a petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. Temporary legal custody was extended a third time pending a hearing on the termination hearing. At the hearing, the mother's parental rights were terminated, and she appealed. The Supreme Court found that there had never been an adjudicatory hearing at which the District Court heard testimony or received evidence concerning whether the children were abused or neglected. The hearing for temporary legal custody did not equate to an adjudication by the court that the children were youths in need of care, even in light of an alleged stipulation by the mother to that effect. Absent an adjudicatory hearing and an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care, termination of parental rights was improper, and the order was reversed. In re M.O., M.O., & M.O., 2003 MT 4, 314 M 13, 62 P3d 265 (2003).

Retention of Jurisdiction to Terminate Parental Rights — Findings of Abuse or Neglect in Temporary Legal Custody Stage Required: To retain jurisdiction to terminate parental rights under 41-3-609, a District Court must find by a preponderance of the evidence in the temporary legal custody stage under this section that the child is abused or neglected. The adjudication of a child as a youth in need of care cannot be established based on evidence received at the hearing on permanent legal custody. In its termination order, the court must conclude that it did not exceed its jurisdiction at any time during the course of the proceedings. If the court does not make a proper finding of abuse and neglect under this section, it will have exceeded its jurisdiction in waiting to make that determination until terminating parental rights under 41-3-609. In the present case, the District Court did not specifically state, pursuant to this section, that the children were youths in need of care, but the evidence upon which the court based its order granting temporary legal custody clearly demonstrated that the children had suffered actual harm and that they were in danger of substantial risk of harm to their health and welfare. The Supreme Court declined to disturb the findings of abuse and neglect, based on the District Court's language in its order extending the state's investigative authority. In re F.M. & D.M., 2002 MT 180, 311 M 35, 53 P3d 368 (2002).

Failure to Adjudicate Child as Youth in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Improper: A mother was arrested for a parole violation, and the state filed a petition to investigate whether her children were abused or neglected. The District Court granted the petition on a preliminary basis, and the children were placed in a foster home. The mother was released on bond but failed to appear for a show cause hearing. The state's petition was then granted, and the court found that it was in the children's best interests to be removed from the home. The mother was later arrested again, released the following day, and left for Florida, leaving the children behind. She was arrested in Florida about 3 months later, and while incarcerated there, Montana filed for approval of a treatment plan. The treatment plan was faxed to the mother, but she refused to sign it. The plan was approved without her signature. A district citizen review board then recommended that the mother's parental rights be terminated based on the mother's criminal history, the social history of the case, and the children's need for permanence. The District Court terminated the mother's parental rights for failing to comply with the treatment plan, and the mother appealed. The Supreme Court held that termination of parental rights was in error because the children had never been adjudicated as youths in need of care through an adjudicatory hearing, as required by this section. A stipulation by the mother to let the court give temporary custody of the children to the state did not constitute a stipulation or an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care. In re T.C. & W.C., 2001 MT 264, 307 M 244, 37 P3d 70 (2001).

Stipulation Not Considered Sufficient Adjudication of Youth in Need of Care — Lack of Jurisdictional Prerequisite to Terminate Parental Rights: The mother entered into a stipulation with the state that her children were youths in need of care only upon several conditions: (1) her parental rights would remain intact; (2) the children would reside with their grandmother; (3) the Casey Family Program would manage the children's cases; (4) the mother would always have contact with the children even if the program was required to intervene between the mother and grandmother; and (5) at an appropriate time when the mother was ready, the program, the Department, and the mother would devise a treatment plan that would be completed by the mother in order to regain custody of the children. At a subsequent hearing, the Department proposed a permanency plan that involved removing the children from their grandmother. The mother contended that the proposal amounted to a failure to abide by the conditions of the stipulation, thereby voiding the conditional stipulation that the children were youths in need of care and precluding the District Court's authority to terminate her parental rights. The Supreme Court agreed. Although a stipulation may be an acceptable alternative to an adjudicatory hearing in many circumstances, the fundamental nature of the rights of a parent requires that the process by which a stipulation is drafted and signed needs to be closely scrutinized. In this case, the stipulation was drafted by the County Attorney and signed by the mother without the benefit of legal counsel and essentially allowed the court to determine that the youths were in need of care without a finding that they were abused or neglected and without a hearing as required by 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). The mother had conflicting feelings about the removal of the children from their grandmother's care and relied on her understanding from the stipulation that the Department would not remove the children or terminate her parental rights, so she did not complete her treatment plan. Only a few days after the initial hearing, she promptly began work toward completion of the treatment plan and had made significant progress, particularly considering the unexpected death of her mother, by the time of the next hearing. Despite the change in circumstances resulting from the death, the Department did not grant the mother any additional time to complete the treatment plan, nor did the Department offer any evidence that the mother had abused or neglected the children. Under the unique facts of this case, the Supreme Court held that the District Court incorrectly found that the stipulation sufficed as an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care. Without that adjudication, the District Court lacked the jurisdictional prerequisite to terminate the mother's parental rights, so the Supreme Court reversed. In Re Custody and Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80, 23 P3d 206 (2001).

Finding That Child Is Youth in Need of Care Prerequisite to Transfer of Custody: The exigent protection of the health and welfare of a child is paramount when the state's initial intervention into otherwise private family matters reveals an actual or potentially dangerous or unhealthy environment requiring the removal of the child from a custodial caregiver. The legal determination that a child is a youth in need of care is a jurisdictional prerequisite for a court-ordered transfer of custody. The first question in a termination proceeding is whether the District Court correctly adjudicated the child as a youth in need of care, and the state need only offer clear and convincing evidence that the court properly adjudicated the child as a youth in need of care in order for the court to inquire into the actual fitness of the parent. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Lack of District Court Jurisdiction to Place Children Found Not to Be Abused or Neglected Remedied by Stipulation for Placement of Children: After the temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) and temporary legal custody of the Department of Public Health and Human Services were terminated by the District Court, the District Court retained jurisdiction over the placement of the children in question pursuant to a stipulation placing those children with the parents of a father who pleaded guilty to negligent homicide. The Department argued, citing In re M.P.M. & A.R.M., 1999 MT 78, 294 M 87, 976 P2d 988 (1999), that once the District Court found that the children were not abused or neglected, it lost jurisdiction over the case and therefore could not retain jurisdiction. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly retained jurisdiction because retention of jurisdiction was based upon a stipulation granting custody of the children to the father's parents and the stipulation provided for the retention of jurisdiction by the District Court. In re Inquiry Into J.L. & D.L., 2000 MT 289, 302 M 254, 14 P3d 473, 57 St. Rep. 1219 (2000).

Dismissal of Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427) Without Review of Guardianship Action — Harmless Error in Light of Requirements of Indian Child Welfare Act: In compliance with 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423), the District Court ordered a show cause hearing at which to consider a petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") regarding two Indian children. At the hearing, the Deputy County Attorney offered an order and memorandum from a previously dismissed guardianship proceeding as evidence. The court did not admit the documentation as evidence, but took judicial notice of it. However, at the end of the hearing, the court dismissed the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") without reviewing any records from the guardianship proceeding and ordered the Department of Public Health and Human Services to immediately place the children with their father. The mother contended that it was error to dismiss the petition without reviewing the guardianship file. In order for courts to grant TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") petitions when Indian children are involved, the requirements of the Indian Child Welfare Act must be met. Under 25 U.S.C. 1912, active efforts must be made to provide remedial services and rehabilitation programs to prevent the breakup of the Indian family. In addition, any finding that continued custody of the child by the parent or Indian custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child must be based on the testimony of qualified expert witnesses. Because these requirements were not met, the court could not have granted TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") even if it had reviewed the guardianship file, so its failure to do so, if erroneous, was harmless. In re M.P.M. & A.R.M., 1999 MT 78, 294 M 87, 976 P2d 988, 56 St. Rep. 327 (1999).

Error in Placing Custody With One Parent Following Dismissal of Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427): In compliance with 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423), the District Court ordered a show cause hearing at which to consider a petition for temporary investigative authority (TIA) (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") regarding two Indian children. At the end of the hearing, the court dismissed the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—

now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") and ordered the Department of Public Health and Human Services to immediately place the children with their father. The Department argued on appeal that the court exceeded its authority in ordering transfer of custody to the father after the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") was dismissed. The Supreme Court held that when the District Court vacated the orders issued following filing of the petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services"), it did not have authority to place custody with the father because nothing in the statutory framework or legislative intent authorizes the placement of a child with one parent, as opposed to the other, following dismissal of a petition for TIA (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services"). The order transferring custody to the father was reversed. Stipulation That Child Is Youth in Need of Care — Court Discretion to Determine Custody: Under 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) and 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438), a parent's stipulation that a child is a youth in need of care empowers a District Court, in its discretion, to transfer legal custody of the child from the parent to the Department of Public Health and Human Services pursuant to In re C.M., 281 M 183, 932 P2d 1063 (1997). Court Not to Take Judicial Notice of Hearing at Which Parties Not Represented by Counsel: The Streckerts were not present or represented at a hearing by the lower court determining temporary custody of their children. Subsequently, during a hearing terminating parental rights, the District Court took judicial notice of the testimony presented during the temporary custody hearing. The Supreme Court held that the lower court should not have taken judicial notice of evidence presented in the first hearing but refused to reverse the decision on the basis that there was substantial other evidence to support the lower court's ruling. In re D.S., H.S., R.S., R.S., J.S., R.S., & K.S., 253 M 484, 833 P2d 1090, 49 St. Rep. 552 (1992).

Hearsay Testimony as Only Evidence of Abuse or Neglect — Dismissal Proper: When the bulk of testimony elicited from a social worker and guardian ad litem at a show cause hearing on abuse and neglect was hearsay and when even the state conceded that no evidence was offered to establish probable cause that the children were abused or neglected, consideration of the testimony by the District Court constituted reversible error. The petition was dismissed without prejudice, and the children were returned to their parents pending further proceedings. In re B.S. & J.S., 252 M 435, 829 P2d 939, 49 St. Rep. 338 (1992).

Adjudicatory and Dispositional Hearing Combined — Notice Not Required: Parental rights may be terminated at a dispositional hearing under 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) and 41-3-607. Only Show Cause Hearing Required Upon Filing Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427): A mother contended that an order granting temporary custody to the state and allowing temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") under 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) should be vacated for lack of an adjudicatory hearing pursuant to 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) and a dispositional hearing pursuant to 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438). In denying the motion to vacate, the District Court properly held that a show cause hearing is the only hearing required when a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427—now "immediate protection and emergency protective services") is filed. Mere Presence of Hearsay Evidence in Court File Not Reversible Error: The presence in the court file of statements not supported by testimony is not a violation of due process or error when: (1) the authors of the reports did testify and were subject to cross-examination; (2) no evidence was presented to rebut the presumption that any hearsay within the reports themselves was disregarded by the District Court; and (3) the court explicitly based its findings upon the testimony of the witnesses and upon the reports of only those who testified. Evidence of Sexual Abuse — Treatment Plan Ordered: Acting on evidence of sexual abuse and other problems within the family, the trial court properly found S.L.T. to be an abused and neglected child. The court granted temporary custody to the county welfare department and required that the child and her parents follow a treatment plan submitted by the welfare department. Section 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) gives the trial court authority to order any of the forms of relief listed in 41-3-403 (renumbered 41-3-423) once the court determines a child is abused or neglected. This includes the relief ordered in this case. In re S.L.T., 215 M 289, 697 P2d 472, 42 St. Rep. 366 (1985).

Family Unity Not to Be Preserved at Expense of Children's Best Interests: After an adjudicatory hearing, the District Court terminated the parental rights of the parents of five children and granted custody with authority to consent to adoption to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). Under Department placement, the children would be separated from each other. The paternal grandmother appealed to the Supreme Court, claiming that the state policy of preserving the unity and welfare of the family as set forth in 41-3-101 was violated by the separation of the children and by the District Court's refusal to award the children to her. The Supreme Court affirmed because the District Court's findings indicated that it had considered the grandmother's request but that the overriding concern was and ought to have been the best interests of the children. In re M.N., 199 M 407, 649 P2d 749, 39 St. Rep. 1487 (1982).

Competency in Criminal Matter Not Determinative in Civil Matter: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) filed a petition in District Court alleging that J. H. was a youth in need of care. The boy, his mother, and a social worker all testified that the father sexually abused the boy. The youth was found to be an abused and neglected child. The father claimed that since he was declared unfit to proceed in a collateral criminal action he was also unfit to proceed in the civil action. The Supreme Court found nothing in the record to indicate the father was declared unfit to proceed in anything except the criminal action. He had the burden of proving his incompetence. With no affirmative showing of incompetence to proceed in the civil action, the court presumed the father competent. In re J.H., 196 M 482, 640 P2d 445, 39 St. Rep. 267 (1982).

Dispositional Hearing Required: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) filed a petition in District Court alleging that J. H. was a youth in need of care. The boy, his mother, and a social worker all testified that the father sexually abused the boy. The court found the boy abused and neglected but failed to hold a dispositional hearing. The Supreme Court found that dispositional hearings are required but that because a separate dispositional hearing had been held in a juvenile matter and the boy was placed at the Yellowstone Boys Ranch, the failure was harmless error in this case. In re J.H., 196 M 482, 640 P2d 445, 39 St. Rep. 267 (1982).

Youth in Need of Care Proceeding — Spouse May Testify — Section Constitutional: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) filed a petition in District Court alleging that J. H. was a youth in need of care. The boy, his mother, and a social worker all testified that the father sexually abused the boy. The father contended that the wife's testimony was a violation of the spousal privilege. The Supreme Court held the wife could testify. The purpose of the spousal privilege is to protect the sanctity of the marriage and home. However, once a family member has been sexually abused, the sanctity of the home and the reason for the rule have been destroyed. Sexual abuse of the son by the father is also a special wrong to the wife and has particularly and directly affected her in a manner other than that suffered by the public in general. Thus, the wrong against the child is nothing more or less than a wrong against the other spouse. As such it falls into one of the exceptions to the spousal privilege. The father claimed that it was unclear whether 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) allows parents to testify in youth in need of care proceedings and therefore 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) was unconstitutionally vague. The court, having found that the wife could testify against the husband, determined that the statute was not void due to vagueness. In re J.H., 196 M 482, 640 P2d 445, 39 St. Rep. 267 (1982).

Indian Child Welfare Act — Effective Date: A proceeding for termination of parental rights initiated in state court prior to May 7, 1979, the effective date of the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (25 U.S.C. § 1901, et seq.) continues as a state proceeding, not subject to the transfer provisions to tribal court under the Act, even though, due to a bifurcation of hearings involving several fathers, one of these hearings was held after the effective date of the Act. In re T.J.D., J.L.D. & R.J.W., 189 M 147, 615 P2d 212 (1980).

One Proceeding With Two Hearings — Failure to Object Again — Waiver of Error: In a child abuse and neglect proceeding to terminate parental rights when the father of the youngest child was to have his rights determined a month after a hearing involving the termination of both parents' rights to the two elder children, the father of the youngest child waived his right to complain of error on appeal because he failed to object to questions by the judge at the second hearing involving a prior felony conviction, even though objection was made and overruled in the first hearing. In re T.J.D., J.L.D. & R.J.W., 189 M 147, 615 P2d 212 (1980).

Abuse or Neglect — Sufficiency of Evidence: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in declaring a child abused or neglected where the child's only known parent had been confined to a state hospital for 6 years, had suffered from organic brain dysfunction since birth, experienced delusions, and her condition had been diagnosed as paranoid schizophrenia with no hope of significant improvement in the foreseeable future. In re C.M.S., A Dependent and Neglected Child, 187 M 115, 609 P2d 240 (1979). See also In re C.L.A. & J.A., 211 M 393, 685 P2d 931, 41 St. Rep. 1444 (1984).

Dependency — Sufficiency of Evidence: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in finding a child dependent (see 1995 amendment) where the child's only known natural parent, possessed with a $40,000 estate, had not contributed to the child's support in any substantial way, and because of her mental condition could not provide the proper guidance for the child's necessary physical, moral, and emotional well-being. In re C.M.S., A Dependent and Neglected Child, 187 M 115, 609 P2d 240 (1979).

Protection of Family Unit: Although it is the function of the District Court to protect the unity of the family, family unity was not a factor when the child's only known natural parent had been confined to a state hospital and the child had been placed in a foster home since birth. The child had never had a viable parent-child relationship with her mother and had never seen or been associated with her natural mother. In re C.M.S., A Dependent and Neglected Child, 187 M 115, 609 P2d 240 (1979).

Scope of Review: The findings of the District Court in an abuse or neglect action enjoy a presumption of correctness and will not be overturned unless unsupported by credible evidence that would amount to a clear abuse of discretion. In re C.M.S., A Dependent and Neglected Child, 187 M 115, 609 P2d 240 (1979), following In re G., Youth in Need of Care, 174 M 321, 570 P2d 1110 (1977).

Termination of Parental Rights: When the following things were considered, the record supported the conclusions that the father's rights were adequately considered prior to termination of parental rights and that the decision to terminate them was supported by credible evidence: (1) the father was notified of the hearing, was present, and was represented by counsel; (2) professional testimony indicated the father would not be able to provide enough influence to offset the marked deprivation anticipated to continue for the child; (3) the father was found to have made no effort to assist the mother in learning to become a good parent; (4) the father had visited the child only once in 6 months when the child was in a foster home and had been reported to have abused the child. In re L.F.G., 183 M 239, 598 P2d 1125 (1979).

Youth in Need — Best Interests of Child — Mental Condition of Parent as Sole Factor: When the District Court considered the best interests of a child after first determining that the child was in fact abused or neglected, it met the required standard. Considering the mental condition of the mother as the primary if not the sole factor, but having evidence that the child would not receive even minimally satisfactory maternal care and would be exposed to extremely high chances of developing a mental condition similar to that of the mother, sufficient credible evidence was before the District Court to support the District Court's decision that the child was a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court rejected the view that mental condition of a parent could not be the sole factor supporting a severance of parental rights. In re L.F.G., 183 M 239, 598 P2d 1125 (1979).

Individual Parental Rights: In addition to their rights as a couple, parents have individual rights with respect to their children, which rights must be given adequate consideration in abuse, neglect, or dependency proceedings. In re Declaring T.E.R. Youth in Need of Care, 180 M 340, 590 P2d 1117 (1979), followed in In re J.B., 278 M 160, 923 P2d 1096, 53 St. Rep. 901 (1996).

(3) If the court determines that the youth's parents or guardians are financially able to pay a contribution as provided in subsection (2), the court shall order the youth's parents or guardians to pay an amount based on the uniform child support guidelines adopted by the department of public health and human services pursuant to 40-5-209.

(4) (a) Except as provided in subsection (4)(b), contributions ordered under this section and each modification of an existing order are enforceable by immediate or delinquency income withholding, or both, under Title 40, chapter 5, part 4. An order for a contribution that is inconsistent with this section is nevertheless subject to withholding for the payment of the contribution without need for an amendment of the support order or for any further action by the court.

(b) A court-ordered exception from contributions under this section must be in writing and be included in the order. An exception from the immediate income withholding requirement may be granted if the court finds that there is:

(i) good cause not to require immediate income withholding; or

(ii) an alternative arrangement between the department and the person who is ordered to pay contributions.

(c) A finding of good cause not to require immediate income withholding must, at a minimum, be based upon:

(i) a written determination and explanation by the court of the reasons why the implementation of immediate income withholding is not in the best interests of the child; and

(ii) proof of timely payment of previously ordered support in cases involving modification of contributions ordered under this section.

(d) An alternative arrangement must:

(i) provide sufficient security to ensure compliance with the arrangement;

(ii) be in writing and be signed by a representative of the department and the person required to make contributions; and

(iii) if approved by the court, be entered into the record of the proceeding.

(5) Upon a showing of a change in the financial ability of the youth's parents or guardians to pay, the court may modify its order for the payment of contributions required under subsection (3).

(6) (a) If the court orders the payment of contributions under this section, the department shall apply to the department of public health and human services for support enforcement services pursuant to Title IV-D of the Social Security Act.

(b) The department of public health and human services may collect and enforce a contribution order under this section by any means available under law, including the remedies provided for in Title 40, chapter 5, parts 2 and 4."

Applicability: Section 20, Ch. 516, L. 1997, provided that this section applies to proceedings commenced on or after October 1, 1997.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 458 in (1)(c)(iii) substituted "the department or a licensed child-placing" for "a social service". Amendment effective April 14, 1995.

Chapter 546 in (3), (6)(a), and (6)(b) substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

The department is the payor of last resort after all family, insurance, and other resources have been examined"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 16, 1993.

1991 Amendment: In (1), near beginning, substituted "a youth in need of care" for "abused, neglected, or dependent" and after "court" deleted "after the dispositional hearing"; inserted (2) through (6) regarding determination of the financial ability of parents or guardians to contribute to costs for care, custody, and treatment of a youth and regarding methods of contribution for those costs; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1987 Amendment: Substituted "department of family services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services".

1985 Amendment: In (2) at end substituted "41-3-408" for "[section 5]"; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) Whenever the court vests legal custody in any agency, institution, or department, it shall transmit with the dispositional judgment copies of any medical report and such other clinical, predisposition, or other reports and information as may be pertinent to the care and treatment of the youth"; deleted former (3) concerning commitment and form of commitment (see Ch. 564, L. 1985, for text); and deleted former (4) and (5) that read: "(4) Transfer of legal custody of a child shall include guardianship of any assets or estate of the child, unless otherwise specified by the court.

(5) Except in cases in which the court permanently terminates all parental rights or rights of the guardian of the youth, the court shall retain jurisdiction over the case and may subsequently modify any disposition ordered pursuant to this section."

1983 Amendment: Inserted (1)(b) allowing court to grant limited emancipation to abused youth 16 years of age or older.

1981 Amendment: In former (3) (now deleted), deleted reference to the Montana children's center.

Case Notes

Placement With Noncustodial Parent Proper Despite Prior Questions of Parental Fitness: A mother and father entered a parenting plan after dissolving their marriage, with the mother granted primary custody of the two children. The father subsequently moved to Colorado and remained out of state for the following years during which Child Protective Services became involved several times due to the mother's substance use and domestic violence allegations in the household. After the children were removed from the mother's home, the father requested that the children be placed with him. The District Court ordered the children to be placed with the father and dismissed the action without prejudice. The mother appealed, arguing that the father was not a "nonoffending" parent and had been previously found to be an imminent safety risk. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding that the father's previous criminal conduct had happened prior to and was not related to the incidents that led to the children's removal from the mother's custody, so he was not deemed an "offending parent" with respect to the removal. There was no error in the District Court's placement with the father because (1) the children were never removed from the father's custody, (2) the District Court had no evidence that the father was currently unfit to parent, and (3) the District Court dismissed the case upon placement with the father. In re J.S.L., 2021 MT 47, 403 Mont. 326, 481 P.3d 833.

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Termination of Parental Rights Improper — Remand for Consideration of Placement with Father: Although the out-of-state father had been the primary parent of the children, they were removed from the mother's care after she refused to return them to the father. The father's court-appointed attorney advised him to stipulate to the state's petitions, failed to object to the children being placed with their maternal grandparents, and never requested a placement hearing. Ultimately, the father's parental rights were terminated and the father appealed. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the father's attorney had provided ineffective counsel, and remanded the matter to the District Court to consider the father as the first placement option for the children. In re B.H., 2020 MT 4, 398 Mont. 275, 456 P.3d 233.

Termination of Parental Rights of "Non-Offending" Parent: A child was designated a youth in need of care after being removed from her mother's care. The father did not object to the designation and, although the father was deemed the "non-offending parent", the child was not placed with him because he testified that he could not financially support her or provide her a place to live. The District Court approved a document that had been prepared by the Department of Public Health and Human Services as a treatment plan for the father. However, while the child was in foster placement, the father stopped visiting the child, was placed in jail for partner-family member assault, and was alleged to be using meth. The District Court terminated the father's rights. On appeal, the father argued that he had never received a treatment plan. However, the Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed, noting that even if the term "treatment plan" had been crossed out and the word "checklist" had been written next to it, the content of the document constituted a treatment plan. In re K.B., 2016 MT 73, 383 Mont. 85, 368 P.3d 722.

Procedural Deadlines Missed — Best Interests of Child: The mother's parenting rights were terminated. The initial hearing was scheduled 18 days after the 20-day statutory deadline, which the mother did not object to. Then the Department of Public Health and Human Services requested a continuance, which the mother objected to. Following her objection to the first continuance, the mother failed to object to subsequent motions. On appeal, the mother argued that the District Court committed reversible error when it failed to hold a show cause hearing within 20 days of the filing of the abuse and neglect petition and when it failed to hold a dispositional hearing 20 days after the show cause hearing. The Supreme Court held that pursuant to legislative intent, in cases involving abused and neglected children, a District Court may act to protect a child's best interests despite procedural interests. In re A.H., 2015 MT 75, 378 Mont. 351, 344 P.3d 403.

Allegations of Abuse and Neglect Directed Only at Mother — Court-Ordered Placement With Father — No Dispositional Hearing Required: The mother and father shared legal custody of their two children. The state filed a petition for emergency protective services and for temporary investigative authority based on allegations that the mother had endangered the children through her alcohol abuse. The state placed the children with the father. The parents stipulated to the children being designated youths in need of care, and the District Court ordered that the children continue to reside with their father, with the mother having only supervised contact with them due to her continued abuse of alcohol. The father then filed a motion to dismiss the state's case and grant him full legal custody. Neither the state nor the children's attorney objected. The District Court granted the motion and the mother appealed, claiming that the District Court had to hold an evidentiary hearing before dismissing the state's case. The Supreme Court affirmed the dismissal because there were no questions of fact regarding the best interests of the children, as the allegations of abuse involved only the mother. The Supreme Court further concluded that the mother could now initiate a parenting plan since the state's case had been dismissed. In re S.S., 2012 MT 78, 364 Mont. 437, 276 P.3d 883.

Dismissal of Parenting Action Following Placement of Children Under Permanency Plan — Appeal Moot: While a parenting action was pending in Flathead County, a District Court in Missoula County approved a permanency plan that placed the children in California with the mother. The father did not appeal the placement order. The Flathead County action was subsequently dismissed, and the father appealed. The Supreme Court held that the Flathead County order was moot because the state no longer possessed authority over the custody and placement of the children, and in the absence of an ongoing, concrete controversy, effective relief could not be granted. The appeal was dismissed. In re J.A.S. & E.R.S., 2008 MT 269, 345 M 189, 190 P3d 299 (2008).

Separate Dispositional Hearing Not Required When Parental Stipulations Made Regarding Adjudication and Placement of Children and Treatment Plans: Under this section, a separate dispositional hearing is not required if parental stipulations are entered pursuant to 41-3-434. In this case, the parents stipulated to their children being youths in need of care, to the children being placed in temporary state custody, and to signing treatment plans. Given the parents' stipulations to the pertinent dispositional issues, a separate dispositional hearing was not required. In re B.B. & J.B., 2006 MT 66, 331 M 407, 133 P3d 215 (2006).

Erroneous Award of Custody at Adjudicatory Hearing Cured by Immediate Scheduling of Dispositional Hearing to Address Dispositional Issue Separately: The District Court failed to structure dispositional issues apart from adjudicatory issues when it granted temporary legal custody of two children to the state during an adjudicatory hearing. However, upon discovering the error, the court immediately scheduled a dispositional hearing to address the dispositional issue separately. Although not excusing the error, the Supreme Court held that holding a second dispositional hearing made the initial order placing the children with the state during the adjudicatory hearing the functional equivalent to an order of placement pending the dispositional hearing because temporary placement outside the home is allowed at every stage of the proceeding pursuant to 41-3-301, 41-3-432, and 41-3-437. The error was harmless and nonprejudicial and did not warrant reversal. In re S.C. & L.Z., 2005 MT 241, 328 M 476, 121 P3d 552 (2005).

No Improper Bifurcation of Adjudicatory and Dispositional Hearings Based on Noticed Testimony From Earlier Show Cause Hearing: A parent argued that adjudicatory and dispositional hearings were improperly bifurcated because the District Court took notice of and improperly relied upon expert testimony offered at an earlier show cause hearing. The state argued that a court may take notice of the records of any court in the state. The Supreme Court noted that the District Court allowed the parent to move for reconsideration at the hearing of its judicial notice of testimony from the previous hearing, but the parent did not move for reconsideration. Because the District Court also determined that there was sufficient evidence at the later hearing, without reliance on the noticed testimony, to sustain a finding of abuse and neglect and because the parent did not establish that use of the noticed testimony was a disadvantage, no error was demonstrated. In re S.C. & L.Z., 2005 MT 241, 328 M 476, 121 P3d 552 (2005).

Placement of Children With Noncustodial Parent Proper — Parental Rights Not Terminated: A mother contended that her due process rights were violated when the children were adjudicated as youths in need of care and the state placed the children with their father. The Supreme Court declined to address the due process claims because they were raised for the first time on appeal, and the court affirmed the placement. The mother's parental rights were not terminated; rather, the District Court followed the statutory procedure in this section after finding that placement with the father was in the children's best interests. The state took the necessary steps to ensure safe placement as required in the Interstate Placement of Children Compact, and the state was properly relieved of any further obligation once the concern for the children being youths in need of care was eliminated by the placement. In re A.C., T.C., & C.W., 2004 MT 320, 324 M 58, 101 P3d 761 (2004). See also In re M.J., 2013 MT 60, 369 Mont. 247, 296 P.3d 1197.

Failure to Adjudicate Youth in Need of Care Precluding Termination of Parental Rights: A parent contended that parental rights were improperly terminated because the child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that such adjudication is a threshold requirement before a court may grant temporary legal custody, order a parental treatment plan, or terminate parental rights. The state argued that the child was found to be a youth in need of care during earlier guardianship proceedings in a different District Court. The Supreme Court cited In re F.M., 2002 MT 180, 311 M 35, 53 P3d 368 (2002), for the holding that evidence received at a hearing on a collateral matter, such as a guardianship proceeding, did not satisfy the adjudicatory requirements of 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437). Further, it was improper for the District Court to approve a treatment plan 10 months prior to proper adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care, in violation of 41-3-420 (renumbered 41-3-443) and this section (formerly numbered 41-3-406), which also rendered the requirements of 41-3-609 unsatisfied. Because the child was not properly adjudicated a youth in need of care, court approval of a treatment plan was improper and termination of parental rights was reversed. In re B.N.Y., 2003 MT 241, 317 M 291, 77 P3d 189 (2003).

No Standing by Former Parent to Object to Child's Placement or Assert Child's Rights: Once the parent-child relationship is terminated by the District Court, a former parent has no standing to object to the court's subsequent placement of the child with the Department or by adoption. Similarly, a former parent has no standing to assert a violation of the child's rights as guardian ad litem because the former parent no longer represents the child. In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999).

Stipulation That Child Is Youth in Need of Care — Court Discretion to Determine Custody: Under 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) and 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438), a parent's stipulation that a child is a youth in need of care empowers a District Court, in its discretion, to transfer legal custody of the child from the parent to the Department of Public Health and Human Services pursuant to In re C.M., 281 M 183, 932 P2d 1063 (1997). In re J.H., R.H., D.H., & R.H., 1998 MT 128, 289 M 111, 958 P2d 1191, 55 St. Rep. 504 (1998).

No Indication of Foreseeable Change in Parenting Skill Despite State-Provided Services — Permanent Department Custody of Children Affirmed: Once a youth is determined to be in need of care, the District Court can take appropriate measures to safeguard the welfare of the youth, including transfer of legal custody of the youth to the state. The youth's best interests are paramount and take precedence over parental rights. In the present case, the mother was shown to be unable and unwilling to remedy the circumstances that placed her children at risk and was not motivated to become an adequate parent despite the best efforts of the state to provide her with services and assistance in parenting, which brought no appreciable improvement. The District Court did not err in transferring permanent custody of the children to the Department of Public Health and Human Services. In re C.M., F.M., & S.M., 281 M 183, 932 P2d 1063, 54 St. Rep. 126 (1997), followed in In re J.H., R.H., D.H., & R.H., 1998 MT 128, 289 M 111, 958 P2d 1191, 55 St. Rep. 504 (1998), and In re R.T., 2005 MT 173, 327 M 498, 116 P3d 783 (2005). See also In re Custody & Parental Rights of F.M. & S.M., 2001 MT 93, 305 M 189, 24 P3d 208 (2001), in which the termination of parental rights to two of the children was affirmed absent evidence that the mother had made any significant progress in her ability to parent.

Award of Permanent Legal Custody — Authority of Court to Award Custody — Best Interests of Child Standard: The Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) filed a petition requesting the court to terminate parental rights of Mary Ann G. and to grant the Department permanent legal custody of J.J.G., with the right to consent to adoption. Former foster parents of J.J.G. filed a petition seeking permanent custody of the child. The court dismissed the foster parents' petition on grounds that the court could only review the placement actions of the Department but could not make the permanent placement itself. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the lower court erred when it concluded that the foster parents were without legal authority to seek custody of the child and that the lower court had no option other than to grant custody to the Department. The District Court has discretionary authority to transfer legal custody to any qualified individual, including nonrelatives, in order to protect the welfare of the child. In re J.J.G., 266 M 274, 880 P2d 808, 51 St. Rep. 793 (1994), followed in In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999).

Dispositional Hearing — Procedures to Be Rigorously Followed — Error for Court to State Its Intentions Before Evidence Presented: In a dispositional hearing on petitions by the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) and former foster parents for permanent custody of a child, the District Court stated its intention to transfer custody to DFS several times prior to the time that evidence was considered at the dispositional hearing. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the evidence received at the hearing was essentially disregarded by the District Court and that the hearing itself was a mere formality. This was error, and the lower court was reversed. In re J.J.G., 266 M 274, 880 P2d 808, 51 St. Rep. 793 (1994).

Proof of Sexual Abuse Not Necessary to Conclusion That Child Is Youth in Need of Care: A finding that a child was sexually abused was not a prerequisite to a conclusion that the child was a youth in need of care warranting placement of the child with the Department of Family Services. The conclusion was proper in light of the combination of the testimony of four expert witnesses, a video deposition of the child, a series of nude photos of the child taken by the parents, evidence of spousal physical abuse in the presence of the child, and the fact that the father did not provide as evidence the results of his court-ordered psychological evaluation. In re H.D., 256 M 70, 844 P2d 114, 49 St. Rep. 1141 (1992).

Marriage and Divorce Law Inapplicable to Nonparent Seeking Child Custody: As part of a change in custody proceeding conducted under the marriage and divorce statutes, the District Court erred in granting to a nonparent the custody of a child who was neither a natural child nor adopted. The proper procedure to be followed is contained in the child abuse, neglect, and dependency statutes. Although the nonparent apparently fit the requirements for custodian under either scenario, the case was remanded for correct procedural consideration under this chapter. In re Marriage of Miller, 251 M 300, 825 P2d 189, 49 St. Rep. 36 (1992), following In re Doney, 174 M 282, 570 P2d 575 (1977), and overruling a contrary prior holding in In re Custody of C.C., K.C., & B.C., 215 M 72, 695 P2d 816 (1985).

Grant of Long-Term Custody Proper — Finding of Abuse and Neglect: Upon motion by the state to terminate parental rights, the District Court ordered that the "parental custodial rights of [mother, father, and stepfather] in and to the youths [B.N. and T.N.], and to their property, are hereby terminated". Under the authority of 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438), the court then awarded permanent legal custody to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) and gave the Department the right to place the children in foster care. The court also awarded supervised visitation rights to the parents and grandparents—an award inconsistent with termination of parental rights. The record clearly showed that neither the state nor the court intended to fully sever parental rights, even though the order used the words "terminated" and "permanent custody". On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the District Court intended to grant the state long-term custody, substantiated by a 10-year history of family turmoil resulting in abuse and neglect of the children, and that placement of the children in foster care was appropriate. In re B.N. & T.N., 245 M 511, 802 P2d 1244, 47 St. Rep. 2225 (1990).

Standard of Review — Custody Determinations and Termination of Parental Rights: The same standard of review applies to both termination of parental rights and custody determinations. As set out in In re R.A.D., 231 M 143, 753 P2d 862, 45 St. Rep. 496 (1988), in both instances the District Court's decision is afforded all reasonable presumptions as to the correctness of the determination, and therefore the decision will not be disturbed on appeal unless there is a mistake of law or a finding of fact not supported by substantial evidence that would amount to a clear abuse of discretion. In re S.P., 241 M 190, 786 P2d 642, 47 St. Rep. 190 (1990). See also In re K.H. and K.M., 2012 MT 175, 366 Mont. 18, 285 P.3d 474.

Award of Long-Term Custody Not Considered Termination of Parental Rights: An award of long-term custody under 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) is not equivalent to a termination of parental rights requiring that the statutory factors of 41-3-609 be met. In re R.T.L.P., 238 M 384, 777 P2d 892, 46 St. Rep. 1354 (1989), followed in In re T.A., 249 M 186, 814 P2d 994, 48 St. Rep. 634 (1991).

Insufficient Evidence to Award Child Support: In a dispositional hearing held by the Youth Court under 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) in which the court removed the child from her abusive mother's care and placed her in the care of her natural father, the court erroneously ordered the mother to pay child support to the father because there was insufficient evidence to support a finding of child support. The court failed to consider the factors in 40-4-204 and the Carlson formula, except to note that the father had just started a new business and the mother was employed as a receptionist. In re C.C., 237 M 246, 772 P2d 857, 46 St. Rep. 773 (1989).

Youth Court Jurisdiction Concurrent With District Court: The Youth Court has concurrent jurisdiction with the District Court over all youths who are within the state for any purpose. Upon the petition for temporary custody filed by the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services), the Youth Court had the authority to determine that the child in question was a youth in need of care, to remove her from her mother's abusive home, and, following a dispositional hearing, to place her in the custody of her natural father. In re C.C., 237 M 246, 772 P2d 857, 46 St. Rep. 773 (1989).

Grant of Long-Term Departmental Custody: Under 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438), once a youth is found to be abused, neglected, or dependent, custody of the youth can be transferred to the state. Upon such finding, the District Court properly granted custody to the state until the children reach 18 years of age or until further notice of the court. Adjudicatory and Dispositional Hearing Combined — Notice Not Required: Parental rights may be terminated at a dispositional hearing under 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) and 41-3-607. The dispositional hearing was combined with an adjudicatory hearing under 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437), and no specific notice of the combination was required. Custody of R.A.D., 44 St. Rep. 2018 (1987). Opinion withdrawn but issue affirmed in Custody of R.A.D. & J.D., 231 M 143, 753 P2d 862, 45 St. Rep. 496 (1988).

Only Show Cause Hearing Required Upon Filing Petition for Temporary Investigative Authority (See 2001 Amendment to 41-3-427): A mother contended that an order granting temporary custody to the state and allowing temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) under 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) should be vacated for lack of an adjudicatory hearing pursuant to 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) and a dispositional hearing pursuant to 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438). In denying the motion to vacate, the District Court properly held that a show cause hearing is the only hearing required when a petition for temporary investigative authority (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) is filed. In re J.W. & J.C., 226 M 491, 736 P2d 960, 44 St. Rep. 843 (1987).

Refusal to Relinquish Custody of Indian Children to Tribe — No Abuse of Discretion: Although a tribe participated in the dispositional hearing and presented a formal resolution asking for custody of the children, who were tribal members, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to relinquish custody to the tribe when it was determined that the children's best interests would be better served by leaving them in their foster home placement, with the ultimate goal of placing them in a Native American home. In re M.J.D., C.K.D., & A.R.D., 225 M 200, 731 P2d 937, 44 St. Rep. 167 (1987).

Parent Not to Unilaterally Declare Emancipation of Child — Terminate Support: Husband petitioned District Court to excuse support arrearages on grounds minor child was emancipated. The Supreme Court reversed the lower court's finding that petitioner's child support obligation was terminated. The court noted that the obligated parent may not unilaterally declare the child emancipated and terminate support. The question of whether a child is emancipated is a question of fact to be determined by the court. If emancipation can be established, a parent generally has no further duty to support the child. Prior to the age of 18, however, there is a presumption against the emancipation of a child, and the burden of establishing emancipation is on the party asserting it. The child in this case was adjudicated a youth in need of care. Parents have a continuing duty of support for a youth in need of care which runs contrary to the concept of emancipation. A decree may be modified to terminate support because of the emancipation of a child only as to installments accruing after the motion. In re Marriage of Bordner, 220 M 339, 715 P2d 436, 43 St. Rep. 417 (1986).

Dispositional Order to Follow Hearing: It was reversible error for the District Court to indicate its intention to transfer custody from the parents to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) before the dispositional hearing was completed. In re M.L.H., H.M.H., & R.H., 220 M 288, 715 P2d 32, 43 St. Rep. 375 (1986).

"Ability to Work" — Support Order for Foster Care Reversed: In determining the parents' obligation for support, District Court erred by including, as income, the wife's "ability to work" as this is a speculative condition. The amount of support should not be based on speculative conditions. When the only relevant evidence was a statement on the parents' financial statement that "[A.R.'s] income is our only income since [W.R.] is not working", the record did not contain sufficient evidence to support the District Court's conclusion. In re L.R., 218 M 266, 707 P2d 24, 42 St. Rep. 1570 (1985).

Findings Required to Terminate Parental Rights: A court must make findings in accordance with 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438), 41-3-607, and 41-3-609 before it can terminate parental rights and award permanent custody of any child to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). In re C.A.R. & P.J.R., 214 M 174, 693 P2d 1214, 41 St. Rep. 2395 (1984).

Failure to Object to Lack of Report at Trial Court — Effect of Report: Because, at the trial court level, the mother failed to object to the failure to prepare and submit a financial report, she was precluded from raising the issue on appeal. Even if an objection had been made in a timely fashion, failure to make the report does not affect the underlying proceeding; its only purpose is to determine the parent's financial ability to contribute to costs. In this instance, because the parent has not been asked to so contribute, the failure to prepare a report would have no effect. In re B.L.O., 213 M 164, 689 P2d 1246, 41 St. Rep. 2024 (1984).

Cross-Examination on "Best Interests" Proper: The state began termination of parental rights proceedings in the District Court. The court consolidated the adjudicatory and dispositional hearings, found the youths to be "in need of care", found that the parents had not complied with the approved treatment plan, found them to be beyond rehabilitation, and terminated their parental rights. On appeal, the parents contended the trial court committed reversible error by not allowing the parents to cross-examine the testifying physician regarding the "best interests" of the children. The Supreme Court held that a trial court must hear evidence regarding the "best interest" of the children during the dispositional hearing. Because the trial court consolidated that hearing with the adjudicatory hearing, there was only one hearing, and it was error to exclude the evidence. The court held that it was not prejudicial error, however, in light of the substantial evidence presented that the youths were in need of care and the parents were beyond rehabilitation. In re C.L.A. & J.A., 211 M 393, 685 P2d 931, 41 St. Rep. 1444 (1984).

Voluntary Relinquishment of Custody — Intervening Divorce — Custody to Father: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in awarding custody of a child to his father after the parents, while still married, surrendered temporary custody to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) because of the actions of the mother. Subsequent to the surrender of the child but prior to the award of custody, the couple were divorced. The District Court was correct in continuing with the abuse and neglect custody proceeding rather than dismissing it and allowing custody to be determined in the couple's divorce action. Once a determination of abuse and neglect has been made, the court proceeds to a dispositional hearing to determine the custody of the child. There was substantial evidence that the father was stable and nonabusive and the mother had potential for further abuse. In re M.M., 200 M 244, 650 P2d 784, 39 St. Rep. 1716 (1982).

Family Unity Not to Be Preserved at Expense of Children's Best Interests: After an adjudicatory hearing, the District Court terminated the parental rights of the parents of five children and granted custody with authority to consent to adoption to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). Under Department placement, the children would be separated from each other. The paternal grandmother appealed to the Supreme Court, claiming that the state policy of preserving the unity and welfare of the family as set forth in 41-3-101 was violated by the separation of the children and by the District Court's refusal to award the children to her. The Supreme Court affirmed because the District Court's findings indicated that it had considered the grandmother's request but that the overriding concern was and ought to have been the best interests of the children. In re M.N., 199 M 407, 649 P2d 749, 39 St. Rep. 1487 (1982), followed in In re S.P., 241 M 190, 786 P2d 642, 47 St. Rep. 190 (1990). Severance of Parental Rights — Counsel Not Absolutely Required at In-Chambers Interview of Children: In the trial court, a mother's parental rights to her two children were terminated and custody granted to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). On appeal, the issue was whether the court had erred by interviewing the children in chambers without the presence of the mother and counsel. When the trial court announced to counsel and the mother that it wished to interview both children in chambers, neither counsel nor the mother objected. The mother claimed that the interview of the children without the presence of her counsel violated her rights to due process. She relied on a case in which it was stated that a child may testify out of the parents' presence in abuse and neglect cases subject to the cross-examination by the parents' attorney. The reviewing court noted that nothing in that opinion suggested that it was the duty of the trial judge to assert a parent's right to cross-examination if counsel for the parent does not. Here, in any event, there was no testimony in chambers, just an inquiry into the children's desires regarding custody. A record of the interviews was made and any claimed right of cross-examination was waived by failing to assert that right at the trial level. In re A.C.S. & E.S.S., 190 M 180, 619 P2d 1199, 37 St. Rep. 1868 (1980).

Home Study of Father's Parents — Discretion of Court: In a proceeding involving the termination of a father's parental rights, in which it was conceded that he could not parent the infant, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to order a home study of the father's parents when the facts indicated that the best interests of the child would not be served by granting custody to the grandparents. In re T.J.D., J.L.D. & R.J.W., 189 M 147, 615 P2d 212 (1980).

Declaration of Child as Youth in Need of Care — Custody Awarded to Agency — Evidence of Abuse or Neglect: A child diagnosed as failing to thrive was given to foster parents. Professional personnel all agreed that the child in question was failing to thrive and that the child's condition deteriorated while in the care of the natural mother. The child's condition improved dramatically while in foster care. The District Court's finding and conclusion that the child was a neglected child was supported by "clear and convincing" evidence, and the court was justified in permanently depriving the natural mother of the child and transferring legal custody to SRS (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). In re M.R.L., 186 M 468, 608 P2d 134 (1980).

Order Based on Potential of Future Abuse: Because there was evidence showing a high potential for future physical abuse by appellant of her own child, the court did not abuse its discretion in ordering that the child be taken from its mother and the mother's parental rights terminated. In re M.A.M., 183 M 434, 600 P2d 203 (1979).

Evidence Supporting Finding of Neglect: In a child custody case, two circumstances were found by the Supreme Court to be particularly supportive of the District Court finding that the father had neglected his minor child: (1) the father failed to notify the juvenile authorities, despite information about abuse of the child while in her mother's custody and despite the urging by an attorney he had consulted; and (2) the maternal grandmother, not the father, had taken care of the child when the mother forced the child out of the apartment. Additionally, no "viable parent-child relationship" was found to have existed between father and child. Wenz v. Schwartze, 183 M 166, 598 P2d 1086 (1979).

Failure to Make Required Findings: The District Court abused its discretion in awarding permanent custody to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) because it patently failed to make the required findings that the child was "abused, dependent, or neglected" and therefore was without power to effect a permanent transfer of custody to a nonparent. In re Fish, 174 M 201, 569 P2d 924 (1977).

Youth in Need of Care — Transfer of Custody: It was clear from the record that appellant was unwilling or unable to provide care necessary for the physical and emotional well-being of her children, and testimony supported the court's finding that the children were abused and neglected youths in need of care within the meaning of 41-3-102 and its judgment transferring permanent legal custody of the children to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) pursuant to 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438). In re Moyer, 173 M 208, 567 P2d 47 (1977).

Abandonment: Mother leaving infant with babysitter for 1 night and not returning for approximately 1 month supports a finding of abandonment and a dependency upon the public for support where 2 days after mother's departure welfare department was awarded temporary custody. In re Henderson, 168 M 329, 542 P2d 1204 (1975).

Child's Best Interest: Substantial credible evidence that father maltreated children and was incompetent coupled with evidence mother did not provide proper or sufficient food, clothing, or sanitary or medical care was sufficient to support finding and judgment that children were dependent and neglected, awarding permanent care, custody, and control to proper state agency, with right to consent to children's adoption. In re Jones & Peterson Children, 168 M 1, 539 P2d 1193 (1975).

Child's Interests Outweigh Parent's: Once a child has been found dependent and neglected, the primary concern is for the child's best interests and welfare, not that of the mother, and the fact that the mother's consent may have been obtained by undue influence does not necessarily invalidate a judgment awarding permanent custody to the welfare department with the power to consent to adoption. In re Bad Yellow Hair, 162 M 107, 509 P2d 9 (1973).

Custody to State Not Abuse of Discretion: Four children, the two oldest of which were of early school age, were insecure, troubled, frightened, and suffered from lack of medical care. Their mother had been abandoned by her husband, had an alcoholic problem, misused welfare funds, and failed to properly provide within the funds allocated. The decision of the District Court to declare the children dependent and neglected within section 10-501, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), and to award custody to the State Welfare Department (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) with right of adoption was not an abuse of discretion. In re Corneliusen, 159 M 6, 494 P2d 908 (1972).

Impoverishment Not a Shield for Neglect: The fact that a family is impoverished does not mean that the mother can use such impoverishment as a shield to hide behind in the neglect of her children when her very acts deprived the children of attention and care. Misuse of welfare funds, lack of medical care, and failure to properly provide within the funds allocated clearly reveal neglect of her children. In re Corneliusen, 159 M 6, 494 P2d 908 (1972).

Sufficiency of Evidence: Evidence in an action by the Director of the Division of Child Welfare (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) to obtain permanent custody of four minor children as dependent and neglected under section 10-501, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), was sufficient to support the trial court's finding that two minor daughters were dependent and neglected. The evidence showed that the multitude of the father's problems was such as to make his temper erratic and to cause profanity not conducive to correctly guiding young, impressionable girls toward an adult life. The trial court properly awarded custody of the two minor daughters to the Division of Child Welfare (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). In re Sheriff, 147 M 259, 410 P2d 940 (1966).

Ability to Support Child: Since ability of parents to support children was not determined in compliance with sections 10-506 and 10-507, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), but was left to testimony to be elicited at a later hearing, order compelling parents to pay support costs in action depriving them of the children was set aside. In re Phelps, 145 M 557, 402 P2d 593 (1965).

Effect of Awarding Custody to State: Where a child is found by a court decree to be dependent and neglected and its care and custody are awarded to a state agency, the child is as free from parental supervision as when placed in the custody of adoptive parents. State ex rel. Frederick v. District Court, 119 M 143, 173 P2d 626 (1946).

Case Notes

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Termination of Parental Rights Improper — Remand for Consideration of Placement with Father: Although the out-of-state father had been the primary parent of the children, they were removed from the mother's care after she refused to return them to the father. The father's court-appointed attorney advised him to stipulate to the state's petitions, failed to object to the children being placed with their maternal grandparents, and never requested a placement hearing. Ultimately, the father's parental rights were terminated and the father appealed. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the father's attorney had provided ineffective counsel, and remanded the matter to the District Court to consider the father as the first placement option for the children. In re B.H., 2020 MT 4, 398 Mont. 275, 456 P.3d 233.

Placement With Current Foster Family Affirmed Over Placement With Parents of Biological Half-Siblings: The District Court did not err in determining that it was in a minor child's best interest to remain in her placement with her current foster family. The appellants argued that because they had custody of the minor child's biological half-siblings, placement of the child with them was appropriate. In addition, they challenged the propriety of the placement with a foster family. When delivering its decision at the placement hearing, the District Court engaged in a detailed review of the evidence presented, continually noting that the primary consideration was the best interests of the minor child at the present time. As such, the District Court did not act arbitrarily or exceed the bounds of reason in reaching its final determination that placement with the current foster family was in the present best interests of the minor child. In re B.W.S., 2016 MT 340, 386 Mont. 33, 386 P.3d 595.

Mother's Objection to Termination of Parental Rights Not "Dispute Among the Parties" if Not Timely: At the start of the permanent custody hearing, the mother moved to continue the hearing so that a home study could be conducted on the woman whom the mother was recommending take care of her child until she was released from prison. The District Court proceeded with the hearing and ultimately terminated the parental rights of both parents. The mother argued that the District Court should have continued the hearing because the statute authorized the Department of Public Health and Human Services to place the child only "in the absence of a dispute between the parties". The Supreme Court held that at the time that the hearing for temporary custody was held, the mother had not come forward and that therefore the District Court at the permanent custody and termination hearing could proceed to make a determination regarding permanent custody of the child as though there was no dispute between the parties. Case Notes

Questioning by Guardian Ad Litem at Hearing Allowed — Partial Compliance — Extension of Temporary Legal Custody Proper: The Department of Public Health and Human Services petitioned for emergency protective services following reports of inappropriate behavior by the minors' parents. Eventually, at a hearing to terminate the father's parental rights, the District Court allowed the minors' guardian ad litem to question a child protection specialist and therapist over the objections of the father. The District Court subsequently terminated the father's parental rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the District Court did not err in allowing the children's guardian ad litem to cross-examine witnesses, although some lines of questioning lacked foundation and should have not been permitted. The Supreme Court also found that the Department provided reasonable efforts to reunify the father with the children, that the father's partial compliance with the treatment plan was not sufficient for compliance, that while the Department did not file for a formal motion to extend an order for temporary legal custody the Department nevertheless requested it, and that the father failed to identify which of his three attorneys he believed were ineffective over the course of his 4-year case. In re B.F., 2020 MT 223, 401 Mont. 185, 472 P.3d 142.

Agreement to Extension of Temporary Legal Custody — No Violation of Due Process: Although temporary legal custody of a youth in need of care expired 4 months before the Department of Health and Human Services filed a request to extend it, the mother's due process rights were not violated because she agreed to the Department's extension request and represented to the court that it was not necessary for the Department to file a new petition to adjudicate her child a youth in need of care. In re M.C., 2017 MT 252, 389 Mont. 78, 403 P.3d 1266.

Placement with Family Considered Foster Care — Statutory Presumption Applicable: The Department of Public Health and Human Services removed the mother's two children from her care. The mother stipulated to a treatment plan and to having the District Court adjudicate her children as youths in need of care. The children were placed with family members. The District Court eventually terminated the mother's parental rights by applying the statutory presumption in 41-3-604. On appeal, the mother argued that the District Court erred in considering time the children spent with family as foster care. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the statutory presumption applied to care provided by family members. In re C.W.E., 2016 MT 2, 382 Mont. 65, 364 P.3d 1238.

Extension of Temporary Legal Custody Proper: Although the father claimed to have done "an outstanding job" on some aspects of his treatment plan, the District Court properly granted an extension of temporary legal custody because the father needed to continue working on the remaining conditions and goals of his treatment plan. In re K.L., 2014 MT 28, 373 Mont. 421, 318 P.3d 691.

Sufficient Findings to Warrant Grant of Temporary Legal Custody: A mother appealed an order granting temporary legal custody of her child to the state. The Supreme Court held that an order of temporary legal custody is normally an interlocutory order subject to review pursuant to a writ of supervisory control, rather than by direct appeal. Nevertheless, in this case, the court decided to address the appeal as if it were a direct appeal because the state's motion to dismiss had been denied earlier. The court found sufficient evidence to support the order of temporary custody. Even though the mother did nothing wrong personally, she made mistakes concerning other people in her life that endangered her child's welfare. A finding that a parent personally caused a child's injuries is not necessary for a grant of temporary legal custody. A District Court may consider a child to be a youth in need of care regardless of the parent's care for the child or even whether actual abuse or neglect occurred. The temporary custody order was affirmed. In re D.A., 2003 MT 109, 315 M 340, 68 P3d 735 (2003).

Temporary Custody Order Not Considered Final for Purposes of Appeal — Writ of Supervisory Control Appropriate Mechanism to Challenge Temporary Custody: The District Court ordered temporary legal custody for a child, and the child's mother appealed. The Supreme Court held that orders of temporary legal custody do not embrace a final determination of the rights of the parties contemplated in former Rule 1, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), that would subject the temporary order to direct appeal. Rather, temporary custody orders are considered interlocutory orders from which the Supreme Court will grant relief in extraordinary circumstances. This ensures the expeditious review of legal errors while still protecting children from the instability of protracted, piecemeal litigation. However, qualifying temporary custody orders as interlocutory does not leave a parent who is aggrieved by an erroneous order without a remedy. The parent may invoke the extraordinary remedy of a writ of supervisory control, which is the appropriate mechanism to challenge an order of temporary custody. Termination of Parental Rights Affirmed — Mother Unlikely to Change in Reasonable Time. In re C.K., 2022 MT 27, 407 Mont. 329, 503 P.3d 1104.

Admission of Psychological Evaluation — Hearsay Exception Not Required — Unique Statutory Scheme of Youth in Need of Care Proceedings: The District Court ordered a mother's treatment plan, which required her to undergo a psychological evaluation, and she signed the treatment plan, agreeing to follow the evaluation's recommendations. The psychological evaluation became part of the court proceedings, allowing the court to consider any part of the evaluation through the abuse and neglect proceeding. After the District Court terminated the mother's parental rights, she appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding that the District Court properly admitted the mother's psychological evaluation at the hearing to determine whether to terminate the mother's parental rights and that it did not need to be admitted as a hearsay exception. In re M.C., 2017 MT 252, 389 Mont. 78, 403 P.3d 1266, distinguished in In re R.J.F., 2019 MT 113, 395 Mont. 454, 443 P.3d 387, relating to valid hearsay or foundational objections.

Termination of Mother's Rights Appropriate Despite Treatment Plan's Failure to Include Chemical Dependency Evaluation — Ineffective Counsel: In a termination of parental rights proceeding, the District Court found that the mother did not complete the approved treatment plan and that she was unlikely to change within a reasonable time because of her drug problem. On appeal, the mother argued that while she and her attorney agreed to the treatment plan, it was deficient because it failed to include a chemical dependency evaluation. The mother also argued that her counsel was ineffective for failing to advocate for the inclusion of an evaluation in the plan. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court, holding that while the failure of the treatment plan to include substance abuse evaluation and treatment was notable, the best interests of the children supported termination of her rights, the difference was being offered help with the drug problem and being required to get help, and the failure to advocate for a treatment plan did not prejudice the mother. In re T.N.-S., 2015 MT 117, 379 Mont. 60, 347 P.3d 1263, followed in In re J.E.L., III, 2018 MT 50, 390 Mont. 379, 414 P.3d 279.

Determination That Amending Treatment Plan Not In Children's Best Interest — No Error: When the District Court considered the best interests of the children and concluded that the chances of reunification were unknown and that there was a "quantum of proof' that reunification would harm the children, not amending the treatment plan and proceeding with termination proceedings was appropriate. In re B.J.T.H., 2013 MT 366, 373 Mont. 85, 314 P.3d 911.

Failure to Comply With Treatment Plan Sufficient to Justify Termination of Parental Rights: The birth mother alleged on appeal that the state failed to prove at the termination hearing that her treatment plan was appropriate or, in the alternative, that the state failed to prove that she did not comply with her treatment plan. The Supreme Court held that a parent who does not object to a treatment plan waives the right to argue on appeal that the plan was not appropriate and that complete compliance with a treatment plan is required. In re H.R. and D.R., 2012 MT 290, 367 Mont. 338, 291 P.3d 583, following In re L.H., 2007 MT 70, 336 Mont. 405, 154 P.3d 622, and followed in In re D.S.B., 2013 MT 112, 370 Mont. 37, 300 P.3d 702.

District Court Not Limited to Consideration of Only Physical Neglect in Termination of Parental Rights: The final petition for termination of a mother's parental rights specifically cited physical neglect as its basis, and the mother contended that the District Court was thus barred from considering any evidence beyond physical neglect, such as psychological abuse, as demonstrated by the living conditions in her home. The District Court did not rule on the issue, but simply made the underlying findings necessary to terminate the mother's parental rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although it may have been better if the final petition had listed other grounds, it is proper for the state to consider other causes of abuse and neglect during proceedings because the purpose of the proceedings is to protect the child. The final petition also cited failure to comply with the treatment plan as another basis for termination. The treatment plan addressed the mother's psychological issues related to her parenting skills, so the mother was clearly on notice that psychological issues could be considered. Based on the record, parental rights were properly terminated because the mother failed to comply with the treatment plan, she was unable to properly and consistently parent her children by understanding and meeting each of their needs, her conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time relevant to the developmental needs of the children, and termination was in the best interests of the children. In re J.G., C.G., & M.G.-E., 2004 MT 104, 321 M 54, 89 P3d 11 (2004). See also In re T.D.H., 2015 MT 244, 380 Mont. 401, 356 P.3d 457.

Failure to Adjudicate Youth in Need of Care Precluding Termination of Parental Rights: A parent contended that parental rights were improperly terminated because the child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that such adjudication is a threshold requirement before a court may grant temporary legal custody, order a parental treatment plan, or terminate parental rights. The state argued that the child was found to be a youth in need of care during earlier guardianship proceedings in a different District Court. The Supreme Court cited In re F.M., 2002 MT 180, 311 M 35, 53 P3d 368 (2002), for the holding that evidence received at a hearing on a collateral matter, such as a guardianship proceeding, did not satisfy the adjudicatory requirements of 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437). Further, it was improper for the District Court to approve a treatment plan 10 months prior to proper adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care, in violation of 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) and this section (formerly numbered 41-3-420), which also rendered the requirements of 41-3-609 unsatisfied. Because the child was not properly adjudicated a youth in need of care, court approval of a treatment plan was improper and termination of parental rights was reversed. In re B.N.Y., 2003 MT 241, 317 M 291, 77 P3d 189 (2003).

Failure to Comply With Treatment Plan Requirement for Provision of Stable Home With Adequate Housing and Income — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: A mother relinquished custody of her three children after the District Court determined that the children were in need of care. When she became pregnant again, the state moved for emergency protective services for the fourth child upon the child's birth. When the state moved to terminate the father's parental rights based on failure to comply with two treatment plans, the father contended that because the child was removed from the parents at birth, the child was never abused or neglected and thus could not properly have been adjudicated as a youth in need of care. Because this section requires that an adequate treatment plan must identify the problems or conditions that resulted in abuse or neglect, the father asserted that the treatment plans were not adequate because the child was not abused or neglected. The Supreme Court disagreed. Because the mother as primary caregiver could not provide for the children, the onus was on the father to provide a safe environment for the new child. Both treatment plans required that the father provide a stable home for the child with adequate housing and income, but the father could provide no evidence of substantial compliance with either plan, being unable to secure either a residence or a job. Thus, the District Court did not err in determining that both elements of 41-3-609 were present and in terminating the father's parental rights. In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003).

No Requirement That Parent's Counsel Receive and Approve Treatment Plan Prior to Submission to Court: Under 41-3-609, a District Court may approve a treatment plan without a parent's signature, and under former 41-3-420 (now 41-3-443), a treatment plan must include the parent's signature, unless the plan is ordered by the District Court. Thus, there is no requirement for parental approval prior to submitting a treatment plan to the District Court, and by implication, there is no requirement that a parent's counsel receive and approve a proposed treatment plan prior to submission to the court. In re R.F., 2001 MT 199, 306 M 270, 32 P3d 1257 (2001). See also In re D.A. and M.A., 2013 MT 191, 371 Mont. 46, 305 P.3d 824.

1999 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 428 in (4) substituted "to file any necessary petition with the court" for "to petition the court" and after "present hearing" deleted former language that read: "for one of the following:

(i) termination of parental rights;

(ii) temporary legal custody, not to exceed 6 months; or

(iii) dismissal"; in (6) near beginning substituted "results in a finding" for "results in an order for a 6-month extension of temporary legal custody, upon the expiration of the temporary legal custody order and the filing of a petition by the department and if the court finds" and substituted "a subsequent petition may only be for" for "the court shall order"; inserted (6)(b) relating to appointment of a guardian pursuant to 41-3-421; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

(i) termination of parental rights;

(ii) temporary legal custody, not to exceed 6 months; or

(iii) dismissal"; in (5) after "discretion" inserted "the court may" and after "child" inserted "that does not conflict with the provisions in subsection (6) and"; in (6) substituted "results in a finding" for "results in an order for a 6-month extension of temporary legal custody, upon the expiration of the temporary legal custody order and the filing of a petition by the department and if the court finds" and at end after "child" substituted "any subsequent petition filed must be one of the following" for "the court shall order"; at end of (6)(c) inserted "which is reflected in specific findings by the court"; inserted (6)(c)(i) through (6)(c)(iv) allowing long-term custody of child if child has emotional or mental handicap or is at least 16, child's parent is incarcerated, or child is in group of siblings; in (6)(c)(v) inserted "the child is at least 12 years of age and meets the following criteria"; deleted former (5)(b)(iii) that read: "(iii) the child has reached 12 years of age"; in (7) after "parents" deleted "those to whom legal custody has been transferred"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Case Notes

Grant of Long-Term Custody Proper: A father appealed the District Court's order granting the Department of Public Health and Human Services long-term custody of his son, arguing that the Department failed to make reasonable efforts to reunify the father with his son and that the District Court erred by not specifically finding that the father was unfit before determining that the son's best interests were served by living with his great-aunt. The Supreme Court affirmed, noting that the requirements of 41-3-445(8)(e)(v) were met and that the Department's efforts to determine whether placing the son with the father was viable, including requesting that Texas officials conduct a home study and considering the results of a private home study commissioned by the father, constituted reasonable efforts. The court also held that the District Court was not required to explicitly find that the father was unfit before it could determine that reunification of the son with the father would be contrary to the son's best interests. Dismissal of Parenting Action Following Placement of Children Under Permanency Plan — Appeal Moot: While a parenting action was pending in Flathead County, a District Court in Missoula County approved a permanency plan that placed the children in California with the mother. The father did not appeal the placement order. The Flathead County action was subsequently dismissed, and the father appealed. The Supreme Court held that the Flathead County order was moot because the state no longer possessed authority over the custody and placement of the children, and in the absence of an ongoing, concrete controversy, effective relief could not be granted. The appeal was dismissed. In re J.A.S. & E.R.S., 2008 MT 269, 345 M 189, 190 P3d 299 (2008).

Failure to Complete Treatment Plan and Lack of Evidence That Conduct Likely to Change in Reasonable Time — Children in Foster Care for 17 of 22 Months — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: When D.A. was born in 2003, he and both parents tested positive for methamphetamine, and the state immediately obtained temporary custody of D.A. The case was dismissed 10 months later. When M.A. was born in 2005, the mother again tested positive for methamphetamine, and the state removed both children and placed them in foster care. The parents completed treatment plans and the children were returned to their care. About 2 months later, the parents were arrested on drug-related charges and the children were again removed, placed in foster care, and adjudicated youths in need of care. The parents agreed to another treatment plan, which included addressing and conquering their drug addictions and maintaining visitation with their children, increasing visitation when appropriate, and increasing parenting responsibilities until they were reunited with their children. However, the parents never completed the treatment plan, and their visitation actually decreased because of the children's negative reactions to the visits. Rather than adopt the state's proposed permanency plan calling for reunification, the District Court ordered the state to take steps to permanently place the children. Subsequently, after the children had been in foster care for 17 of the previous 22 months, the state moved to terminate the parents' rights. At the hearing, witnesses testified that it would take another year to know if reunification would be possible. In the interests of the children, the District Court terminated the parents' rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court correctly held that the parents had not completed their treatment plan and that as a matter of fact the conditions rendering the parents unfit were unlikely to change in a reasonable time, based on their past drug use and the effect their use had on their ability to care for their children. Nor was it error for the court to consider the presumption that, because the children had been in foster care for 17 months, termination of parental rights was in the children's best interests. Additionally, there was sufficient evidence for the court to conclude that the state's permanency plan was not in the children's best interests, and having rejected the plan, the court had the authority to order the state to take specific steps to effectuate an alternate plan, which could include adoption of the children. Entering the order following the permanency hearing to advance the children's best interests did not constitute plain error or violate the parents' due process rights, and termination of parental rights was not plain error or an abuse of discretion. In re Custody & Parental Rights of D.A. & M.A., 2008 MT 247, 344 M 513, 189 P3d 631 (2008), followed in In re T.N.-S., 2015 MT 117, 379 Mont. 60, 347 P.3d 1263.

Parents' Due Process Rights Not Violated by Failure to Hold Permanency Plan Hearing When Objective of Plan Achieved: Three times the state attempted to preserve and reunite the parents with their children through the establishment of treatment plans and by emphasizing to the parents the importance of permanent placement of the children in a safe and secure home, but each time the parents failed to comply with the treatment plans and the children were returned to state custody. The District Court, without holding a permanency plan hearing, eventually terminated the parents' rights. On appeal, the parents claimed that their due process rights were violated by the failure of the court to hold a permanency plan hearing. The Supreme Court disagreed. Although a permanency plan hearing per se was never held, the purposes served by a hearing were nevertheless met. The District Court had repeatedly referenced permanency for the children and sought to ensure that the parents understood that the children could not be allowed to languish in the system. This is typical of the discussion that would normally occur at a permanency plan hearing, and had a hearing been held, it would undoubtedly have formalized the state's goal of reunifying the parents and children, which had been attempted repeatedly. Thus, failure to hold a permanency plan hearing was not fundamentally unfair and did not violate the parents' due process rights. In re B.B. & J.B., 2006 MT 66, 331 M 407, 133 P3d 215 (2006), following In re A.R., 2004 MT 22, 319 M 340, 83 P3d 1287 (2004).

Res Judicata and Collateral Estoppel — Inapplicable Absent Final Judgment: In In re B.N.Y., 2003 MT 241, 317 M 291, 77 P3d 189 (2003), the Supreme Court held that a mother's due process rights were violated in parental rights termination proceedings. Almost immediately after the 2003 decision, the state began new proceedings. The mother asserted that res judicata and collateral estoppel barred the new action. The District Court disagreed, and the mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Both res judicata and collateral estoppel require a final judgment in an initial action before they preclude a similar future action. The initial order terminating the mother's parental rights did not constitute a final judgment as a result of In re B.N.Y. The 2003 decision had no preclusive effect in the current action, and the mother's res judicata and collateral estoppel arguments failed. In re B.N.Y., 2006 MT 34, 331 M 145, 130 P3d 594 (2006). See also Baltrusch v. Baltrusch, 2006 MT 51, 331 M 281, 130 P3d 1267 (2006), and In re M.N., J.N., Jr., & R.N., 2011 MT 245, 362 Mont. 186, 261 P.3d 1047.

No Due Process Violations in Parental Rights Termination Proceeding — Statutory Mandates Addressed: A mother asserted that her due process rights were violated in a parental rights termination proceeding because: (1) the state failed to make reasonable efforts to reunify mother and child as required in 41-3-423; (2) the District Court, in effect, terminated her right while purporting only to grant a planned permanent living arrangement and permanent care and control of the child to the state in violation of 41-3-609; (3) the state failed to petition the District Court for termination in a timely fashion in violation of 41-3-604; and (4) the District Court failed to hold a permanency plan hearing in a timely manner in violation of this section. The Supreme Court considered each claim and affirmed. Although reunification efforts failed, the state's efforts were reasonable and in compliance with the governing statutes. The mother's parental rights were severely limited, but not actually terminated, so her argument regarding improper termination procedures failed. The state does not have to petition to terminate parental rights if a compelling reason has been documented for determining that filing a petition would not be in the child's best interests. In this case, there was such a compelling reason—namely, that the state had tried to reunify mother and child for years and did not seek termination casually. The tardy permanency hearing argument also failed in light of the state's diligent, although unsuccessful, efforts to create a permanent and stable environment for the child in an effort to ensure that the child did not languish in foster care. In re B.N.Y., 2006 MT 34, 331 M 145, 130 P3d 594 (2006). See also In re R.T.L.P., 238 M 384, 777 P2d 892 (1989), and In re A.R., 2004 MT 22, 319 M 340, 83 P3d 1287 (2004).

Failure to Hold Parental Permanency Plan Hearing Within Statutory Time Not Violative of Due Process: A mother whose parental rights were terminated contended that the failure to hold a permanency hearing within the time enumerated in this section, the length of the proceeding, and the denial of her request to allow her counselor to videotape her visits with her children violated her due process rights. The Supreme Court examined the case for fundamental fairness and affirmed. Under this section, a permanency hearing is not required if a child has been returned to a biological parent, and in this case, the children were returned to the custody of their biological father. The court did not condone the failure to hold a timely hearing as required, but noted that in this case, there was an ongoing attempt to reunify the children with one of the parents, which was the goal of the permanency plan, so the goal was accomplished without a hearing. As to the issue of length of proceedings, the court noted that despite the failure of the mother to show progress toward reunification goals, after 15 months, the Department was still actively working with her to accomplish the goal and did not seek termination until more than 20 months after the children were removed from the home, so the length of time did not prejudice the mother's rights. Moreover, the request for presence of the mother's counselor during visits was never actually denied by the District Court because the mother had no visitation rights at the time of the request that could have been denied. In re A.R. & S.A.R., 2004 MT 22, 319 M 340, 83 P3d 1287 (2004).

No Denial of Fair Procedures in Grant of Long-Term Custody of Child to State — Failure of Parent to Properly Object to Procedures at Hearing: Long-term custody of a child was granted to the state. The father appealed on grounds that he was denied fundamentally fair procedures in the custody proceedings, contending that: (1) the District Court failed to hold a permanency hearing within the statutory deadline; (2) the state failed to submit the statutorily required prehearing report to the District Court; (3) the state failed to develop a plan with any elements of permanency; (4) the state tried to terminate his visitation rights without satisfying the requisite statutory criteria and burden of proof; and (5) the District Court erroneously granted the state a second chance to prove its case. The Supreme Court considered each claim in turn, and affirmed. Although the permanency hearing occurred after the statutory deadline in this section (formerly numbered 41-3-412), the father did not raise the issue in District Court or advise the District Court of the appropriate remedy as required, and raising the issue in a proposed conclusion of law did not constitute a proper objection. The father also neglected to object to the absence of a prehearing report either at the hearing or by pretrial motion, so those issues were not properly preserved for appeal. The contention that the state failed to develop a plan with any elements of permanency was belied by evidence showing that the child had made reasonable progress toward a settled placement. The question of whether there was any merit to the state's attempt to terminate visitation was moot because the District Court reinstated visitation at the permanency hearing. Moreover, disallowing the state a second opportunity to present its case would have required that the District Court overlook the best interests of the child by ignoring substantial evidence that the child continued to suffer both emotionally and mentally. It was the father who objected to the form of the evidence as first offered, and because the evidence was originally offered in a form authorized by statute, the child's best interests were paramount, and the father could not demonstrate prejudice in the District Court's granting of another hearing to hear the evidence. In re M.W. & L.W., 2002 MT 126, 310 M 103, 49 P3d 31 (2002). See also In re M.C., 2017 MT 252, 389 Mont. 78, 403 P.3d 1266, holding that a mother's failure to raise the failure of the Department of Health and Human Services to accommodate her reading disability first in District Court barred her claim on appeal.

Findings Sufficient to Warrant Assignment to Long-Term Custody: The state petitioned to terminate the mother's parental rights or, alternatively, to grant long-term custody to the state with the right to assign guardianship to the children's grandmother. The District Court granted the latter. The mother did not contend that the court's findings were erroneous, but did argue that the court erred because its findings were not sufficiently specific to justify long-term custody to the state. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that if the state follows fundamentally fair procedures, a parent may be divested of custody. Here, the District Court found that: (1) the children were youths in need of care; (2) the state had developed treatment plans for the mother, but the plans had not been followed; (3) the mother was warned that the last treatment plan was her final chance; (4) the mother had been given many opportunities to straighten out and retain custody of her children, but did not do so; (5) continuation of the parent-child legal relationship would likely result in continued abuse or neglect if the children were returned to the mother; (6) the mother's conduct and condition rendered her unfit, unable, and unwilling to give her children adequate parental care; (7) it would be in the children's best interest if they were allowed to visit with their mother as directed by the state, even if she was not their custodian; (8) since the children had been living with their grandmother, they had improved in school and become more socially involved; and (9) the grandmother was willing to act as the children's guardian. These findings were sufficiently specific to support the District Court's award of long-term custody to the children's grandmother, and that award was affirmed. In re Custody & Parental Rights of T.Z. & J.Z., 2000 MT 205, 300 M 522, 6 P3d 960, 57 St. Rep. 806 (2000).

Petition for Long-Term Custody Included With Petition for Termination of Parental Rights — No Requirement for Filing Subsequent to Hearing: The state petitioned to terminate the mother's parental rights or, alternatively, to grant long-term custody to the state with the right to assign guardianship to the children's grandmother. Because the District Court combined the permanency hearing with the termination hearing, the petition for long-term legal custody was not filed subsequent to the hearing, which the mother contended violated 41-3-412 (renumbered 41-3-445) and erroneously denied her sufficient notice. However, 41-3-412 (renumbered 41-3-445) does not require that a petition for long-term custody be filed subsequent to a hearing. That petition may be filed at the same time as a petition to terminate parental rights, and this alternative petition provides a parent with adequate notice of issues to be raised at the hearing.

Thus, the court did not err in awarding long-term custody without requiring a separate petition limited to that issue. In re Custody & Parental Rights of T.Z. & J.Z., 2000 MT 205, 300 M 522, 6 P3d 960, 57 St. Rep. 806 (2000).

Part Case Notes

Parental Rights Terminated — Objection to Sufficiency of Reasonable Efforts Prior to Termination Not Necessary for Preservation of Issue: A father whose parental rights were terminated argued on appeal that the Department of Health and Human Services did not make reasonable efforts to reunite him with his children. The Department argued that the father waived his right to appeal the Department's efforts because he did not challenge the Department's efforts prior to the termination hearing. The Supreme Court affirmed the termination, noting that the father made almost no progress on his treatment plan, consistently refused to work with the Department, did not attend anger management, and failed to appear for 77 requested drug tests. But regarding the Department's waiver argument, the court stated that it knew of nothing in statute or common law that would require a parent to object to the sufficiency of the Department's reasonable efforts for purposes of termination prior to the termination hearing in order to preserve the issue for appeal. In re C.M.G., 2020 MT 15, 398 Mont. 369, 456 P.3d 1017.

Children With Same Parents — Evidence on One Child's Status as Non-ICWA Presumptive for Other Child: A mother's two children were removed, and later the Department of Public Health and Human Services filed a petition to terminate her parental rights. At the initial removal hearing, the mother informed the District Court that the children may be Indian children as defined by the federal Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA). Later, at the termination hearing, the Department provided a letter from the Crow Tribe stating that one of the children was not enrolled or enrollable into the tribe. After the District Court terminated the mother's rights based on non-ICWA standards of proof, she appealed, arguing that the District Court had not made a finding about her other child's status as an Indian child. The District Court had reasoned that both children had the same mother and same father and therefore if one child was not an Indian child, neither was the other. The Supreme Court affirmed the termination, ruling that the District Court's lack of a finding was harmless error. In re S.R., 2019 MT 47, 394 Mont. 362, 436 P.3d 696.

Termination of Parental Rights Without Conclusive Tribal Determination of Tribal Membership Status and Enrollment Eligibility — Abuse of Discretion: In a termination proceeding, there was reason to believe that the deceased father may have been a member of the Blackfeet Tribe. A Children and Family Services employee testified that a representative of the Blackfeet Tribe had orally expressed to him that the two children were not enrolled or eligible for enrollment. Subsequently, the case proceeded as though the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) did not apply, and the mother's parental rights were terminated. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, finding that the District Court had erred by treating the matter as a non-ICWA case despite the lack of documentation or testimony of an authorized tribal representative. The court remanded for an appropriate determination of tribal membership status and eligibility and, if necessary, further proceedings to meet the evidentiary burdens of ICWA. In re D.E., 2018 MT 196, 392 Mont. 297, 423 P.3d 586.

Compliance With Statutory Procedures — Fundamental Fairness Satisfied: A mother appealed a District Court order terminating her parental rights. She argued that the adjudication proceedings had not been long enough to protect her right to fundamentally fair procedures. The Supreme Court upheld the District Court, finding that a court can terminate a person's parental rights as long as the child is an adjudicated youth in need of care, an appropriate and approved treatment plan was unsuccessful or not complied with by the parent, and the court makes a finding that the parent is unlikely to become fit to parent within a reasonable time. In re G.W., 2018 MT 192, 392 Mont. 269, 423 P.3d 575.

Termination of Parental Rights to Indian Children — Tribal Court to Affirmatively Decline Case Prior to State Court Proceedings — Jurisdiction Transfer Hearing Required Prior to Ruling on Jurisdictional Transfer of Children: The District Court erred in terminating the parental rights of a mother of four Indian children without first holding a jurisdiction transfer hearing under the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) after the mother requested the matter be transferred to tribal court at the outset of the proceedings. The Supreme Court ruled that a tribal court, and not the tribe, must affirmatively decline to accept a case before a state court can proceed with termination of parental rights to Indian children. A District Court must hold a jurisdiction transfer hearing before it grants or denies a request for a jurisdictional transfer of Indian children to tribal custody. In re J.W.C., L.W.C., K.W.C., and C.W.C., 2011 MT 312, 363 Mont. 85, 265 P.3d 1265.

Sufficient Evidence That ICWA Standards Met in Terminating Parental Rights — Termination Affirmed Absent Abuse of Discretion: An Indian father contended that the state did not present sufficient evidence under the federal Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA) to warrant termination of his parental rights. The Supreme Court determined that: (1) there was sufficient evidence that continued custody of the children was likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the children; (2) the evidence was supported by testimony from qualified experts; (3) active but unsuccessful efforts had been made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs to prevent the breakup of the Indian family; and (4) the children had lived in foster care a sufficient time to create the presumption under 41-3-604 that the children's best interests would be served by terminating parental rights. The ICWA requirements having been followed, parental rights were properly terminated. In re S.R., R.R., & G.R. Jr., 2004 MT 227, 322 M 424, 97 P3d 559 (2004). See also In re S.B., 2019 MT 279, 398 Mont. 27, 459 P.3d 214.

Federal Indian Child Welfare Act — Temporary Custody Not in Compliance With Act — Otherwise Valid Parental Termination Not Invalidated: Child of Indian parents was placed in the temporary custody of the state in proceedings that may not have complied with the federal Indian Child Welfare Act (25 U.S.C. § 1901, et seq.). Later, in proceedings that complied with the Act and before a different judge with different witnesses, the parents' rights were terminated and permanent custody was granted the state. The Supreme Court held that any failure to comply with the Act in the temporary proceedings would not invalidate the later termination because the proceedings are separate actions involving separate petitions and statutory guidelines. In re M.E.M., 209 M 192, 679 P2d 1241, 41 St. Rep. 636 (1984). See also In re S.P., 241 M 190, 786 P2d 642, 47 St. Rep. 190 (1990).

Determination of Neglect at Custody Hearing Not Sufficient: After the death of the custodial mother, the maternal grandmother took the children into her home. The natural father petitioned to have the children restored to his custody. The grandmother requested custody and filed a petition for adoption. In a proceeding pursuant to 40-4-221, the grandmother was granted custody because the father had failed to make child support payments for more than a year and had generally neglected the children. The trial court properly dismissed the grandmother's petition for adoption for lack of jurisdiction. The determination of neglect needed to excuse the need for the father's consent to adoption under 40-8-111 (now repealed) must be made in a separate proceeding pursuant to Title 41, ch. 3, part 6. Case Notes

Abandonment Held to Constitute Abuse or Neglect: The father appealed the termination of his parental rights, arguing that the trial court's finding of abandonment did not constitute a finding of abuse or neglect required by statute to terminate parental rights. The Supreme Court ruled that in the past, it had implicitly upheld terminations on the basis of abandonment and that it was clarifying its earlier rulings by holding that abandonment is "harm to a child's welfare" and that "harm to a child's welfare" is a statutory ground for a finding of "child abuse or neglect" upon which a termination of parental rights may be founded. In re M.J.W., 1998 MT 142, 289 M 232, 961 P2d 105, 55 St. Rep. 563 (1998), followed in In re T.H. & C.D.F., 2005 MT 237, 328 M 428, 121 P3d 541 (2005).

Finding of Abuse, Neglect, or Dependency Necessary Before Consideration of Best Interests of the Child: M.G.M. was born out of wedlock and had little contact with her natural father until the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) placed M.G.M. in a foster home and terminated her mother's parental rights. The Department then sought to terminate the father's parental rights. To terminate his parental rights, the court must first find that the child is abused, neglected, or dependent (see 1995 amendment). Only when such a finding has been made can the court apply the best interests of the child test. In re M.G.M., 201 M 400, 654 P2d 994, 39 St. Rep. 2191 (1982).

District Court's Termination of Parental Rights Not Abuse of Discretion — Mother's Failure to Make Progress in Treatment Plan and Unwillingness to Engage Department's Efforts to Assist — Conduct or Condition Unlikely to Change Within Reasonable Time. In re A.M.G., 2022 MT 175, 410 Mont. 25, 517 P.3d 149.

Termination of Parental Rights in Child's Best Interests Rather Than Guardianship: The District Court terminated the parental rights of a mother who persisted in methamphetamine use while her child was placed with the child's grandmother. The parties did not dispute the presumption that termination is in the child's best interests if the child has been in an out-of-home placement for 15 out of the most recent 22 months. The District Court found that the mother did not overcome the presumption. Some parties argued for guardianship rather than termination, but the District Court guardianship was sought for the mother's needs, not for the child's. On appeal, the Supreme Court reviewed for abuse of discretion and affirmed, finding that the District Court had substantial credible evidence that it did not misapprehend to support its determination that it was in the child's best interests to terminate the mother's parental rights. In re A.B., 2020 MT 64, 399 Mont. 219, 460 P.3d 405.

Termination of Parental Rights After Thirty Months — Parent's Relapse, Improvement, and Subsequent Relapse — Reasonableness of Treatment Plan Challenged: The father had his children removed after the Department of Public Health and Human Services found that he used drugs, failed to adequately supervise his children, kept an unsanitary home, and did not ensure that his children received medical care. The District Court granted a petition for emergency protective services and the father stipulated to a treatment plan. Over the course of the proceeding, the father relapsed, improved for a time, relapsed again, and finally showed signs of improvement. Ultimately, the District Court terminated the father's parental rights, finding that the children could not wait any longer for the father to complete his treatment plan. On appeal, the father argued that the treatment plan was not appropriate because it did not provide him with a reasonable amount of time to complete certain tasks and that it erred in determining that he was unfit and not likely to change within a reasonable amount of time. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the father failed to completely comply with his treatment plan, despite coming close, and that the children spending 30 consecutive months in kinship foster care required termination of the father's rights. In re X.B., 2018 MT 153, 392 Mont. 15, 420 P.3d 538.

Placement with Family Considered Foster Care — Statutory Presumption Applicable: The Department of Public Health and Human Services removed the mother's two children from her care. The mother stipulated to a treatment plan and to having the District Court adjudicate her children as youths in need of care. The children were placed with family members. The District Court eventually terminated the mother's parental rights by applying the statutory presumption in 41-3-604. On appeal, the mother argued that the District Court erred in considering time the children spent with family as foster care. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the statutory presumption applied to care provided by family members. In re C.W.E., 2016 MT 2, 382 Mont. 65, 364 P.3d 1238.

No Abuse of Discretion in Terminating Parental Rights When Conditions Rendering Mother Unfit to Parent Unlikely to Change Within Reasonable Time: A mother's failure to object to a treatment plan prevented her from challenging it on appeal. In this case, because the children were adjudicated youths in need of care, the mother's treatment plan was unsuccessful, and clear and convincing evidence was present that the condition rendering the mother unfit to parent was unlikely to change, the court was within its discretion to terminate parental rights. In re C.M., 2015 MT 292, 381 Mont. 230, 359 P.3d 1081.

Termination of Mother's Rights Appropriate Despite Treatment Plan's Failure to Include Chemical Dependency Evaluation — Ineffective Counsel: In a termination of parental rights proceeding, the District Court found that the mother did not complete the approved treatment plan and that she was unlikely to change within a reasonable time because of her drug problem. On appeal, the mother argued that while she and her attorney agreed to the treatment plan, it was deficient because it failed to include a chemical dependency evaluation. The mother also argued that her counsel was ineffective for failing to advocate for the inclusion of an evaluation in the plan. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court, holding that while the failure of the treatment plan to include substance abuse evaluation and treatment was notable, the best interests of the children supported termination of her rights, the difference was being offered help with the drug problem and being required to get help, and the failure to advocate for a treatment plan did not prejudice the mother. In re T.N.-S., 2015 MT 117, 379 Mont. 60, 347 P.3d 1263, followed in In re J.E.L., III, 2018 MT 50, 390 Mont. 379, 414 P.3d 279.

Termination of Parental Rights — Transfer to Tribal Court Denied: The birth mother of a minor considered an Indian child under the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) forfeited parental care, was arrested for DUI, failed in attempts to reunite with the child, and subsequently failed to follow the District Court's treatment plan. Similarly, the father denied paternity, refused to voluntarily undergo paternity tests, and exhibited no interest in caring for the child. The state placed the child in an ICWA-qualified foster home. Eighteen months after the foster care placement, the tribe moved to transfer to tribal court, which was denied by the District Court. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion because ICWA did not require transfer to tribal court and that 41-3-604 and 41-3-609 were satisfied because the mother failed to comply with her parenting plan. In re S.B.C., 2014 MT 345, 377 Mont. 400, 340 P.3d 534.

Father's Conduct Unlikely to Change Within a Reasonable Time — Reliance on Statutory Presumption Affirmed: In terminating a father's parental rights, the District Court correctly relied on the statutory presumption that the best interests of the children were unlikely to change since both children had been under the care of their grandmother pursuant to a foster care agreement with the Department of Public Health and Human Services for 15 months of the most recent 22 months. The District Court's termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re B.M. and P.M., 2010 MT 114, 356 Mont. 327, 233 P.3d 338.

Sufficient Evidence That Children in Need of Care — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: In 2004, a mother left her two children with a 16-year-old babysitter and did not return for over 24 hours. The children were placed in temporary legal custody with the state, where they remained thereafter. The state attempted to work on reunifying the family, but the mother repeatedly failed to comply with treatment plans, continued her heavy drinking, was arrested several times, and spent periods incarcerated. The children were tribal members, and the state gave proper tribal notification and had an Indian Child Welfare Act expert testify on several occasions that continued parental custody was likely to result in serious emotional or physical harm to the children and that there were no family members available to take the children. The children were adjudicated youth in need of care, and the state eventually sought to terminate the mother's parental rights in 2008. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The children had been in foster care for over 4 years, exceeding the threshold for triggering the presumption that termination was in the children's best interests. A reasonable person could conclude, as did the District Court, that the children were in need of care and that the mother's parental rights should be terminated. Substantial evidence showed that the mother: (1) had been charged with four separate criminal offenses and was the subject of a bench warrant; (2) entered an intensive outpatient drug treatment program but stopped after five sessions, indicating a high potential for substance abuse that could only be controlled by incarceration or inpatient treatment; (3) did not complete any parts of the court-approved treatment plan; (4) missed a number of scheduled visits with the children; (5) failed to address her mental health issues; (6) failed to obtain adequate housing; (7) failed to make reunification with the children a priority; and (8) was unlikely to change her pattern of substance abuse and her unstable lifestyle. In re T.W.F & A.R.M., 2009 MT 207, 351 M 233, 210 P3d 174 (2009).

Sufficient Evidence to Terminate Rights of Incarcerated Parent: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parental rights of an incarcerated parent after citing: (1) the fact that the child would have been in foster placement for more than 15 of the most recent months before the parent was eligible for parole, thus satisfying the presumption in 41-3-604(1); (2) the parent's criminal history, including seven prior felonies and four sentence revocations; (3) the parent's history of voluntary underemployment, despite the parent's asserted wish to support the child; (4) the parent's failure to establish a substantial relationship with the child through visits or regular contact; (5) the failure of the parent to manifest an ability to assume legal and physical custody because of incarceration; (6) the child's need for immediate permanent placement in order to meet the child's developmental, cognitive, and psychological stability needs; and (7) the inability of the parent to provide for immediate placement because of incarceration. The parent appealed on grounds that the District Court improperly relied on the presumption in 41-3-604(1). The Supreme Court agreed that the presumption was not satisfied because the child had not been in foster care for the requisite amount of time. However, the court noted that parental rights may properly be terminated if the District Court correctly relies on any one basis set out in 41-3-609. In this case, the District Court correctly relied on several bases other than the statutory presumption and thus did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parent's rights. In re M.P., 2008 MT 39, 341 M 333, 177 P3d 495 (2008).

Failure to Apply Proper Statutory Criteria in Termination Proceedings — Reversible Error: Instead of applying the statutory criteria in 41-3-609 when considering whether to terminate a mother's parental rights, the District Court relied on the legal presumption in this section that because the children had been in foster care for 15 of the prior 22 months, termination was appropriate. The Supreme Court reversed. A parent's right to the care and custody of a child is a fundamental liberty interest that must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures. The legal presumption in this section alone is not a sufficient basis to terminate parental rights and neither eliminates the substantive requirements in 41-3-609 nor diminishes the clear and convincing burden of proof on the party seeking to terminate parental rights. By relying on the presumption in this section, the District Court impermissibly shifted the burden of proof to the mother by concluding that there was insufficient evidence to rebut the presumption. It was not the mother's duty to rebut the presumption, but rather the state's burden to show that the mother failed to complete a treatment plan and that the mother's conduct or condition was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Because the District Court applied the wrong statutory standards, the order terminating parental rights was reversed and the case was remanded for application of the proper statutory criteria. In re D.B. & D.B., 2007 MT 246, 339 M 240, 168 P3d 691 (2007), distinguished on other grounds by In re C.B., 2014 MT 4, 373 Mont. 204, 316 P.3d 177.

Findings Based on More Than Prior Conviction for Crime Against Child — Sufficient Findings to Substantiate Termination of Parental Rights: A father asserted that the District Court lacked sufficient evidence to terminate his parental rights because the court relied on a prior crime committed in Texas that, if committed in Montana, would have been only a misdemeanor. The Supreme Court found that substantial evidence existed to support termination. In addition to the prior sexual crime against a child that was an aggravating circumstance under Montana law, the District Court also found that the father had no significant contact with his children for more than 3 years and failed to complete a treatment plan, that the children had been in foster care for 28 months prior to the termination hearing, and that there was evidence that one of the children claimed that the father sexually abused her. Termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re. M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006).

Parent's Acquiescence in Adjudicatory Proceedings — Finding That Child Is Youth in Need of Care Based on Parent's Admissions — Stipulation Not Required: A mother contested termination of her parental rights on grounds that her child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The mother was incarcerated at the time of the hearing and contended that although she agreed to a treatment plan, she never admitted that the child met the definition of a youth in need of care or stipulated that the child was in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that the trial court should have specifically inquired of the mother or her counsel whether the mother stipulated that the child was a youth in need of care, but it was not error for the District Court to make that finding based on the mother's own admissions that she was addicted to methamphetamine and needed treatment and that her addiction impacted the child unfairly. The mother was not placed at an unfair disadvantage during the termination proceedings and was represented by counsel at all stages. She never questioned the regularity of the proceedings until appeal. The court held that because 35 months had passed between the adjudicatory hearing and the notice of appeal, it would not be in the child's best interests to prolong the matter, particularly when much of the delay was caused by the mother's repeated relapses and her failure to put the child's interests above her desire to indulge her addiction. The adjudication was proper and did not prejudice the mother, and the District Court was affirmed. In re A.S., 2006 MT 281, 334 M 280, 146 P3d 778 (2006).

Parent's Continued Drug Use Unlikely to Change — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: Facts presented at the termination hearing showed that although the mother successfully completed inpatient drug treatment, maintained sobriety for a time, and was moving toward successful completion of her treatment plan, she relapsed and began using methamphetamine again, and the use continued until the termination hearing. Additionally, she had numerous probation violations, the violations were increasing, she failed to maintain employment, and she had no plan for supporting herself or her child. The child had also been in foster care for more than 17 months, but rather than make every effort to maintain her sobriety so that she could parent her child, the mother's relapses continued. The District Court concluded that despite all the available resources, the mother's addiction was stronger than her desire to remain sober and parent her child and that the condition or conduct rendering the mother unfit to parent was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The mother's parental rights were properly terminated. In re A.S., 2006 MT 281, 334 M 280, 146 P3d 778 (2006).

Termination of Parental Rights of Father Incarcerated for Failure to Pay Child Support Affirmed: A father was incarcerated for failure to pay child support for more than 10 years, resulting in his inability to be available for his child, who had been in foster care for more than 56 consecutive months at the time of hearing. The father's sentence was to run for about 3 additional years. The District Court properly concluded that the child's paramount best interests and needs were best served by continued stable foster care placement and that there was clear and convincing evidence to support termination of the father's parental rights. In re A.N.W., 2006 MT 42, 331 M 208, 130 P3d 619 (2006).

No Due Process Violations in Parental Rights Termination Proceeding — Statutory Mandates Addressed: A mother asserted that her due process rights were violated in a parental rights termination proceeding because: (1) the state failed to make reasonable efforts to reunify mother and child as required in 41-3-423; (2) the District Court, in effect, terminated her right while purporting only to grant a planned permanent living arrangement and permanent care and control of the child to the state in violation of 41-3-609; (3) the state failed to petition the District Court for termination in a timely fashion in violation of this section; and (4) the District Court failed to hold a permanency plan hearing in a timely manner in violation of 41-3-445. The Supreme Court considered each claim and affirmed. Although reunification efforts failed, the state's efforts were reasonable and in compliance with the governing statutes. The mother's parental rights were severely limited, but not actually terminated, so her argument regarding improper termination procedures failed. The state does not have to petition to terminate parental rights if a compelling reason has been documented for determining that filing a petition would not be in the child's best interests. In this case, there was such a compelling reason—namely, that the state had tried to reunify mother and child for years and did not seek termination casually. The tardy permanency hearing argument also failed in light of the state's diligent, although unsuccessful, efforts to create a permanent and stable environment for the child in an effort to ensure that the child did not languish in foster care. In re B.N.Y., 2006 MT 34, 331 M 145, 130 P3d 594 (2006). See also In re R.T.L.P., 238 M 384, 777 P2d 892 (1989), and In re A.R., 2004 MT 22, 319 M 340, 83 P3d 1287 (2004).

Sufficient Evidence That ICWA Standards Met in Terminating Parental Rights — Termination Affirmed Absent Abuse of Discretion: An Indian father contended that the state did not present sufficient evidence under the federal Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA) to warrant termination of his parental rights. The Supreme Court determined that: (1) there was sufficient evidence that continued custody of the children was likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the children; (2) the evidence was supported by testimony from qualified experts; (3) active but unsuccessful efforts had been made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs to prevent the breakup of the Indian family; and (4) the children had lived in foster care a sufficient time to create the presumption under this section that the children's best interests would be served by terminating parental rights. The ICWA requirements having been followed, parental rights were properly terminated. In re S.R., R.R., & G.R. Jr., 2004 MT 227, 322 M 424, 97 P3d 559 (2004). See also In re S.B., 2019 MT 279, 398 Mont. 27, 459 P.3d 214.

Children in Foster Care for Years Coupled With Failure to Comply With Treatment Plan — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: At least three experts testified that the mother failed to comply with a treatment plan. This fact, coupled with the fact that the children were adjudicated youths in need of care and had been in foster care for more than 15 of the most recent 22 months, was sufficient to terminate the mother's parental rights. In re K.S., D.S., & C.S., 2003 MT 212, 317 M 88, 75 P3d 325 (2003).

Recognition of Statutory Presumption Coupled With Parental Rights Termination Criteria — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: A mother contended that the District Court erred in terminating her parental rights by inappropriately relying on the statutory presumption in this section, contrary to the termination criteria in 41-3-609. The children had been in foster care for more than 15 of the most recent 22 months, so the presumption in this section applied, but the presumption neither eliminates the substantive requirements of 41-3-609 nor diminishes the clear and convincing burden of proof on the party seeking to terminate parental rights. However, in this case, the District Court both acknowledged the statutory presumption and considered the termination criteria, which included evidence that the mother had not successfully completed her treatment program and had two significantly handicapping conditions (marginal general aptitude and a personality disorder) that rendered her unfit to parent and that would not change within the foreseeable future. Thus, the mother's parental rights were properly terminated. In re B.H. & D.H., 2001 MT 288, 307 M 412, 37 P3d 736 (2001).

Child in Foster Care for Nineteen Continuous Months — Termination of Parental Rights Presumed to Be in Child's Best Interests: If a child has been in foster care for 15 of the most recent 22 months, the best interests of the child are presumed to be served by the termination of parental rights, pursuant to this section. Here, after the children were placed with their foster parents, they lived in the foster home for 19 continuous months as of the hearing to terminate parental rights. The District Court did not err in applying the presumption in this section in terminating parental rights. In re E.K., C.K., & J.E., 2001 MT 279, 307 M 328, 37 P3d 690 (2001).

Case Notes

Improper Termination of Parental Rights by Default Judgment — Abuse of Discretion — Action to Terminate Other Parent's Rights Inappropriate: A mother filed a petition to terminate the parental rights of her infant daughter's father, who was incarcerated at the time. Despite the father's efforts to respond timely, the District Court, without a hearing, evidence, or findings, entered default judgment. The father appealed the termination to the Supreme Court, which reversed, concluding that parental rights cannot be terminated pursuant to a default judgment. The Supreme Court also emphasized that a natural parent cannot petition to terminate the parental rights of the other natural parent except in the case of a stepparent adoption. In re K.J.B., 2014 MT 327, 377 Mont. 270, 339 P.3d 824, distinguished in In re A.M.S., 2016 MT 22, 382 Mont. 145, 364 P.3d 1261.

Statute Providing No Right to Jury Trial in Parental Rights Termination Cases Not Unconstitutional: The father argued that the language in this section providing that there is no right to a jury trial in a proceeding to terminate parental rights violates the guarantee of a jury trial contained in Montana's Constitution. The Supreme Court, citing previous cases and decisions of other jurisdictions, held that the right to a jury trial exists only if that right existed at the time that the 1889 Montana Constitution was adopted and noted that parental termination proceedings did not exist at that time. The Supreme Court also noted that in 1972, the delegates to the constitutional convention considered whether the right to jury trials should be extended to all cases but did not expand the right to a jury trial. In re M.H. & G.H., 2006 MT 208, 333 M 286, 143 P3d 103 (2006).

Probate Code Permanent Guardianship Proceeding — Dependency or Neglect Not Grounds for Terminating Mother's Custody of Child: A mother's parental rights were not terminated by circumstance when a court order granted, with her consent, temporary guardianship in the paternal grandparents. A later court, on the grandparents' petition for permanent guardianship under the Uniform Probate Code, found that the child was neglected or dependent and that the child's best interests would be served by granting the petition. The mother appeared in and contested the later action, withdrew her consent, and filed a petition to terminate the temporary guardianship. The guardianship provisions of the Uniform Probate Code were never intended as a substitute for the child custody provisions of Title 40 governing dissolution of marriage or for the procedures of this title governing termination of the parent-child relationship. The court relied on cases stating that a dependent neglected best interests of the child determination could not be made in a Uniform Probate Code permanent guardianship proceeding and had to be made under a child custody or parental termination proceeding. In re Guardianship of D.T.N., 275 M 480, 914 P2d 579, 53 St. Rep. 253 (1996).

Failure to Notify Guardian Ad Litem of Adoption Proceedings — Reversible Error: A guardian ad litem is required to represent a child in every case in which child abuse or neglect is alleged, and that representation continues until the child is permanently placed. Therefore, failure by the court to notify an unplaced child's guardian ad litem of a hearing on a petition for permanent adoption constituted reversible error. In re F.H., 272 M 342, 901 P2d 96, 52 St. Rep. 791 (1995).

Award of Permanent Legal Custody — Authority of Court to Award Custody — Best Interests of Child Standard: The Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) filed a petition requesting the court to terminate parental rights of Mary Ann G. and to grant the Department permanent legal custody of J.J.G., with the right to consent to adoption. Former foster parents of J.J.G. filed a petition seeking permanent custody of the child. The court dismissed the foster parents' petition on grounds that the court could only review the placement actions of the Department but could not make the permanent placement itself. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the lower court erred when it concluded that the foster parents were without legal authority to seek custody of the child and that the lower court had no option other than to grant custody to the Department. The District Court has discretionary authority to transfer legal custody to any qualified individual, including nonrelatives, in order to protect the welfare of the child. In re J.J.G., 266 M 274, 880 P2d 808, 51 St. Rep. 793 (1994), followed in In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999).

Error by Court in Failure to Appoint Counsel for Parental Rights Termination Proceedings: To avoid a parent being placed at an unfair disadvantage during parental rights termination proceedings, due process and fairness require that the parent be represented by counsel. An indigent parent is constitutionally guaranteed the right to court-appointed counsel during the proceedings, and denial of such a request constitutes reversible error. (See 2005 amendment.) In re A.S.A., J.L.A., G.A., & A.J.A., 258 M 194, 852 P2d 127, 50 St. Rep. 494 (1993).

Holding of Adjudicatory Hearing as Directory Rather Than Mandatory or Jurisdictional: Because the presiding judge was changed, the dispositional hearing on termination of parental rights was not held within the 180-day period provided in this section. The parent contended that the delay necessitated dismissal of the petition because the timeframe was not met. However, use of the word "shall" with regard to holding the hearing is directory rather than mandatory, and failure to hold the hearing within 180 days does not divest the court of jurisdiction. Absent prejudice to the parent from the hearing delay, termination of parental rights was proper in light of clear and convincing evidence supporting the court's findings and conclusions. In re A.N.S. & L.M.R., 252 M 279, 828 P2d 1357, 49 St. Rep. 250 (1992).

Adjudicatory and Dispositional Hearing Combined — Notice Not Required: Parental rights may be terminated at a dispositional hearing under 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) and this section. The dispositional hearing was combined with an adjudicatory hearing under 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437), and no specific notice of the combination was required. Findings Required to Terminate Parental Rights: A court must make findings in accordance with 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438), 41-3-607, and 41-3-609 before it can terminate parental rights and award permanent custody of any child to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). In re C.A.R. & P.J.R., 214 M 174, 693 P2d 1214, 41 St. Rep. 2395 (1984).

Termination of Parental Rights — No Right to Jury Trial: The State began termination of parental rights proceedings in the District Court. The parents filed a jury demand. The court denied the motion, citing 41-3-607. The court consolidated the adjudicatory and dispositional hearings, found the youths to be "in need of care", found that the parents had not complied with the approved treatment plan, found them to be beyond rehabilitation, and terminated their parental rights. The parents appealed the denial of the jury trial, alleging that 41-3-607(4) was unconstitutional pursuant to Art. II, sec. 24, of the 1972 Montana Constitution. The Supreme Court held that in Montana the state constitution guarantees the right to a jury trial only in the class of cases in which the right was enjoyed when the constitution was adopted. When the constitution was first adopted in 1889, there was no right to a jury trial in parental rights termination proceedings because such proceedings did not exist. Because there was no right to a jury trial for civil proceedings to terminate parental rights when the Montana Constitution was adopted in 1889 and recodified in 1972, such right could not be brought within the protection of Art. II, sec. 26, of the 1972 Montana Constitution. Because the adjudicatory and dispositional hearings may be consolidated, as was the case here, the court held it was unlikely the Legislature intended to provide for a jury trial at the adjudicatory hearing but not at the dispositional hearing. 2001 Amendment: Chapter 83 near beginning after "relationship" deleted "based on abandonment", after "whether the" substituted "provisions of 41-3-428 and 41-3-429" for "rules of civil procedure", after "process" deleted "on the parents", and deleted former second and third sentences that read: "If the parents were not served personally, the petitioner must file an affidavit stating what efforts have been made to locate the parent or parents of the child. The affidavit must be filed at least 10 days prior to the hearing." Amendment effective March 20, 2001.

Saving Clause: Section 8, Ch. 83, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

Case Notes

Petition for Long-Term Custody Included With Petition for Termination of Parental Rights — No Requirement for Filing Subsequent to Hearing: The state petitioned to terminate the mother's parental rights or, alternatively, to grant long-term custody to the state with the right to assign guardianship to the children's grandmother. Because the District Court combined the permanency hearing with the termination hearing, the petition for long-term legal custody was not filed subsequent to the hearing, which the mother contended violated 41-3-412 (renumbered 41-3-445) and erroneously denied her sufficient notice. However, 41-3-412 (renumbered 41-3-445) does not require that a petition for long-term custody be filed subsequent to a hearing. That petition may be filed at the same time as a petition to terminate parental rights, and this alternative petition provides a parent with adequate notice of issues to be raised at the hearing. Thus, the court did not err in awarding long-term custody without requiring a separate petition limited to that issue. In re Custody & Parental Rights of T.Z. & J.Z., 2000 MT 205, 300 M 522, 6 P3d 960, 57 St. Rep. 806 (2000).

Lack of Personal Notice — Due Process Not Violated: Mother abandoned her children after two failed treatment plans and neglected to apprise the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) of her whereabouts for over 90 days prior to initiation of termination proceedings, during which time Department efforts to contact her were unsuccessful. Relying on 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422), she later argued that because she was not personally served with notice of the termination proceedings, her due process rights were violated. However, this section outlines the notice requirements applicable to parent-child relationship termination proceedings. The District Court, after noting the Department's efforts to locate mother and the fact that she was under actual notice from the onset of Department involvement that her parental rights could be terminated if she failed to follow court-ordered treatment plans, properly held that the notice requirements of this section were satisfied. In re A.E., C.E., S.R., & J.R., 255 M 56, 840 P2d 572, 49 St. Rep. 877 (1992).

Termination of Parental Rights Affirmed — Mother Unlikely to Change in Reasonable Time. In re C.K., 2022 MT 27, 407 Mont. 329, 503 P.3d 1104.

District Court Terminated Father's Parental Rights After Child Reunified With Mother — No Abuse of Discretion: Shortly after a child's birth, the District Court adjudicated the baby as a youth in need of care and granted temporary legal custody to the Department of Public Health and Human Services (DPHHS) for 6 months. Over the next 2 years, the father failed to engage with his treatment plan, failed to make progress on his behavioral health and substance use issues, was intermittently incarcerated, and negatively impacted the mother's ability to provide a stable environment for the child. The District Court ultimately terminated his parental rights. On appeal, the father argued that the child no longer met the requirement of being a youth in need of care when the termination occurred, because by that time the child had been reunified with the mother. The Supreme Court found that although the District Court need not have proceeded with the termination action after the child had achieved permanency with the mother, it was not abuse of discretion to terminate. In re D.D., 2021 MT 66, 403 Mont. 376, 482 P.3d 1176.

Stipulation to Not Provide Reunification Services — No Error in Termination of Parental Rights — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel When Mother Incarcerated and Children Out of Her Care For More Than 2 Years in 3-Year Period: After her parental rights were terminated, the mother claimed she had received ineffective assistance of counsel. She argued that by stipulating to the request of the Department of Public Health and Human Services that it not provide reunification services, her attorney had acknowledged she had subjected the children to chronic, severe neglect, which led to the termination of her rights. Prior to the hearing on termination, however, the mother had been sentenced to 48 months in federal prison. In its termination order, the District Court emphasized that the children had been out of the mother's care for 31 of the past 34 months and that they would be out of her care for another 23 months. The District Court also based the termination on the testimony of a court-appointed special advocate and the guardian ad litem that it would be in the children's best interests. Based on the evidence, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the mother had not been prejudiced by her attorney's stipulation. In re D.A.D., 2021 MT 2, 402 Mont. 399, 478 P.3d 809.

Filing Certificate of Service of Notice to Tribe — Notice Sufficient Under ICWA: After a father's parental rights were terminated by the District Court, he appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that the Department of Public Health and Human Services failed to provide proper notice of the proceedings to the tribal entity as required under the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA). The Supreme Court affirmed, finding that the Department had filed a certificate of service attesting it had provided the petition for termination to the tribe through registered mail, which was sufficient notice under the ICWA. In re S.B., 2019 MT 279, 398 Mont. 27, 459 P.3d 214.

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: In protracted litigation, the Department of Public Health and Human Services would not give an out-of-state father, who was not unfit, custody of his child and the father's appointed counsel failed in many ways to advocate effectively for him. The District Court ultimately terminated the father's parental rights. Reviewing the case on the father's appeal, the Supreme Court laid out the course of actions the Department should have taken and found that the father's counsel had been ineffective, which prejudiced his case and violated the father's due process rights. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded. In re E.Y.R., 2019 MT 189, 396 Mont. 515, 446 P.3d 1117.

Termination of Parental Rights Proper — Parent's Failure to Engage With Counsel and Department Not Basis for Due Process Claim: A father failed to sign and return his treatment plan and did not provide current contact information to his attorney or the Department of Public Health and Human Services. After his parental rights were terminated, he asserted that he was denied due process of law on the basis that (1) he was not served with the petition for temporary legal custody before his child was adjudicated a youth in need of care, (2) he received ineffective assistance of counsel, and (3) the Department failed to make reasonable efforts to prevent the removal of his child. The Supreme Court found the due process claim to be unfounded because the father was served with the petition prior to termination and was aware of the proceedings throughout, a parent cannot establish ineffective assistance of counsel through his own failure to contact and engage with counsel, and the father did not fulfill his obligation to engage with and maintain sufficient contact with the Department for the Department to be able to assist the father. In re B.J.J., 2019 MT 129, 396 Mont. 108, 443 P.3d 488.

Termination of Parental Rights — Removal of Infant — Mother Located in Another State — Department Policies Not Followed — Evidentiary Admissions Clarified: The Montana Department of Public Health and Human Services, Child and Family Services Division, became involved with a mother and child when the mother tested positive for methamphetamine and marijuana at the child's birth. During portions of the proceeding, the mother lived in different states, did not own a vehicle, did not have a driver's license, and could not make it to Montana due to weather. The District Court ultimately terminated the mother's parental rights, finding that the mother did not successfully complete her treatment plan and the condition rendering her unfit, unable, or unwilling to parent was unlikely to change. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the Department failed to provide reasonable efforts to place the child as close as possible to the mother's home in violation of the Department's policies, that it did not implement a service provision plan that could successfully address the mother's substance abuse problem, that the removal of an infant implicates different services than the removal of an older child, that it failed to take efforts to identify or locate a potential kinship placement, that it failed to provide reasonable efforts designed to reunify the mother and her child, and that the presumption in favor of termination in 41-3-604 was misplaced. The court then clarified In re M.C., 2017 MT 252, 389 Mont. 78, 403 P.3d 1266, to hold that it did not intend that case to be interpreted to permit courts to admit any and all written reports or evaluations or service-related documents over otherwise valid hearsay or foundation objections. In re R.J.F., 2019 MT 113, 395 Mont 454, 443 P.3d 387.

Conditional Relinquishment in Previously Dismissed Case — No Application in Subsequent Termination Case: The mother signed a conditional relinquishment of parental rights in an earlier abuse and neglect case that was later dismissed. Three years later, when the mother was involved in another abuse and neglect case, the Department of Public Health and Human Services asked the District Court to terminate her rights based on the earlier relinquishment, which it did. The mother appealed and argued to the Supreme Court that the relinquishment from a dismissed case could not be used against her in a subsequent case. The Supreme Court agreed, holding that the application of the relinquishment violated the mother's due process rights. Accordingly, it reversed and remanded the matter to the District Court to proceed without applying her relinquishment. In re K.B., 2019 MT 73, 395 Mont. 213, 437 P.3d 1042.

Abuse of Discretion to Allow CASA to Subpoena Father's Therapy Notes and to Cross-Examine Him — Harmless Error: In a parental termination proceeding, the District Court allowed the child's court-appointed special advocate (CASA) to subpoena the father's therapy notes and allowed her to cross-examine him. After his parental rights were terminated, the father appealed. The Supreme Court agreed that the District Court had abused its discretion and that the CASA had exceeded the scope of her authority; however, based on other evidence in the record, it concluded the error to be harmless. In re J.D., 2019 MT 63, 395 Mont. 141, 437 P.3d 131.

Determination of Indian Status — No "Reason to Know" Under ICWA — No Facts, Affidavits, or Allegations That Children Were Indian: A termination proceeding under 41-3-609 was appealed on the basis that an affidavit by a child protective specialist gave the District Court reason to know that the children were Indian and may be subject to the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA). The Supreme Court found no ICWA violation given that there was no indication in over 2 years of pretermination proceedings that the children were enrolled members of a tribe or were eligible for enrollment, or that the mother or the children's fathers were enrolled members. In re J.J.C., 2018 MT 317, 394 Mont. 35, 432 P.3d 149.

Indian Child Welfare Act Not Triggered Unless Parental Relationship Exists: The District Court's decision to terminate a putative father's parental rights without complying with the requirements of the Indian Child Welfare Act under 25 U.S.C. 1912 was not clearly erroneous because the putative father never had custody or a meaningful family relationship with the child. In re P.T.D., 2018 MT 206, 392 Mont. 376, 424 P.3d 619.

Admission of Psychological Evaluation — Hearsay Exception Not Required — Unique Statutory Scheme of Youth in Need of Care Proceedings: The District Court ordered a mother's treatment plan, which required her to undergo a psychological evaluation, and she signed the treatment plan, agreeing to follow the evaluation's recommendations. The psychological evaluation became part of the court proceedings, allowing the court to consider any part of the evaluation through the abuse and neglect proceeding. After the District Court terminated the mother's parental rights, she appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding that the District Court properly admitted the mother's psychological evaluation at the hearing to determine whether to terminate the mother's parental rights and that it did not need to be admitted as a hearsay exception. In re M.C., 2017 MT 252, 389 Mont. 78, 403 P.3d 1266, distinguished in In re R.J.F., 2019 MT 113, 395 Mont. 454, 443 P.3d 387, relating to valid hearsay or foundational objections.

Termination of Parental Rights Proper When Record Clearly Shows Reasonable Efforts Made to Reunite Family — Failure of Mother to Cooperate With Getting New Attorney Appointed — Counsel Retained at All Critical Stages of Proceeding — No Due Process Violation: The District Court did not abuse its discretion when it terminated the mother's parental rights when the record clearly shows reasonable efforts were made to reunite the family pursuant to 41-3-423(1) (see 2023 amendment to 41-3-423) and because 41-3-609(1)(f) does not require a specific finding by the District Court that reasonable efforts were made before terminating the mother's parental rights. Because she had counsel at all critical states of the proceedings, the mother's due process right was not infringed when she was without counsel due to her own failure to cooperate. In re M.V.R., 2016 MT 309, 385 Mont. 448, 384 P.3d 1058.

Claim of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel in Termination Proceedings — Attorney Within Range of Competence Despite Offer of Proof: At the end of a hearing to determine whether a mother's parental rights should be terminated, the mother's court-appointed counsel from the Office of State Public Defender submitted an offer of proof of his own incompetency and lack of preparation. The mother's counsel had earlier sought to vacate his appointment as her attorney based on his lack of knowledge in representing a client in a termination proceeding. On appeal, the mother argued that she had received ineffective assistance of counsel. Applying Strickland, the court affirmed, concluding that the mother's attorney was within the range of competence required of attorneys in similar cases and that the mother could not establish that she had suffered any prejudice. In re Adoption of A.W.S., 2016 MT 194, 384 Mont. 278, 377 P.3d 1201.

Mother Unlikely to Change Within Reasonable Time: The Department of Public Health and Human Services removed the mother's two children from her care after 17 referrals over a period of 3 years. The mother stipulated to a treatment plan and to having the District Court adjudicate her children as youths in need of care. However, the mother subsequently failed to abide by the stipulated treatment plan. The District Court eventually terminated the mother's parental rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the District Court properly found that the conduct or condition that made the mother unfit to parent was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In re C.W.E., 2016 MT 2, 382 Mont. 65, 364 P.3d 1238. See also In re X.M., 2018 MT 264, 393 Mont. 210, 429 P.3d 920.

No Abuse of Discretion in Terminating Parental Rights When Conditions Rendering Mother Unfit to Parent Unlikely to Change Within Reasonable Time: A mother's failure to object to a treatment plan prevented her from challenging it on appeal. In this case, because the children were adjudicated youths in need of care, the mother's treatment plan was unsuccessful, and clear and convincing evidence was present that the condition rendering the mother unfit to parent was unlikely to change, the court was within its discretion to terminate parental rights. In re C.M., 2015 MT 292, 381 Mont. 230, 359 P.3d 1081.

Termination of Parental Rights Proper — Prior Termination of Rights Relevant Where Parent Is Unlikely to Change Behavior: A couple of months before the birth of I.T., the mother's rights to her three children were terminated due to her drug use. Shortly after I.T.'s birth, I.T. was placed in a neonatal intensive care unit for drug withdrawal treatment. At that time, the state petitioned for emergency protective services and later requested and received approval that it need not provide preservation or reunification services to the mother given the prior termination for parental rights and the mother's unlikeliness to change her behavior that led to termination. Subsequently, the mother's parental rights to I.T. were terminated. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's ruling based on substantial evidence in the record that the mother's chemical dependency was not likely to change. In re I.T., 2015 MT 43, 378 Mont. 239, 343 P.3d 1192. See also In re C.B., 2019 MT 294, 398 Mont. 176, 454 P.3d 1195.

Improper Termination of Parental Rights by Default Judgment — Abuse of Discretion — Action to Terminate Other Parent's Rights Inappropriate: A mother filed a petition to terminate the parental rights of her infant daughter's father, who was incarcerated at the time. Despite the father's efforts to respond timely, the District Court, without a hearing, evidence, or findings, entered default judgment. The father appealed the termination to the Supreme Court, which reversed, concluding that parental rights cannot be terminated pursuant to a default judgment. The Supreme Court also emphasized that a natural parent cannot petition to terminate the parental rights of the other natural parent except in the case of a stepparent adoption. In re K.J.B., 2014 MT 327, 377 Mont. 270, 339 P.3d 824, distinguished in In re A.M.S., 2016 MT 22, 382 Mont. 145, 364 P.3d 1261.

Reasonable Efforts Adequate — Termination Proper: A mother appealed the termination of her parental rights, arguing that the Department of Public Health and Human Services was precluded from seeking termination of her parental rights when it failed to make reasonable efforts to reunite her with her child by not providing recommended mental health treatment. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that because the mother was on a waiting list with multiple mental health providers as a result of the Department's efforts and because the mother's ability to parent most likely would not have improved within the period of time between removal of the child and termination of parental rights had the recommended counseling taken place, additional reasonable efforts were not required. In re K.L., 2014 MT 28, 373 Mont. 421, 318 P.3d 691.

Termination of Parental Rights Not in Compliance with Requirements of ICWA and Parallel State Law: The District Court terminated the appellant Indian mother's parental rights to her two children. In reversing for a new termination hearing, the Supreme Court found that the termination proceedings did not comply with the mandates of the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) because the mother and the tribe should have received notice of the petition for termination at least 10 days in advance of the termination hearing. At the termination hearing the ICWA expert, pursuant to the ICWA and 41-3-609, was required to testify as to whether the mother's continued custody was likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the children, but the ICWA expert failed to provide the required testimony. The termination proceeding record did not establish that the state satisfied ICWA requirements that active efforts be made to provide remedial services and rehabilitation programs that were designed to prevent the breakup of the Indian family. In Re K.B. and T.B., 2013 MT 133, 370 Mont. 254, 301 P.3d 836.

However, see In re M.S., 2014 MT 265, 376 Mont. 394, 336 P.3d 930, in which the Supreme Court held that even though the Department of Public Health and Human Services did not provide appropriate proof that the father's tribe had received proper notice of the termination hearing, the Department made "active efforts" as required under the ICWA, and that the error in this case was harmless.

Father's Behavior Unlikely to Change in Reasonable Amount of Time — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating a father's parental rights by concluding that the father's behavior would not change within a reasonable amount of time because the father had continually demonstrated over an extended period of time that he would not take the necessary steps to establish a relationship with his child. In re D.B., 2012 MT 231, 366 Mont. 392, 288 P.3d 160.

No Showing of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel for Counsel's Failure to Argue Alternatives — Termination of Parental Rights Affirmed: In a hearing in which the District Court terminated a father's parental rights, the father's counsel did not provide ineffective assistance by failing to advocate for appropriate alternatives to termination of parental rights. Counsel argued against granting the petition for termination, and the question of alternatives had not yet arisen. In re B.M. and P.M., 2010 MT 114, 356 Mont. 327, 233 P.3d 338.

Long-Term Incarceration Rendering Parent's Unfitness Unlikely to Change — Termination of Parental Rights Affirmed: The District Court did not clearly err in terminating a mother's parental rights after finding that the mother's long-term incarceration in federal prison rendered her unfit and was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 113, 350 M 132, 206 P3d 74 (2009).

Sufficient Evidence to Terminate Rights of Incarcerated Parent: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parental rights of an incarcerated parent after citing: (1) the fact that the child would have been in foster placement for more than 15 of the most recent months before the parent was eligible for parole, thus satisfying the presumption in 41-3-604(1); (2) the parent's criminal history, including seven prior felonies and four sentence revocations; (3) the parent's history of voluntary underemployment, despite the parent's asserted wish to support the child; (4) the parent's failure to establish a substantial relationship with the child through visits or regular contact; (5) the failure of the parent to manifest an ability to assume legal and physical custody because of incarceration; (6) the child's need for immediate permanent placement in order to meet the child's developmental, cognitive, and psychological stability needs; and (7) the inability of the parent to provide for immediate placement because of incarceration. The parent appealed on grounds that the District Court improperly relied on the presumption in 41-3-604(1). The Supreme Court agreed that the presumption was not satisfied because the child had not been in foster care for the requisite amount of time. However, the court noted that parental rights may properly be terminated if the District Court correctly relies on any one basis set out in 41-3-609. In this case, the District Court correctly relied on several bases other than the statutory presumption and thus did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parent's rights. Mother Allowed to Challenge Trial Court's Findings Respecting Her Treatment Plan Resulting in Termination of Her Parental Rights: The appellant did not object to any of the procedures followed in the lower court proceedings concerning the termination of her parental rights but did argue that the trial court erred in rendering its factual findings. The Supreme Court stated that parental rights are a fundamental liberty interest that must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures and that the lower court's finding of fact were subject to review as to whether the findings were clearly erroneous. The trial court found that the appellant had performed some of the requirements of the treatment plan but had failed to meet other parts, including urinalysis testing. The lower court ruled that in failing to perform all required tasks, the appellant had failed to achieve the overall changes contemplated by the treatment plan. The Supreme Court rejected the appellant's argument that the Supreme Court could excuse noncompliance with any particular aspect of the treatment plan and held that the lower court was correct in finding that the treatment plan had not been fully complied with and that therefore the mother's parental rights should be terminated. In re D. F., 2007 MT 147, 337 M 461, 161 P3d 825 (2007).

Findings Based on More Than Prior Conviction for Crime Against Child — Sufficient Findings to Substantiate Termination of Parental Rights: A father asserted that the District Court lacked sufficient evidence to terminate his parental rights because the court relied on a prior crime committed in Texas that, if committed in Montana, would have been only a misdemeanor. The Supreme Court found that substantial evidence existed to support termination. In addition to the prior sexual crime against a child that was an aggravating circumstance under Montana law, the District Court also found that the father had no significant contact with his children for more than 3 years and failed to complete a treatment plan, that the children had been in foster care for 28 months prior to the termination hearing, and that there was evidence that one of the children claimed that the father sexually abused her. Termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re. M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006).

Preservation or Reunification Services Not Required When Child Subjected to Aggravating Circumstances: The state does not need to make reasonable efforts to provide family preservation or reunification services if a court finds that a parent has subjected a child to any of the aggravating circumstances listed in 41-3-423(2)(a). In re M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006).

Inability of Father to Assume Role of Parent Within Reasonable Time — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights based on the testimony of two clinical psychologists that it was unlikely that the father would be able to parent within a reasonable time. The father appealed on grounds that the District Court relied on testimony that was based on an evaluation made before the father engaged in various treatments through the prison system. Although the father took steps to rehabilitate himself, his extensive criminal history and lack of responsibility for behavior that made him unavailable to parent his child contradicted his claims of rehabilitation. Given the father's extensive history with mental instability, aggression, and crime, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the father could not assume the role of parent within a reasonable time and in terminating parental rights in the best interests of the child. In re A.J.E., 2006 MT 41, 331 M 198, 130 P3d 612 (2006).

Res Judicata and Collateral Estoppel — Inapplicable Absent Final Judgment: In In re B.N.Y., 2003 MT 241, 317 M 291, 77 P3d 189 (2003), the Supreme Court held that a mother's due process rights were violated in parental rights termination proceedings. Almost immediately after the 2003 decision, the state began new proceedings. The mother asserted that res judicata and collateral estoppel barred the new action. The District Court disagreed, and the mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Both res judicata and collateral estoppel require a final judgment in an initial action before they preclude a similar future action. The initial order terminating the mother's parental rights did not constitute a final judgment as a result of In re B.N.Y. The 2003 decision had no preclusive effect in the current action, and the mother's res judicata and collateral estoppel arguments failed. In re B.N.Y., 2006 MT 34, 331 M 145, 130 P3d 594 (2006). Evidence of History of Violence — Consideration Not Limited to Parent or to Violence of Another Committed During Course of Relationship With Parent — Converse Fallacy of Accident or Hasty Generalization: In a child abuse and neglect proceeding, the physician doing psychological evaluations of the parents was given documents that referred to the father's alleged history of violence in another state. On appeal of the termination of parental rights, the mother argued that because she was neither dating nor married to the father at the time of the alleged violence, the doctor should not have considered the father's violent history in evaluating her. The mother relied on three cases in which evidence of violence by a spouse or intimate partner that was committed during the course of the relationship with the parent, who is the subject of the inquiry, was held admissible. The Supreme Court held that the cases cited by the mother do not require a court to exclude any evidence if that evidence is relevant. If the evidence is admissible in court, a fortiori, it is admissible in the psychologist's evaluation. By relying on the cited cases, the mother committed the converse fallacy of accident or hasty generalization. In re D.B., 2004 MT 371, 325 M 13, 103 P3d 1026 (2004).

Lack of Fitness Unlikely to Change Within Reasonable Time — Consideration of Past Conduct Permissible: The mother was diagnosed with mental illnesses in sufficient number, degree of severity, and effect on the children's welfare to support the District Court's conclusion that the mother was unlikely to change within a reasonable amount of time. The father's mental illnesses and violent tendencies posed a danger to the children's future welfare. The District Court did not commit clear error in determining that the father was unlikely to change within a reasonable amount of time. In re D.B., 2004 MT 371, 325 M 13, 103 P3d 1026 (2004). Misdiagnosis of Rare Skin Disease as Evidence of Parental Sexual Misconduct — Newly Acquired Evidence Did Not Undermine Validity of Adjudication of Children as Youths in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Upheld: After the parents' 4-year-old daughter was diagnosed as a probable victim of parental sexual misconduct, the court ordered a TIA and protective services for all five children, who were all under 5 years of age. Both parents were criminally charged with abuse and neglect of their children. The father remained in jail for 1 year. The children were tested and found to be developmentally delayed in their speech, and both parents were diagnosed with psychological disorders. Both parents were ordered to complete treatment plans, which they failed to complete. Eventually, their parental rights were terminated. Two years after the initial diagnosis, it was determined that the daughter's physical symptoms were the result of a rare skin disease called lichens sclerosis et atrophicus (LSA) rather than sexual abuse. The parents appealed the termination of their parental rights and argued that the District Court had erred in adjudicating the children as youths in need of care based on the misdiagnosis. The parents further argued that the allegations of sexual molestation because of the misdiagnosis tainted the entire proceedings to such a degree that they were deprived of their rights to due process and fundamental fairness, thereby invalidating the subsequent termination ruling. The Supreme Court upheld the District Court and held that, based on the developmental delays and psychological disorders, the District Court had adequate grounds independent of the LSA misdiagnosis for adjudicating the children as youths in need of care under 41-3-422 and that the subsequent termination under this section was valid. De Minimis Amount of Inadmissible Evidence in Findings — Adoption of State's Findings Not Reversible Error: The District Court issued findings and conclusions substantially similar to those proposed by the state, including a de minimis amount of inadmissible evidence. Nevertheless, on appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that, although discouraged, verbatim adoption of a prevailing party's proposed findings did not constitute error per se and that in this case, the careless but harmless inclusion of such a small amount of inadmissible evidence did not warrant reversing the ultimate decision terminating parental rights. Rights Terminated for Failure to Complete Treatment Plan, Criminal Activity, Inability to Parent, Likely Harm to Child if Returned to Parent, and Child's Best Interests: In a proceeding subject to the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978, the father's parental rights with respect to a 4-year-old girl were properly terminated based on findings of fact and conclusions of law that he failed to complete several treatment plans, that he was involved in criminal activity before and after the proceeding was begun, that he had not made substantial changes that would allow for safe parenting, that serious emotional or physical harm would likely occur if the child were returned to him, and that the child's best interests would be served by the termination. Termination for Serious Injuries to Baby, Incarceration and Parole Violations, Chemical Dependency, and Failure to Comply With Treatment Plan or Improve Parenting Skills: Parental rights of a father in his late teens were properly terminated. He inflicted numerous serious injuries on his 2-week-old son. He did nothing to improve his parenting skills, was chemically dependent, and did not comply or attempt to comply with the treatment plan. During his incarceration for injuring his son, he was cited for numerous major rule violations, including assault; made graphically violent drawings that expressed hatred, satanic overtones, death, and mutilation; and recited Marilyn Manson lyrics. He did not comply with the conditions of his parole. In re A.S., 2002 MT 265, 312 M 277, 59 P3d 382 (2002).

Termination of Parental Rights — Requirements of Indian Child Welfare Act: Under the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978, 25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq., the party seeking termination of an individual's parental rights to an Indian child under state law must satisfy the court that active efforts have been made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs designed to prevent the breakup of the Indian family and that the efforts have proved unsuccessful. The party seeking termination has the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that the continued custody of the child by the parent or Indian custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child. Recognition of Statutory Presumption Coupled With Parental Rights Termination Criteria — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: A mother contended that the District Court erred in terminating her parental rights by inappropriately relying on the statutory presumption in 41-3-604, contrary to the termination criteria in this section. The children had been in foster care for more than 15 of the most recent 22 months, so the presumption in 41-3-604 applied, but the presumption neither eliminates the substantive requirements of this section nor diminishes the clear and convincing burden of proof on the party seeking to terminate parental rights. However, in this case, the District Court both acknowledged the statutory presumption and considered the termination criteria, which included evidence that the mother had not successfully completed her treatment program and had two significantly handicapping conditions (marginal general aptitude and a personality disorder) that rendered her unfit to parent and that would not change within the foreseeable future. Thus, the mother's parental rights were properly terminated. In re B.H. & D.H., 2001 MT 288, 307 M 412, 37 P3d 736 (2001).

Circumstances Related to Termination of Parental Rights to First Child Relevant to Ability to Care for Second Child: The District Court noted that a mother's parental rights to her first child, S.P., had been terminated and concluded that, because the circumstances related to the termination in S.P.'s case were still present and relevant to the mother's ability to care for her second child, C.P., the mother's parental rights to C.P. should be terminated as well. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Pursuant to subsection (1)(d) of this section, the parent-child relationship may be terminated if the parent has subjected the child to any of the circumstances listed in 41-3-423(2), including when a parent has had parental rights to the child's sibling or other child of the parent involuntarily terminated and the circumstances related to the termination of parental rights are relevant to the parent's ability to adequately care for the child at issue. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in holding that the circumstances related to the termination in S.P.'s case were still present and relevant to the mother's ability to care for C.P., that continuation of the parent-child relationship would likely result in substantial risk of harm to C.P., and that it was in C.P.'s best interests that parental rights be terminated. In re C.P., 2001 MT 187, 306 M 238, 32 P3d 754 (2001).

No Authority to Grant Third-Party Petition for Parenting Plan Absent Termination of Parental Rights: A young, single mother left her child in the temporary care of the Knopps, her aunt and uncle, while she sought employment and a place to live. About 2 months after the child was left with them, the Knopps petitioned for a parenting plan and support for the child. Although the document was referred to as a petition for a parenting plan, child support, and medical support, it was the functional equivalent of a petition for permanent custody. The Knopps applied for temporary custody and received it, ex parte, so that when the mother returned and tried to remove the child to their new home, she was not allowed to do so. The mother then sought termination of the guardianship and the return of her child. The mother's parental rights were never terminated or suspended by the state or county, nor were any proceedings ever commenced to demonstrate that the child was abused, dependent, or neglected. The District Court dismissed the petition, relying on In re Guardianship of D.T.N., 275 M 480, 914 P2d 579 (1996), in holding that the mother had a constitutional right to custody of her child and that permanent guardianship could not be granted because the mother's parental rights had not been terminated or suspended. The Knopps appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The rule of law does not permit destruction of a natural parent's fundamental right to the custody of a child based simply on the subjective determination of the child's best interests. Rather, a natural parent cannot be denied custody of a child absent termination of parental rights for abuse or neglect pursuant to Title 41, ch. 3. However, see In re Parenting of M.M.G., 2012 MT 228, 366 Mont. 386, 287 P.3d 952, in which the Supreme Court held that the petitioners could seek a parenting plan if the petitioners could establish a child-parent relationship, even though the mother's parental rights had not been terminated, distinguishing this case from In re Parenting of J.N.P.

Statutory Termination Criteria Met:

A family preservation treatment plan listed four goals: (1) a plan for reunification; (2) a safety plan for the children; (3) timelines; and (4) a backup plan, including concurrent placement. The parents acknowledged that they did not comply with the goal of completing tasks within the established timelines, and the Department had been working with the parents for more than a year to get them to complete the treatment plans in order to reunify the family. Safety and cleanliness goals were not met, and psychological profiles of the parents indicated a lack of ability to provide a safe and appropriate home environment for their young children. There was little evidence that the condition rendering the parents unfit was likely to change within a reasonable time. The parents' compliance with the various treatment plans was characterized by a pattern of increasing their efforts as hearings approached and then slipping back into their previous behavior patterns. The statutory criteria for terminating parental rights was met, and the District Court did not err in doing so. The parents' contention of District Court error in finding that the mother had lost custody of another child because of her inability to parent, which was unsupported in the record, did not constitute grounds for dismissal because the error would have had no significant impact on the result and was therefore harmless. In re C.B. & J.B., 2001 MT 42, 304 M 252, 20 P3d 117 (2001).

Termination of parental rights was proper where evidence showed that: (1) parents did not challenge adjudication that children were youths in need of care; (2) court-approved treatment plans were unsuccessful; (3) the father's sexual conduct toward his daughter and his failure to obtain counseling rendered him unfit to provide adequate parental care; and (4) the conduct or condition that rendered the father unfit was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Termination of Parental Rights Not Precluded by Conflicting or Ambiguous Expert Testimony: The father of three children appealed from a District Court ruling terminating his parental rights based on evidence that neither parent had complied with six treatment plans and that the parents remained unfit, unwilling, or unable to given their children adequate parental care. In affirming the District Court's termination of parental rights, the Supreme Court ruled that the existence of conflicting or ambiguous evidence presented by therapists regarding the father's progress in demonstrating any improvement in parenting skills does not preclude a termination of parental rights when the parent's conduct rendering him unfit to provide adequate care is unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In re C.D.S., S.E.S., & T.M.S., 2000 MT 313, 302 M 466, 14 P3d 1248, 57 St. Rep. 1327 (2000).

Finding That Jail Not Child-Friendly Place for Parental Visitation — Parental Incarceration Not Controlling Factor in Termination of Parental Rights: As part of its findings in terminating the rights of a parent who was incarcerated, the District Court held that a jail is not a child-friendly environment or an appropriate place for a parent-child visit. The parent appealed on grounds that the court erroneously made the implication from that finding that the parent's requests for visits were inappropriate and that the implication inappropriately colored the court's determination that the parent could not become an adequate parent within a reasonable time, amounting to an almost de facto determination that parents who are incarcerated cannot satisfactorily rehabilitate themselves to resume the parenting role. The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed, finding that the parent's incarceration was not a controlling consideration. Substantial credible evidence supported the conclusion that jail is not a child-friendly place, and undisputed evidence that the parent neglected the child, made no progress on court-approved treatment plans, tested positive for drugs, was repeatedly incarcerated for crimes committed in the child's presence, and allowed unknown persons to care for the child was sufficient to support the conclusion that parental rights should be terminated. In re C.A., 2000 MT 227, 301 M 233, 8 P3d 116, 57 St. Rep. 931 (2000).

Findings Sufficient to Warrant Assignment to Long-Term Custody: The state petitioned to terminate the mother's parental rights or, alternatively, to grant long-term custody to the state with the right to assign guardianship to the children's grandmother. The District Court granted the latter. The mother did not contend that the court's findings were erroneous, but did argue that the court erred because its findings were not sufficiently specific to justify long-term custody to the state. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that if the state follows fundamentally fair procedures, a parent may be divested of custody. Here, the District Court found that: (1) the children were youths in need of care; (2) the state had developed treatment plans for the mother, but the plans had not been followed; (3) the mother was warned that the last treatment plan was her final chance; (4) the mother had been given many opportunities to straighten out and retain custody of her children, but did not do so; (5) continuation of the parent-child legal relationship would likely result in continued abuse or neglect if the children were returned to the mother; (6) the mother's conduct and condition rendered her unfit, unable, and unwilling to give her children adequate parental care; (7) it would be in the children's best interest if they were allowed to visit with their mother as directed by the state, even if she was not their custodian; (8) since the children had been living with their grandmother, they had improved in school and become more socially involved; and (9) the grandmother was willing to act as the children's guardian. These findings were sufficiently specific to support the District Court's award of long-term custody to the children's grandmother, and that award was affirmed. In re Custody & Parental Rights of T.Z. & J.Z., 2000 MT 205, 300 M 522, 6 P3d 960, 57 St. Rep. 806 (2000).

Proper Termination of Parental Rights Based on Conviction for Sexual Assault of Child and Sexual Intercourse Without Consent With Child: Snyder pleaded guilty to sexual assault on a child and sexual intercourse without consent with a child based on his involvement with three young girls. His marriage was dissolved 6 months later and custody was awarded to his former wife, who remarried and then petitioned for termination of Snyder's parental rights so that their son could be adopted by her new husband. The petition was granted, and Snyder appealed. The plain language of 42-2-608 provides that the court may terminate a parent's rights and make the child available for adoption if a parent is convicted of sexual assault on a child or sexual intercourse without consent with a child. There is no statutory requirement that the sexual assault on a child or sexual intercourse without consent with a child has been committed on the adoptee. The trial court did not err when it held that clear and convincing evidence supported the termination of the father's parental rights based on his prior convictions. Court Refusing to Terminate Parental Rights for One Child and Not for Second Child: Stephanie argued that the District Court's decision to terminate her parental rights with respect to one child and not with respect to her second child was reversible as being logically inconsistent. The Supreme Court held that the record contained evidence showing that she could handle the parenting of one child but was not up to the task of raising two children and therefore the lower court's decision was valid. Probate Code Permanent Guardianship Proceeding — Dependency or Neglect Not Grounds for Terminating Mother's Custody of Child: A mother's parental rights were not terminated by circumstance when a court order granted, with her consent, temporary guardianship in the paternal grandparents. A later court, on the grandparents' petition for permanent guardianship under the Uniform Probate Code, found that the child was neglected or dependent and that the child's best interests would be served by granting the petition. The mother appeared in and contested the later action, withdrew her consent, and filed a petition to terminate the temporary guardianship. The guardianship provisions of the Uniform Probate Code were never intended as a substitute for the child custody provisions of Title 40 governing dissolution of marriage or for the procedures of this title governing termination of the parent-child relationship. The court relied on cases stating that a dependent neglected best interests of the child determination could not be made in a Uniform Probate Code permanent guardianship proceeding and had to be made under a child custody or parental termination proceeding. In re Guardianship of D.T.N., 275 M 480, 914 P2d 579, 53 St. Rep. 253 (1996).

Medical and Psychological Evaluations of Youth: In a proceeding to terminate parental rights, the rights of the child must be given paramount consideration, and when the evidence supports the court's expressed finding that an immediate evaluation of the youth was in the child's best interest, the court erred in denying a motion for medical and psychological evaluations of the child. Mental Disease and Inability to Provide Care or Meet Treatment Plan — Parental Rights Terminated: The following facts and conclusions warranted termination of parental rights: (1) mother suffered from chronic schizophrenia, a borderline personality disorder, paranoia, and active hallucinations; (2) the children were found to be youths in need of care; (3) mother was incapable of adhering to any proposed treatment plan; and (4) mother was unfit and unable to provide adequate parental care, and her conduct and condition were unlikely to change within a reasonable amount of time. Termination of Parental Rights Proper After Death of One Child and Consideration of Statutory Factors: After properly considering the statutory criteria of this section, especially the efforts exerted by the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) in trying to rehabilitate the mother as well as the circumstances surrounding the death of one child and the abuse and neglect of three others, the District Court did not err in finding that the treatment plan was unsuccessful, that the mother's conduct or condition was unlikely to improve within a reasonable time, and that it was in the children's best interests to terminate parental rights. Parental Rights Terminated — Alcohol, Drug, Emotional, and Stability Problems — Failure to Complete Treatment: The District Court did not abuse its discretion or err in finding that the conduct of mother whose parental rights were terminated rendered her unfit as a parent and was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Among other things, mother: (1) left the children with their grandmother because she "decided to screw off my life" as children's father had; (2) had a history of chronic drug and alcohol abuse and of emotional problems stemming from childhood;

(3) was recently hospitalized, once for depression and twice for pill overdoses; (4) had recently abandoned the children for a 9-day period at the end of which the Department placed them with their grandmother; and (5) failed to complete a three-part court-ordered program aimed at evaluating and treating her problems and helping her provide a stable home and environment for the children. Award of Long-Term Custody Not Considered Termination of Parental Rights: An award of long-term custody under 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) is not equivalent to a termination of parental rights requiring that the statutory factors of this section be met. In re R.T.L.P., 238 M 384, 777 P2d 892, 46 St. Rep. 1354 (1989).

Three Prerequisites for Termination of Parental Rights: The Supreme Court found substantial credible evidence that the three prerequisites for termination of parental rights were met: (1) that S.B. was a youth in need of care under the statutory definitions of 41-3-102 since the child failed to thrive due to carelessness of the parent (citing In re C.A.R. & P.J.R., 214 M 174, 693 P2d 1214, 41 St. Rep. 2395 (1984)); (2) that a court-approved treatment plan was unsuccessful (citing In re R.J.W., 197 M 286, 642 P2d 1072, 39 St. Rep. 568 (1982)); and (3) that the conduct or condition rendering the parent unfit to provide adequate care was unlikely to change within a reasonable time (citing In re R.J.W., supra). PROCEDURE

No Reason to Know Child Possibly Eligible for Enrollment Based on Vague Assertion of Descendance From Unrecognized Tribe: In a case for a youth in need of care that ended in parental termination, one parent asserted possible eligibility for membership in the Lakota Sioux Tribe. Despite the Lakota Sioux not being a federally recognized tribe, the Department of Public Health and Human Services gave notice to the Bureau of Indian Affairs and received correspondence from one tribe stating that the child was not eligible for enrollment with that tribe. An appeal followed termination, asserting that termination was improper without a determination of the child's eligibility for enrollment in the Lakota Sioux Tribe. The Supreme Court affirmed, explaining that the record is void of any nonspeculative basis indicating reason to know the child is eligible for membership in a federally recognized tribe. In re L.H., 2021 MT 199, 405 Mont. 173, 492 P.3d 1218.

Termination of Parental Rights Reversed and Remanded for Final Determination of Children's Tribal Membership: The District Court terminated the mother's parental rights without a final determination of whether the children were subject to the federal Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA). On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the District Court abused its discretion by terminating her rights without a determination of the children's tribal membership status. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case to allow the tribe to make a determination and, if applicable, to conduct anew the termination proceedings subject to ICWA. In re M.T., 2020 MT 262, 401 Mont. 518, 474 P.3d 820.

Failure to Apply ICWA Standards at Outset of Proceedings — Cured by Subsequent ICWA-Compliant Adjudication — Termination Proper: After a father's parental rights were terminated by the District Court, he appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that the District Court's failure to apply the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA) for the first year of proceedings created a ripple effect that led to the improper termination of his rights. While the Supreme Court agreed that the District Court had erred in not applying the ICWA from the beginning of the proceedings, it found that the subsequent ICWA-compliant adjudication hearing cured the prior violations and affirmed the termination of rights. In re S.B., 2019 MT 279, 398 Mont. 27, 459 P.3d 214.

Children With Same Parents — Evidence on One Child's Status as Non-ICWA Presumptive for Other Child: A mother's two children were removed, and later the Department of Public Health and Human Services filed a petition to terminate her parental rights. At the initial removal hearing, the mother informed the District Court that the children may be Indian children as defined by the federal Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA). Later, at the termination hearing, the Department provided a letter from the Crow Tribe stating that one of the children was not enrolled or enrollable into the tribe. After the District Court terminated the mother's rights based on non-ICWA standards of proof, she appealed, arguing that the District Court had not made a finding about her other child's status as an Indian child. The District Court had reasoned that both children had the same mother and same father and therefore if one child was not an Indian child, neither was the other. The Supreme Court affirmed the termination, ruling that the District Court's lack of a finding was harmless error. In re S.R., 2019 MT 47, 394 Mont. 362, 436 P.3d 696.

Detailed Findings of Active Efforts Required Prior to Termination Under ICWA: During termination proceedings, there were indications that two children might be Indian children. The District Court issued an order terminating the father's parental rights to the children. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, ruling that the District Court had failed to comply with the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) due to the absence of detailed findings of what active efforts had been made to prevent the breakup of the Indian family and a finding that those efforts had been unsuccessful. The court remanded for further action. In re B.Y., 2018 MT 309, 393 Mont. 530, 432 P.3d 129.

Active Efforts to Prevent Breakup of Indian Family in Indian Child Welfare Proceeding — Specific Findings Required: The District Court terminated the parental rights of a mother of two children. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, finding that a complete lack of findings or a conclusion that active efforts had been made to prevent the breakup of the Indian family failed to meet the standard set forth in 25 U.S.C. 1912(d), part of the federal Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA). The termination order was remanded with further instructions for complying with the ICWA. In re L.A.G. & N.L., 2018 MT 255, 393 Mont. 146, 429 P.3d 629.

Admission of Drug Results at Termination Hearing Improper — Sufficient Evidence in Support of Termination of Parental Rights: During a parental rights termination hearing, the District Court, citing 41-3-112(4), admitted the parents' drug test results through a court-appointed special advocate (CASA) and subsequently terminated the parents' rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that admitting the drug test results through the CASA was erroneous. The Supreme Court stated that 41-3-112(4) was enacted to allow a guardian ad litem to gather information from collateral sources to form and make recommendations as to the best interest of the child and that the subsection was not enacted as a bypass for the Department of Public Health and Human Services to admit evidence that would otherwise be inadmissible or to cure a party's failure to call a witness to testify. However, the Supreme Court affirmed, finding that admitting the drug test results was harmless and reversal was not warranted because substantial evidence supported the District Court's determination that the parents had failed to complete their treatment plans and that their conduct or the conditions rendering them unfit were unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In re I.M., 2018 MT 61, 391 Mont. 42, 414 P.3d 797.

Untimely Objection to Treatment Plan: A mother appealed the termination of her parental rights, arguing that her court-ordered treatment plan was inadequate because it did not take into account the pain that was the root cause of her addiction. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that raising the objection for the first time at the termination hearing was not timely. Her failure to timely object resulted in the waiver of any argument about the plan's appropriateness on appeal. Furthermore, the mother had stipulated to the plan, and it had taken into account the mother's particular problems. In re C.B., 2014 MT 4, 373 Mont. 204, 316 P.3d 177. See also In re M.B., 2018 MT 205, 392 Mont. 368, 424 P.3d 606.

No Error in Not Holding Separate Reunification Hearing or Permanency Hearing: A court terminated the parental rights of a mother to her two children in Colorado in 2009. In 2012, the Department of Public Health and Human Services petitioned to forgo reasonable efforts to reunify the mother with her child and to terminate her parental rights because her parenting behavior had not changed since her parental rights to her other two children had been terminated. The Supreme Court found that although the lower court did not hold a separate "pre-hearing" to determine if reunification with the child was possible, the mother was on notice from the petition that the Department was requesting that reasonable efforts be abandoned and she had the opportunity to be heard at the termination hearing. In addition, the Supreme Court found that although the District Court did not conduct a permanency hearing, the Department's actions, including working with the father on a treatment plan in hopes of reunifying him with the child, were consistent with the purposes of such a hearing, and the failure to hold a permanency hearing was not a per se violation of parental rights. In re J.W., 2013 MT 201, 371 Mont. 98, 307 P.3d 274.

Termination of Parental Rights Under ICWA: A mother argued that the failure to hold an expert hearing under the Indian Child Welfare Act before the children were removed from her home did not satisfy the requirements of 25 U.S.C. 1912(e). The Supreme Court held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion by terminating the mother's parental rights because the termination was conducted according to the requirements of state and federal statutes and that the record clearly supported the District Court's findings of facts and conclusions of law. In re A.S. and T.S., 2011 MT 69, 360 Mont. 55, 253 P.3d 799.

Department's Reunification Efforts Held Reasonable — Termination of Parental Rights Over Siblings Held Sufficient Justification — No Abuse of Discretion: After the District Court terminated a mother's parental rights over her child C.J., the mother appealed, claiming as unreasonable the 4½ months that passed between the petition by the Department of Public Health and Human Services (Department) to be exempted from the "reasonable efforts" for reunification requirement under 41-3-423(2)(e), because the mother's rights over C.J.'s two siblings had also been terminated, and the date of the hearing. The Supreme Court held that the Department's efforts were reasonable notwithstanding the Department's petition, that there was no timeline provided in the statutes for the hearing, that the delay in holding the hearing did not subject the mother to a fundamentally unfair proceeding, and that the mother was correctly not given a treatment plan because her circumstances met the requirements of 41-3-609(1)(d) and 41-3-423(2)(e) regarding termination of a mother's rights over one child because her rights over other siblings were previously terminated. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that there was no abuse of discretion by the District Court in terminating the mother's parental rights over C.J. In re C.J., 2010 MT 179, 357 Mont. 219, 237 P.3d 1282.

Lack of Effective Counsel During Parental Rights Termination Hearing — Remand: Appellant father asserted that he received ineffective assistance of counsel during parental rights termination proceedings. The Supreme Court examined the quality of advocacy demonstrated at the adjudication hearing and agreed. The father's counsel failed to object to hearsay evidence presented during the hearing and did not file a response to the state's brief in support of admission of the evidence, which resulted in the automatic admission of the evidence. In addition counsel made no objections at the hearing, asked no questions on cross-examination, and failed to meet with the father prior to the hearing or request an extension to do so. Thus, the father received ineffective assistance of counsel, warranting remand. No Error in Finding Inapplicability of Indian Child Welfare Act to Parental Rights Termination Proceeding: At a hearing to terminate a father's parental rights, the father listed three Indian tribes that he thought either he or the children's mother was affiliated with. The District Court found that although the father was an enrolled member of one of the tribes, the children were not eligible or enrolled with that tribe. The father also asserted that he might have connections to a second tribe because of the mother's alleged membership, but in order for the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) to apply, the child must be either a tribal member or eligible for tribal membership and be the biological child of a tribal member. Because the father could not assert that he was a member of the second tribe, the children could not qualify as members of the second tribe. The father also contended that there was possible heritage with a third tribe through the mother's father, but neither he nor the mother was a tribal member, so the children could not be biological children of a member of the third tribe. Additionally, any connection the children had with the third tribe through their maternal grandfather was preserved by their mother's continued custody and care. Therefore, the District Court did not err in finding that ICWA did not apply. In re J.J.L., D.J.L., and R.D.L.L., 2010 MT 4, 355 Mont. 23, 223 P.3d 921.

Facial Showing of Competence in Counsel's Representation of Mother in Parental Rights Termination Proceedings — Ineffective Counsel Claims Dismissed: A mother raised several claims concerning the effectiveness of counsel she received during proceedings to terminate her parental rights. The Supreme Court examined the record and found that the mother's trial attorney provided her with vigorous and competent representation. There was no showing or argument concerning trial counsel's training and experience, and there was facially competent representation in the trial record. The mother failed to establish a threshold showing of ineffective assistance of counsel, and her claims were therefore without merit. In re C.M.C., 2009 MT 153, 350 M 391, 208 P3d 809 (2009).

No Error in Denial of Continuance of Parental Rights Termination Proceeding to Determine Placement of Children: During his testimony at a hearing on termination of a father's parental rights, the father requested a continuance in order for a hearing to be held regarding whether placement of the children with their grandparents was in the children's best interests. The District Court denied the request, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The question of possible placement of the children had no bearing on whether the statutory criteria for terminating the father's parental rights had been established, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in declining to delay final determination of the father's parental rights. Proper Consideration of Circumstances of Prior Involuntary Termination of Parental Rights — Clear and Convincing Evidence to Support Termination of Rights to Subsequent Child: The parents contended that there was no clear and convincing evidence to support termination of their parental rights to A.H.D. based on the prior involuntary termination of their rights to two other children. The Supreme Court disagreed. The District Court did not err in relying on relevant testimony presented at earlier hearings and incorporating earlier findings based on evidence presented at those hearings. The court correctly considered that the circumstances related to the prior termination were ongoing and relevant to the parents' ability to adequately care for A.H.D. Thus, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parents' rights to A.H.D. In re A.H.D., 2008 MT 57, 341 M 494, 178 P3d 131 (2008). See also In re C.B., 2019 MT 294, 398 Mont. 176, 454 P.3d 1195.

Constitutionality of Procedures Allowing Consideration of Prior Termination of Parental Rights to Sibling: A mother asserted that procedures for terminating her parental rights violated due process, particularly when the District Court considered the prior involuntary termination of the mother's rights to A.P.'s sibling when it terminated her rights to A.P. The Supreme Court noted that because it is a fundamental liberty interest, a parent's right to the care and custody of a child must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures that ensure that the parent is not placed at an unfair disadvantage during termination proceedings. In this case, consideration of the prior termination of the mother's rights to a sibling did not violate due process. The District Court is not required to terminate, but rather the court has discretion to grant or deny the state's termination petition if the state proves the statutory elements, nor is the decision limited to the facts of the prior termination because the court also considers any available evidence relating to present family circumstances and the specific child at issue. The parent is also provided an opportunity to challenge the termination petition, and the burden of proof is on the state without placing the parent at an unfair disadvantage. The Supreme Court determined that the procedure allowing consideration of a prior termination does not violate a parent's due process rights. In re Custody & Parental Rights of A.P., 2007 MT 297, 340 M 39, 172 P3d 105 (2007).

Prior Involuntary Termination of Parental Rights to Sibling as Circumstance for Termination of Parental Rights: The involuntary termination of parental rights to a child's sibling constitutes one circumstance that a District Court may consider in terminating parental rights, as long as the circumstances related to the termination are relevant to the parent's ability to adequately care for the child at issue. The circumstances of a prior termination continue to be relevant in a later termination of a sibling unless the circumstances have changed. In this case, the District Court afforded a mother an opportunity to demonstrate that her circumstances had changed since her rights to her child's sibling were previously terminated, but the mother offered no evidence of changed circumstances, so the District Court did not err in terminating the mother's parental rights to the second child. In re Custody & Parental Rights of A.P., 2007 MT 297, 340 M 39, 172 P3d 105 (2007).

Failure to Apply Proper Statutory Criteria in Termination Proceedings — Reversible Error: Instead of applying the statutory criteria in this section when considering whether to terminate a mother's parental rights, the District Court relied on the legal presumption in 41-3-604 that because the children had been in foster care for 15 of the prior 22 months, termination was appropriate. The Supreme Court reversed. A parent's right to the care and custody of a child is a fundamental liberty interest that must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures. The legal presumption in 41-3-604 alone is not a sufficient basis to terminate parental rights and neither eliminates the substantive requirements in this section nor diminishes the clear and convincing burden of proof on the party seeking to terminate parental rights. By relying on the presumption in 41-3-604, the District Court impermissibly shifted the burden of proof to the mother by concluding that there was insufficient evidence to rebut the presumption. It was not the mother's duty to rebut the presumption, but rather the state's burden to show that the mother failed to complete a treatment plan and that the mother's conduct or condition was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Because the District Court applied the wrong statutory standards, the order terminating parental rights was reversed and the case was remanded for application of the proper statutory criteria. Parent's Prior Conviction of Sexual Offense Properly Applied in Parental Rights Termination Proceeding — No Retroactive Statutory Application: During proceedings to terminate a father's parental rights, the state became aware of the father's prior 1985 conviction in Texas of a sexual offense involving a minor. The District Court held that the prior conviction was an aggravating circumstance under 41-3-423 for purposes of terminating the father's parental rights pursuant to this section. On appeal, the father argued that the court improperly applied the 1999 amendments to 41-3-423 and this section retroactively to a criminal act that occurred at least 13 years prior to enactment of the amendments, in violation of the father's vested constitutional parental rights. Setting out the conditions of retroactivity, the Supreme Court noted that a statute does not operate retroactively merely because it is applied to conduct that occurs prior to the statute's enactment and that an amended statute that is applied to a factual situation that occurred prior to amendment is not viewed as retroactive in application. In this case, no additional sanction was imposed on the prior conviction by enactment of the new statutory provisions, but the prior conviction was made a condition for the termination of parental rights in the event that the children were subsequently neglected or abused. Moreover, the prior conviction did not require or inevitably lead to the children being abused or neglected, necessitating the filing of an abuse and neglect petition. Rather, the prior conviction became relevant as an independent ground for the state to petition for termination of parental rights only after the children were abused and neglected. Additionally, the statutes went into effect in 1999, and the termination proceeding was initiated in 2003, so the father was on notice that the prior conviction could be used as an aggravating circumstance to justify termination if the father allowed the children to be abused and neglected. Therefore, applying the 1999 versions of 41-3-423 and this section to a conviction that occurred prior to 1999 did not constitute an unlawful retroactive application of the statutes. In re. M.A.L., D.L., & T.L., 2006 MT 299, 334 M 436, 148 P3d 606 (2006).

Parent's Excited Utterance Following Domestic Disturbance Not Considered Hearsay in Proceeding Adjudicating Child as Youth in Need of Care: In adjudicating a child as a youth in need of care, the District Court relied on statements made by the mother to an officer who was investigating a domestic disturbance at the family residence. Following adjudication, the court implemented a treatment plan, which the father refused to sign. The court subsequently terminated the father's parental rights for failing to comply with the treatment plan. The father contended that the District Court improperly admitted hearsay evidence from the officer that provided the evidentiary support for designating the child as a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court disagreed. The excited utterance exception to the hearsay rule under Rule 803, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), applied to the officer's testimony regarding the mother's statements because the statements were made immediately after the mother had been fighting with the father and while she was still visibly upset. Thus, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the officer's testimony. In re T.W. & J.M., 2006 MT 153, 332 M 454, 139 P3d 810 (2006), distinguishing In re Marriage of Bonamarte, 263 M 170, 866 P2d 1132 (1994).

Action of Recused Judge in Temporary Child Custody Proceedings Affirmed: A District Court Judge signed an order recusing himself from parental rights termination proceedings, but subsequently presided over an emergency temporary custody and protective services proceeding before the recusal order was filed. The parties questioned when the recusal was effective and whether it affected the validity of the emergency proceeding. The Supreme Court concluded that the recusal question did not affect the disposition of the case because, regardless of when the order became effective, the emergency hearing did not affect the child's permanent legal custody or the parent's rights. Thus, the judge's action in conducting the hearing after recusing himself did not warrant reversal in light of the fundamentally fair procedures afforded in the subsequent youth adjudication and parental rights termination proceedings. In re A.N.W., 2006 MT 42, 331 M 208, 130 P3d 619 (2006).

No Error in Consideration of Evidence of Parole Status Following Termination Hearing: A father contended that it was error for the District Court to consider evidence of his parole status in Wisconsin after the father's parental rights termination hearing had concluded in Montana. The Supreme Court found no prejudicial error because the written report simply verified the same information that the father's parole officer presented in person at the termination hearing. In re A.N.W., 2006 MT 42, 331 M 208, 130 P3d 619 (2006).

Failure to Appear at Parental Rights Termination Hearing and to Object to Termination — Waiver of Right to Appeal: A father appealed the termination of his parental rights on grounds that the District Court relied on evidence in the extensive record rather than live testimony at the termination hearing. However, to properly preserve an issue for appeal, a party must notify the trial court at the time that the objectionable conduct is at issue, and untimely objections may not be heard on appeal. The father failed to appear at the termination hearing and thus waived the right to testify, nor did the father's attorney object to termination, having had no contact with the father prior to the hearing. By failing to appear or to object in person or by counsel, the father waived the right to appeal the manner in which the hearing was conducted, including the District Court's decision to rely on the record rather than take live testimony. Termination was affirmed. No Due Process Violations in Parental Rights Termination Proceeding — Statutory Mandates Addressed: A mother asserted that her due process rights were violated in a parental rights termination proceeding because: (1) the state failed to make reasonable efforts to reunify mother and child as required in 41-3-423; (2) the District Court, in effect, terminated her right while purporting only to grant a planned permanent living arrangement and permanent care and control of the child to the state in violation of this section; (3) the state failed to petition the District Court for termination in a timely fashion in violation of 41-3-604; and (4) the District Court failed to hold a permanency plan hearing in a timely manner in violation of 41-3-445. The Supreme Court considered each claim and affirmed. Although reunification efforts failed, the state's efforts were reasonable and in compliance with the governing statutes. The mother's parental rights were severely limited, but not actually terminated, so her argument regarding improper termination procedures failed. The state does not have to petition to terminate parental rights if a compelling reason has been documented for determining that filing a petition would not be in the child's best interests. In this case, there was such a compelling reason—namely, that the state had tried to reunify mother and child for years and did not seek termination casually. The tardy permanency hearing argument also failed in light of the state's diligent, although unsuccessful, efforts to create a permanent and stable environment for the child in an effort to ensure that the child did not languish in foster care. In re B.N.Y., 2006 MT 34, 331 M 145, 130 P3d 594 (2006). See also In re R.T.L.P., 238 M 384, 777 P2d 892 (1989), and In re A.R., 2004 MT 22, 319 M 340, 83 P3d 1287 (2004).

Preservation and Reunification Efforts Not Required in Involuntary Termination of Parental Rights: If a court involuntarily terminates a parent's rights under this section, the state may forego reasonable efforts to provide preservation or reunification services to that parent with regard to any future children placed with the state, pursuant to 41-3-423. Voluntary relinquishment is only one of several criteria that a court may consider when ordering termination of parental rights. In this case, the District Court properly terminated a mother's parental rights based in part on adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care. With the exception of minor immaterial misstatements, the court's decision was based on facts supported by substantial testimonial evidence from professionals, so termination of parental rights was not an abuse of discretion, and the decision was affirmed. In re P.S., 2006 MT 4, 330 M 239, 127 P3d 451 (2006). See also In re C.B., 2019 MT 294, 398 Mont. 176, 454 P.3d 1195.

No Improper Bifurcation of Adjudicatory and Dispositional Hearings Based on Noticed Testimony From Earlier Show Cause Hearing: A parent argued that adjudicatory and dispositional hearings were improperly bifurcated because the District Court took notice of and improperly relied upon expert testimony offered at an earlier show cause hearing. The state argued that a court may take notice of the records of any court in the state. The Supreme Court noted that the District Court allowed the parent to move for reconsideration at the hearing of its judicial notice of testimony from the previous hearing, but the parent did not move for reconsideration. Because the District Court also determined that there was sufficient evidence at the later hearing, without reliance on the noticed testimony, to sustain a finding of abuse and neglect and because the parent did not establish that use of the noticed testimony was a disadvantage, no error was demonstrated. In re S.C. & L.Z., 2005 MT 241, 328 M 476, 121 P3d 552 (2005).

Protective Order Against Parent's Discovery Requests Not Abuse of Discretion Given Department's Open File Policy: In a termination of parental rights case, the District Court granted the state's motion for a protective order against a parent's discovery requests for admission, interrogatories, and requests for production, and the parent appealed. The Supreme Court cautioned that parties to termination proceedings have the full right to discover the case against them. However, in this case, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in granting the protective order because the state and the county maintained an open file policy that allowed the parent access to the entire file for inspection and copying and because the District Court ruled that any evidence or witness offered at trial that was not disclosed by review of the file might be excluded upon objection. Because the parent could not demonstrate prejudice, granting of the protective order was affirmed. In re S.C. & L.Z., 2005 MT 241, 328 M 476, 121 P3d 552 (2005).

Lack of Counsel — No Due Process Violation Following Termination of Parental Rights: A mother's parental rights were terminated in 2001, after which her counsel withdrew and the District Court appointed a public defender without notifying the defender. The mother contended that her due process rights were violated because she did not have adequate representation once her counsel withdrew. The Supreme Court recognized that due process and fundamental fairness require that a parent be represented by counsel at proceedings to terminate parental rights and that the mother had counsel during the termination proceedings and on direct appeal. The mother failed to establish that the proceedings did not comport with relevant statutory and constitutional due process requirements, and her argument was without merit. Termination of her parental rights was affirmed. In re T.H. & C.D.F., 2005 MT 237, 328 M 428, 121 P3d 541 (2005), following In re A.S., 2004 MT 62, 320 M 268, 87 P3d 408 (2004).

Time Limit for Appeal of Termination of Parental Rights Running From Service of Notice of Entry of Judgment — Laches Inapplicable: The District Court determined that a mother abandoned her children and terminated the mother's parental rights; however, the mother was never served with notice of entry of judgment regarding the termination. The mother moved to vacate or void the order and requested a hearing on the termination, but the motion was denied. The state contended that further consideration of the issue was barred by 42-2-620 or by laches. The Supreme Court disagreed that the mother's appeal was barred by 42-2-620 because the statute does not alter the filing period for timely appeals but merely sets a 6-month time limit on all other challenges to orders terminating parental rights. Rather, former Rule 77(d), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), applied. The rule requires service of notice of entry of judgment, and former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), provided that the 60-day time limit for appeals does not apply until service of notice of entry of judgment, but the mother was never served. The equitable doctrine of laches also did not apply because the state failed to discharge its simple affirmative duty to notify the mother of entry of judgment. Thus, the mother's appeal was timely. No Requirement to Reopen Testimony or Continue Hearing Upon Parent's Failure to Appear: A mother failed to appear for the final day of a hearing on termination of her parental rights. On appeal, the mother contended that it was fundamentally unfair for the trial court to refuse to reopen the case to allow her testimony or to continue the trial. The Supreme Court disagreed. The mother was represented by counsel and was properly notified of the petition to terminate and the hearing. Any prejudice to the mother arose from her failure to appear. There is no requirement that a termination hearing be continued indefinitely until a parent decides to show up. The District Court's refusal to reopen or continue the hearing was therefore not fundamentally unfair. In re A.A. & D.A., 2005 MT 119, 327 M 127, 112 P3d 993 (2005).

Failure of District Court to Determine Indian Status of Children Prior to Termination of Parental Rights Warranting Reversal: Absent a conclusive determination from the affected tribes, it was reversible error for the District Court to terminate a mother's parental rights without definitely resolving the threshold question of whether the children were Indian children within the meaning of the Indian Child Welfare Act. In this case, the District Court was presented with insufficient evidence regarding the children's status because of the mother's failure to present crucial evidence regarding the children's possible tribal affiliation and the tribe's delay in intervening. However, the tribe's right to intervene was not impaired by the delay, and the court should not have proceeded absent a conclusive determination that the children were not tribal members. Finding That Child Adjudicated Youth in Need of Care Required for Termination: A mother contended that the District Court erred in a termination proceeding by not making a finding that her child was a youth in need of care. However, this section does not require a District Court in a termination proceeding to find by clear and convincing evidence that the child is a youth in need of care, but rather to find that the child has been adjudicated as a youth in need of care. In this case, that finding was made at a prior temporary custody hearing, and the District Court did not err by failing to revisit the question at the termination hearing. In re V.F.A., 2005 MT 76, 326 M 383, 109 P3d 749 (2005).

Standards Applicable to Termination of Indian Parental Rights — Active Department Efforts to Provide Services Required: The District Court terminated the parental rights of an Indian father after the children were removed from the father's custody a fourth time because of the father's abuse and neglect. The father appealed on grounds that: (1) the state did not make active efforts to provide remedial services; (2) the District Court relied on expert testimony based on the Department file rather than personal interviews; and (3) it was error not to grant the father's request for an extension of temporary legal custody. The Supreme Court affirmed on all issues. The father left no phone number or address with the social worker and moved multiple times. Without any involvement, the father prevented the Department from making active efforts at providing more intensive services. Second, the federal Indian Child Welfare Act requires testimony from a qualified expert witness, but does not require a specific form of that testimonial evidence or personal interviews, and a District Court need not conform its decision to a particular piece of evidence or a particular expert's report or testimony as long as a reasonable person could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that continued custody by an Indian parent or custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child. Last, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to extend temporary custody because the Department had already provided active efforts and did not need more time to assist the father in attaining his goals. The District Court had an accurate perspective on the father's parenting abilities, and refusal to extend the temporary placement did not make the court's decision any less reasonable. Misdiagnosis of Rare Skin Disease as Evidence of Parental Sexual Misconduct — Newly Acquired Evidence Did Not Undermine Validity of Adjudication of Children as Youths in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Upheld: After the parents' 4-year-old daughter was diagnosed as a probable victim of parental sexual misconduct, the court ordered a TIA and protective services for all five children, who were all under 5 years of age. Both parents were criminally charged with abuse and neglect of their children. The father remained in jail for 1 year. The children were tested and found to be developmentally delayed in their speech, and both parents were diagnosed with psychological disorders. Both parents were ordered to complete treatment plans, which they failed to complete. Eventually, their parental rights were terminated. Two years after the initial diagnosis, it was determined that the daughter's physical symptoms were the result of a rare skin disease called lichens sclerosis et atrophicus (LSA) rather than sexual abuse. The parents appealed the termination of their parental rights and argued that the District Court had erred in adjudicating the children as youths in need of care based on the misdiagnosis. The parents further argued that the allegations of sexual molestation because of the misdiagnosis tainted the entire proceedings to such a degree that they were deprived of their rights to due process and fundamental fairness, thereby invalidating the subsequent termination ruling. The Supreme Court upheld the District Court and held that, based on the developmental delays and psychological disorders, the District Court had adequate grounds independent of the LSA misdiagnosis for adjudicating the children as youths in need of care under 41-3-422 and that the subsequent termination under this section was valid. In re D.B., 2004 MT 371, 325 M 13, 103 P3d 1026 (2004).

Adjudication Properly Based on Parents' Stipulation That Children Considered Youths in Need of Care: Following termination of their parental rights, the parents contended that termination was not proper because the children were never adjudicated as youths in need of care, which is the threshold for termination proceedings. Although there was no hearing at which that determination was made based on a preponderance of the evidence, under 41-3-434, a parent may stipulate that a child is a youth in need of care, and the parents in this case twice stipulated that their children were in need of care—once when they signed a stipulation to temporary legal custody and again when they signed a stipulation to the extension of temporary legal custody. Based on these stipulations and the holding in In Re Custody & Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80 (2001), the children were properly adjudicated as youths in need of care. In re M.B., J.B., & W.B., 2004 MT 304, 323 M 468, 100 P3d 1006 (2004).

Extension of Temporary Legal Custody — Failure to Extend Original Treatment Plan Deadlines Not Error: Following termination of their parental rights, the parents argued that because several deadlines in the original treatment plan had already passed when the District Court extended the Department's temporary legal custody of the children, the court erred when it did not also extend the deadlines in the original treatment plan. The Supreme Court disagreed. Consistent with the statutory preference for resolution of parenting problems and reunification of the family over termination of parental rights, the Department sought to extend temporary custody in order to allow the parents more time to complete their respective treatment plans. Further, the parents requested no extension of the deadlines when the extension was granted, the District Court considered all of the parents' efforts to complete their plans, not just those preceding the deadlines, and the parents failed to cite any authority that would oblige a District Court to modify a treatment plan when a parent has failed to meet its deadlines. In re M.B., J.B., & W.B., 2004 MT 304, 323 M 468, 100 P3d 1006 (2004).

Sufficient Evidence That ICWA Standards Met in Terminating Parental Rights — Termination Affirmed Absent Abuse of Discretion: An Indian father contended that the state did not present sufficient evidence under the federal Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA) to warrant termination of his parental rights. The Supreme Court determined that: (1) there was sufficient evidence that continued custody of the children was likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the children; (2) the evidence was supported by testimony from qualified experts; (3) active but unsuccessful efforts had been made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs to prevent the breakup of the Indian family; and (4) the children had lived in foster care a sufficient time to create the presumption under 41-3-604 that the children's best interests would be served by terminating parental rights. The ICWA requirements having been followed, parental rights were properly terminated. In re S.R., R.R., & G.R. Jr., 2004 MT 227, 322 M 424, 97 P3d 559 (2004). Parent's Due Process Right to Effective Assistance of Counsel During Parental Rights Termination Proceedings: Because a parent's right to the custody and care of the parent's child is a fundamental liberty interest that must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures, a parent is entitled not only to assistance of counsel during parental rights termination proceedings, but also to effective assistance of counsel during those proceedings. The Supreme Court will evaluate effectiveness of counsel in parental rights termination cases by following the nonexclusive factors of training and experience and of advocacy. In the present case, a mother's counsel was not prepared to perform the duty to zealously advocate for the mother at a termination hearing, nor was advocacy beyond counsel's means, as demonstrated by the fact that counsel was prepared at a later hearing. However, because the mother did not suffer prejudice because of counsel's failure to provide effective assistance, termination of the mother's parental rights was affirmed. Failure to Hold Parental Permanency Plan Hearing Within Statutory Time Not Violative of Due Process: A mother whose parental rights were terminated contended that the failure to hold a permanency hearing within the time enumerated in 41-3-445, the length of the proceeding, and the denial of her request to allow her counselor to videotape her visits with her children violated her due process rights. The Supreme Court examined the case for fundamental fairness and affirmed. Under 41-3-445, a permanency hearing is not required if a child has been returned to a biological parent, and in this case, the children were returned to the custody of their biological father. The court did not condone the failure to hold a timely hearing as required, but noted that in this case, there was an ongoing attempt to reunify the children with one of the parents, which was the goal of the permanency plan, so the goal was accomplished without a hearing. As to the issue of length of proceedings, the court noted that despite the failure of the mother to show progress toward reunification goals, after 15 months, the Department was still actively working with her to accomplish the goal and did not seek termination until more than 20 months after the children were removed from the home, so the length of time did not prejudice the mother's rights. Moreover, the request for presence of the mother's counselor during visits was never actually denied by the District Court because the mother had no visitation rights at the time of the request that could have been denied. In re A.R. & S.A.R., 2004 MT 22, 319 M 340, 83 P3d 1287 (2004).

Letter From Tribe Conclusive as to Tribal Membership of Children in Parental Termination Proceeding: During parental termination proceedings, a question arose as to whether two of the children involved might be Indian children by virtue of their father's tribal membership. In order to comply with the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA), the state contacted the tribe to determine if the children were tribal members. The tribe responded by letter and stated that the children were not tribal members and were not eligible for membership based on blood quantum. Under In re Adoption of Riffle, 277 M 388, 922 P2d 510 (1996), the tribe's determination was conclusive, but even aside from the letter, testimony from the children's father and several social workers affirmed that the children were not eligible for tribal membership. Because the children could not be considered Indian children by definition, the ICWA did not apply to the termination proceedings. In re T.J.H., J.H., J.L., & A.L., 2003 MT 352, 318 M 528, 81 P3d 504 (2003). See also In re C.H., S.H., & D.H., 2003 MT 308, 318 M 208, 79 P3d 822 (2003).

Belated Notice of Possible Indian Heritage of Child Subject to State Parental Termination Proceedings — Notice to Tribe Required to Allow Future Tribal Involvement if Appropriate: Only after parental termination proceedings were completed did the mother raise the issue of the possible Indian heritage of one of her children and the possible applicability of the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA). One purpose of ICWA is to afford tribes the opportunity to intervene by providing a tribe with notice before proceedings begin; but in this case, that purpose could not be honored because the District Court did not know or have reason to know of the child's possible heritage until after the termination hearing had concluded. Faced with a silent record and because the issue was not raised in the trial court, the Supreme Court declined to undermine the entire termination proceeding, but the court did order that notice be given to the tribe of which the child might be a member so that the tribe could intervene in any future proceedings if it was determined that the child was indeed an Indian child. In re C.H., S.H., & D.H., 2003 MT 308, 318 M 208, 79 P3d 822 (2003).

Indian Child Welfare Act Inapplicable to Child Ineligible for Membership in Federally Unrecognized Tribe: The state sought to terminate a mother's parental rights, but the mother contended that the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA) should apply because the father of the child was an enrolled member of the Little Shell Band of Chippewa. The Supreme Court held that ICWA did not apply for two reasons: (1) the father qualified for membership in the Little Shell Band based on the minimum one-quarter blood quantum, but the child, having only one-eighth blood quantum, did not qualify for enrollment, and tribal membership of an Indian child is required for ICWA to apply; and (2) ICWA applies only to federally recognized tribes, and as of the date of the proceeding, the Little Shell Band of Chippewa was not recognized by the U.S. Secretary of the Interior as eligible to receive services. In re C.H., S.H., & D.H., 2003 MT 308, 318 M 208, 79 P3d 822 (2003).

Failure to Adjudicate Youth in Need of Care Precluding Termination of Parental Rights: A parent contended that parental rights were improperly terminated because the child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that such adjudication is a threshold requirement before a court may grant temporary legal custody, order a parental treatment plan, or terminate parental rights. The state argued that the child was found to be a youth in need of care during earlier guardianship proceedings in a different District Court. The Supreme Court cited In re F.M., 2002 MT 180, 311 M 35, 53 P3d 368 (2002), for the holding that evidence received at a hearing on a collateral matter, such as a guardianship proceeding, did not satisfy the adjudicatory requirements of 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437). Further, it was improper for the District Court to approve a treatment plan 10 months prior to proper adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care, in violation of 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438) and 41-3-420 (renumbered 41-3-443), which also rendered the requirements of this section unsatisfied. Because the child was not properly adjudicated a youth in need of care, court approval of a treatment plan was improper and termination of parental rights was reversed. In re B.N.Y., 2003 MT 241, 317 M 291, 77 P3d 189 (2003).

State's Reliance on Parent's Failure to Provide Treatment Plan Verification Not Considered Impermissible Shift of Burden of Proof to Parent: A mother's treatment plan required compliance with various goals and tasks. The state social worker who testified regarding the mother's compliance with the treatment plan stated that no verification was received regarding the mother's compliance with the various goals and tasks, and on that basis, the mother's parental rights were terminated. On appeal, the mother contended that the sole reliance on her failure to provide verification of compliance resulted in an impermissible shifting of the state's burden to her to prove compliance. The Supreme Court disagreed. The evidence at trial established that the mother failed to satisfy her affirmative obligations under the treatment plan, so the trial court did not erroneously impute the state's burden of proof to the mother or abuse its discretion in terminating her parental rights. In re A.T. & J.T., 2003 MT 154, 316 M 255, 70 P3d 1247 (2003).

Judicial Notice of Mother's Prior Termination Proceeding in Action to Terminate Father's Parental Rights — No Error: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights after taking judicial notice of the sealed record of the mother's prior termination proceeding. The father asserted error because the court took notice of facts that were not known and could not be discovered by the father. The Supreme Court disagreed. Rules 201 and 202, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), allow the District Court to take judicial notice of certain facts of record. Although sealed, the record was not entirely inaccessible because the father could have petitioned for disclosure of the records under 41-3-205, but he did not, even though he was aware of the prior proceeding. In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003).

Expert Witness in Indian Child Welfare Proceeding — Cultural Knowledge of Particular Tribe Not Required: Federal law does not define "qualified expert witness" or provide criteria for determining whether a person is qualified to testify as an expert under the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA), although federal guidelines do allow expert testimony of a professional person having substantial education and experience in the area of the professional's specialty. In the present case, the state called an expert who: (1) was a Blackfeet tribal member with knowledge of Blackfeet culture; (2) worked closely with Indian families while conducting home studies and writing reports relating to adoption and foster care placement of Indian children in Montana; (3) was a teacher in Minnesota and was exposed to the culture of other tribes; (4) worked for the state as a family resource specialist; and (5) was trained and certified by the state as a qualified ICWA expert witness. The father of the Indian youth in need of care objected that the state's witness was not qualified because the witness had no knowledge of the Confederated Tribes of Siletz Indians of Oregon. The objection was overruled, and the father appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. It is not necessary that an expert witness in an ICWA case have knowledge of the cultural standards of a particular tribe. The determination of whether the witness is sufficiently qualified remains within the discretion of the trial court, and it was not an abuse of that discretion for the District Court to accept the state's witness in this case. In re M.R.G., 2003 MT 60, 314 M 396, 66 P3d 312 (2003), followed in In re K.S., D.S., & C.S., 2003 MT 212, 317 M 88, 75 P3d 325 (2003).

Failure to Hold Adjudicatory Hearing to Determine Whether Children in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Improper Absent Adjudication of Status of Children: The District Court held several hearings concerning temporary investigative authority, granting several extensions, and also held several hearings concerning granting temporary legal custody, which was extended twice. The state then filed a petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. Temporary legal custody was extended a third time pending a hearing on the termination hearing. At the hearing, the mother's parental rights were terminated, and she appealed. The Supreme Court found that there had never been an adjudicatory hearing at which the District Court heard testimony or received evidence concerning whether the children were abused or neglected. The hearing for temporary legal custody did not equate to an adjudication by the court that the children were youths in need of care, even in light of an alleged stipulation by the mother to that effect. Absent an adjudicatory hearing and an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care, termination of parental rights was improper, and the order was reversed. In re M.O., M.O., & M.O., 2003 MT 4, 314 M 13, 62 P3d 265 (2003).

Termination of Parental Rights — Fundamental Fairness Issues Not Considered When Raised for First Time on Appeal: On appeal, the father raised numerous issues to support his claim that he was denied fundamental fairness in procedures resulting in the termination of his parental rights. However, by failing to raise the objections in District Court, the father failed to properly preserve the issues for appeal and waived the right to have the issues considered by the Supreme Court. A District Court cannot correct statutory deficiencies if those concerns are not brought to its attention during the course of the proceedings, and the court will not be faulted for failing to address issues not raised before it. The District Court properly considered the best interests of the children in this case, and termination of the father's parental rights was affirmed. Retention of Jurisdiction to Terminate Parental Rights — Findings of Abuse or Neglect in Temporary Legal Custody Stage Required: To retain jurisdiction to terminate parental rights under this section, a District Court must find by a preponderance of the evidence in the temporary legal custody stage under 41-3-437 that the child is abused or neglected. The adjudication of a child as a youth in need of care cannot be established based on evidence received at the hearing on permanent legal custody. In its termination order, the court must conclude that it did not exceed its jurisdiction at any time during the course of the proceedings. If the court does not make a proper finding of abuse and neglect under 41-3-437, it will have exceeded its jurisdiction in waiting to make that determination until terminating parental rights under this section. In the present case, the District Court did not specifically state, pursuant to 41-3-437, that the children were youths in need of care, but the evidence upon which the court based its order granting temporary legal custody clearly demonstrated that the children had suffered actual harm and that they were in danger of substantial risk of harm to their health and welfare. The Supreme Court declined to disturb the findings of abuse and neglect, based on the District Court's language in its order extending the state's investigative authority. In re F.M. & D.M., 2002 MT 180, 311 M 35, 53 P3d 368 (2002).

Alleged Newly Discovered Evidence That Could Have Been Produced at Trial — Motion for New Parental Rights Termination Trial Properly Denied: The District Court denied a petition to terminate a mother's parental rights and ordered her child returned to her within 30 days. The guardian ad litem appealed, contending that the judgment should be set aside based on newly discovered evidence. The guardian ad litem presented the alleged newly discovered evidence through affidavits, contending that the mother left her apartment in poor condition with empty beer cans, was evicted, was fired twice from her employment, was seen driving a stolen vehicle, and had continued ongoing communication with the child's father. The District Court noted that this was one of the hardest fought and most lengthy parental rights termination trials in the court's experience and found it extremely unlikely that the alleged newly discovered evidence could not with reasonable diligence have been discovered and produced at trial. The District Court weighed the affidavit information and did not act arbitrarily or abuse its discretion in denying the motion to set aside the judgment based on newly discovered evidence. The District Court was affirmed. In re B.B., 2001 MT 285, 307 M 379, 37 P3d 715 (2001).

Objection to Medical Testimony Regarding Effects of Personality Disorder on Parenting Sustained — Cross-Examination Properly Limited: A medical expert who evaluated a mother regarding her parenting ability was asked about opinions that could be made based on the evaluation. The expert responded that it would require an explanation of personality and cognitive features and limitations. The guardian ad litem contended that inquiry should be allowed on cross-examination into the effects of a personality disorder on parenting. The mother objected, and the District Court sustained as beyond the scope of direct examination. The Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in limiting the latitude of cross-examination because the expert testimony in this case centered on the expert's observations and because the expert had not diagnosed the mother with a personality disorder. In re B.B., 2001 MT 285, 307 M 379, 37 P3d 715 (2001).

Failure to Appoint Counsel for Minor Parent During Formulation of and Prior to Court Approval of Treatment Plan Violative of Due Process Rights: H.C. was adjudicated a youth in need of care, and was simultaneously a minor parent in an abuse and neglect proceeding whose own child was adjudicated a youth in need of care. Although a guardian ad litem was appointed to represent H.C.'s child, counsel was never appointed for H.C. herself during the formulation of her treatment plan or prior to the District Court's approval of the plan. A natural parent's right to the care and custody of a child is a fundamental liberty interest that requires that the state provide a fundamentally fair procedure at all stages in proceedings for the termination of parental rights. Due process requires fundamental fairness, and fundamental fairness requires fair procedures. Further, under Art. II, sec. 15, Mont. Const., a minor parent is entitled to the same due process protections and procedures as adult counterparts. In this case, in order to preserve the fundamental fairness of the proceedings and for the treatment plan to be considered appropriate, due process required that counsel be appointed for the minor mother during the formulation of her treatment plan and prior to the District Court's approval of the plan, and the failure of the District Court to do so was reversible error. In re A.F.-C., 2001 MT 283, 307 M 358, 37 P3d 724 (2001), distinguishing In re T.C. & R.C., 240 M 308, 784 P2d 392 (1989), inasmuch as appointment of counsel is not always inappropriate or otherwise precluded during the earlier stages of child protective proceedings that precede termination proceedings, if due process requires.

Error in Allowing Amendment of Pleadings in Parental Rights Termination Case to Include New Theory — Lack of Notice Violative of Due Process Rights: During a parental rights termination hearing, the District Court allowed the state to amend the pleadings to include a new theory that the mother had abandoned her children. The mother's counsel objected for lack of notice. The state asserted that although abandonment may not have been included in the original pleadings as a separate ground for termination, there were facts in the original petition that supported a claim for abandonment and that the mother was thus on notice that the state intended to present evidence that would support a theory of abandonment. The Supreme Court disagreed. The fundamental liberty interest associated with parental rights must be protected with fundamentally fair procedures, including the due process requirement that a parent receive notice and be allowed the opportunity to be heard. Generally, a District Court cannot grant leave to amend the pleadings arbitrarily or perfunctorily, and although there are cases when the Supreme Court will allow a party to amend pleadings in order for a case to proceed efficiently on the merits, this was not one of those cases. The termination petition as a whole did not provide the mother with sufficient notice on the charge of abandonment. Although some of the facts may have been applicable to abandonment, the mother should not have been required to glean from those facts which claims the state could bring. Rather, the state was required to articulate the claims that it expected to raise, and allowing amendment of the pleadings during the hearing to include a theory of abandonment was reversible error. Failure to Adjudicate Child as Youth in Need of Care — Termination of Parental Rights Improper: A mother was arrested for a parole violation, and the state filed a petition to investigate whether her children were abused or neglected. The District Court granted the petition on a preliminary basis, and the children were placed in a foster home. The mother was released on bond but failed to appear for a show cause hearing. The state's petition was then granted, and the court found that it was in the children's best interests to be removed from the home. The mother was later arrested again, released the following day, and left for Florida, leaving the children behind. She was arrested in Florida about 3 months later, and while incarcerated there, Montana filed for approval of a treatment plan. The treatment plan was faxed to the mother, but she refused to sign it. The plan was approved without her signature. A district citizen review board then recommended that the mother's parental rights be terminated based on the mother's criminal history, the social history of the case, and the children's need for permanence. The District Court terminated the mother's parental rights for failing to comply with the treatment plan, and the mother appealed. The Supreme Court held that termination of parental rights was in error because the children had never been adjudicated as youths in need of care through an adjudicatory hearing, as required by 41-3-437. A stipulation by the mother to let the court give temporary custody of the children to the state did not constitute a stipulation or an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care. In re T.C. & W.C., 2001 MT 264, 307 M 244, 37 P3d 70 (2001).

No Error in Failure to Grant Continuance of Parental Rights Trial Absent Affidavits or Showing of Good Cause: The father contended that the District Court erred in failing to grant his motion for a continuance of the trial to terminate his parental rights because he had only 20 days to prepare for trial. Although true that only 20 days elapsed after the father received actual notice of the hearing, he was aware for more than 4 months of the state's intention to terminate his parental rights. Further, he offered no affidavits in support of his motion to continue, offered no evidence of what he would have presented had more time been available, and failed to show any good cause beyond the argument of fundamental unfairness. The District Court noted that this was not a new case and that the father had plenty of time to get witnesses to the hearing. The hearing did not spring upon the father unexpectedly, and denial of his motion to continue was not erroneous. In re R.F., 2001 MT 199, 306 M 270, 32 P3d 1257 (2001).

No Requirement That Parent's Counsel Receive and Approve Treatment Plan Prior to Submission to Court: Under this section, a District Court may approve a treatment plan without a parent's signature, and under former 41-3-420 (now 41-3-443), a treatment plan must include the parent's signature, unless the plan is ordered by the District Court. Thus, there is no requirement for parental approval prior to submitting a treatment plan to the District Court, and by implication, there is no requirement that a parent's counsel receive and approve a proposed treatment plan prior to submission to the court. In re R.F., 2001 MT 199, 306 M 270, 32 P3d 1257 (2001).

Trial Court Not Precluded From Finding of Fact Even Though Evidence Conflicts: A mother contended that the trial court erred in finding that she had not completed her treatment plan because the testimony presented by counselors and the case worker conflicted in regard to her therapeutic progress in the ability to parent. The Supreme Court noted that the differences in opinion and conflicting evidence among the counselors on whether the requisite progress had been made in therapy did not preclude the trial court's determination that clear and convincing evidence existed to support the finding of fact. The trial court was in the best position to judge the credibility of all the witnesses, and the court's finding was affirmed. In re M.F.B., D.A.B., M.S.B., & S.L.B., 2001 MT 136, 305 M 481, 29 P3d 480 (2001).

No Rule That One Parent Be Allowed to Participate in Hearing to Terminate Other Parent's Rights: The father claimed that he should have been present with counsel at two hearings that were held to terminate the parental rights of his child and that he should have been allowed to challenge the state's evidence regarding the child's permanency plan. Although the fundamental liberty interest in a parent's right to the care and custody of a child requires the state to provide a fundamentally fair procedure for the termination of a parent's rights, in this case, both hearings were held to consider termination of the mother's parental rights, not the father's. The Supreme Court declined to adopt a rule that one parent must be allowed to take part in a hearing to terminate the other parent's rights. Further, testimony at the hearings involved recommendations for the child's future custody, not the father's parenting capabilities, so the court was not required to allow the father to scrutinize and challenge the evidence and witnesses at the permanency hearings. In Re Custody & Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80, 23 P3d 206 (2001).

Rejection of Court-Appointed Counsel During Criminal Trial — No Requirement for Different Court-Appointed Counsel at Subsequent Hearing to Terminate Parental Rights: On the first day of his criminal trial, Jeremy rejected court-appointed counsel from the public defender's office and represented himself instead. He was convicted of deliberate homicide. Later, during hearings to terminate his parental rights, the court appointed the same public defenders to represent him. His parental rights were terminated, and he appealed on grounds that his right to counsel was violated. However, he provided no authority for the argument that his rejection of the attorneys during the criminal trial somehow required that the court find alternative counsel for later proceedings. Jeremy was entitled to counsel, but not to counsel of his choice, nor did the appointment of the same counsel for both parents in the parental rights proceedings create a conflict of interest in violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct, absent a showing that it resulted in prejudice or adverse impact to the rights of the parties. Jeremy presented no evidence or authority that the right to counsel was denied, and the termination of his parental rights was affirmed. In Re Custody & Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80, 23 P3d 206 (2001).

Stipulation Not Considered Sufficient Adjudication of Youth in Need of Care — Lack of Jurisdictional Prerequisite to Terminate Parental Rights: The mother entered into a stipulation with the state that her children were youths in need of care only upon several conditions: (1) her parental rights would remain intact; (2) the children would reside with their grandmother; (3) the Casey Family Program would manage the children's cases; (4) the mother would always have contact with the children even if the program was required to intervene between the mother and grandmother; and (5) at an appropriate time when the mother was ready, the program, the Department, and the mother would devise a treatment plan that would be completed by the mother in order to regain custody of the children. At a subsequent hearing, the Department proposed a permanency plan that involved removing the children from their grandmother. The mother contended that the proposal amounted to a failure to abide by the conditions of the stipulation, thereby voiding the conditional stipulation that the children were youths in need of care and precluding the District Court's authority to terminate her parental rights. The Supreme Court agreed. Although a stipulation may be an acceptable alternative to an adjudicatory hearing in many circumstances, the fundamental nature of the rights of a parent requires that the process by which a stipulation is drafted and signed needs to be closely scrutinized. In this case, the stipulation was drafted by the County Attorney and signed by the mother without the benefit of legal counsel and essentially allowed the court to determine that the youths were in need of care without a finding that they were abused or neglected and without a hearing as required by 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). The mother had conflicting feelings about the removal of the children from their grandmother's care and relied on her understanding from the stipulation that the Department would not remove the children or terminate her parental rights, so she did not complete her treatment plan. Only a few days after the initial hearing, she promptly began work toward completion of the treatment plan and had made significant progress, particularly considering the unexpected death of her mother, by the time of the next hearing. Despite the change in circumstances resulting from the death, the Department did not grant the mother any additional time to complete the treatment plan, nor did the Department offer any evidence that the mother had abused or neglected the children. Under the unique facts of this case, the Supreme Court held that the District Court incorrectly found that the stipulation sufficed as an adjudication that the children were youths in need of care. Without that adjudication, the District Court lacked the jurisdictional prerequisite to terminate the mother's parental rights, so the Supreme Court reversed. In Re Custody and Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80, 23 P3d 206 (2001).

Failure of Parent With Mental Disability to Raise Issue of Violation of Americans With Disabilities Act — Consideration of Issue Precluded on Appeal: Following termination of her parental rights, the mother appealed on grounds that the termination violated the federal Americans With Disabilities Act of 1990 (ADA), 42 U.S.C. 12101, et seq., because different standards were imposed upon her as a parent with a mental illness than standards imposed on other parents. Although a majority of appellate courts have ruled that the ADA does not provide a defense to a parental rights termination proceeding, the Montana Supreme Court has not addressed the issue and declined to do so in this case because the mother did not offer any testimony, evidence, or argument at any of the various proceedings prior to appeal that would support the legal conclusion regarding her ADA defense. The mother's belated allusion to a possible ADA defense in her posthearing proposed conclusions of law was untimely and did not preserve the issue for appeal. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001). See also Nason v. Leistiko, 1998 MT 217, 290 M 460, 963 P2d 1279 (1998).

Finding That Child Is Youth in Need of Care Prerequisite to Transfer of Custody: The exigent protection of the health and welfare of a child is paramount when the state's initial intervention into otherwise private family matters reveals an actual or potentially dangerous or unhealthy environment requiring the removal of the child from a custodial caregiver. The legal determination that a child is a youth in need of care is a jurisdictional prerequisite for a court-ordered transfer of custody. The first question in a termination proceeding is whether the District Court correctly adjudicated the child as a youth in need of care, and the state need only offer clear and convincing evidence that the court properly adjudicated the child as a youth in need of care in order for the court to inquire into the actual fitness of the parent. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Parent Not Represented by Counsel During Show Cause Hearing Regarding Whether Child a Youth in Need of Care — Due Process Rights Not Violated: At the time of a show cause hearing on whether her child was a youth in need of care, the mother was an indigent mental patient civilly committed to the state hospital. She appeared at the hearing without representation of counsel. The mother contended that the District Court violated her due process rights by making that critical determination regarding the child when she was unrepresented. Although in In re A.S.A., J.L.A., G.A., & A.J.A., 258 M 194, 852 P2d 127 (1993), the Supreme Court held that the constitutional right to due process guarantees an indigent parent the right to court-appointed counsel in parental rights termination proceedings, the court has not extended the right to counsel to a pretermination proceeding in which the focal issue is whether a child is a youth in need of care. Rather, appointment of counsel at any time prior to the initiation of termination proceedings is within the discretion of the District Court. In this case, the initial determination that the child was a youth in need of care was made by order pursuant to a finding of probable cause even before the mother's first appearance in any proceedings when the District Court relied on a report submitted by a social worker showing that the child was abused or neglected or in danger of abuse or neglect and that removal from the home was necessary to protect the child's welfare. Subsequent to the initial determination, the District Court reached the same conclusion on at least three separate occasions when the mother was represented by counsel, including one hearing when the social worker was subjected to cross-examination by the mother's counsel. The Supreme Court applied In re M.F., 201 M 277, 653 P2d 1205 (1982), and in re D.S., H.S., R.S., R.S., J.S., R.S., & K.S., 253 M 484, 833 P2d 1090 (1992), and in holding that the state is not required to provide counsel at proceedings concerning temporary investigative authority or temporary custody. Thus, the mother's due process rights were not violated when the District Court made the determination that the child was a youth in need of care at a time when the mother was not represented by counsel. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Petition for Long-Term Custody Included With Petition for Termination of Parental Rights — No Requirement for Filing Subsequent to Hearing: The state petitioned to terminate the mother's parental rights or, alternatively, to grant long-term custody to the state with the right to assign guardianship to the children's grandmother. Because the District Court combined the permanency hearing with the termination hearing, the petition for long-term legal custody was not filed subsequent to the hearing, which the mother contended violated 41-3-412 (renumbered 41-3-445) and erroneously denied her sufficient notice. However, 41-3-412 (renumbered 41-3-445) does not require that a petition for long-term custody be filed subsequent to a hearing. That petition may be filed at the same time as a petition to terminate parental rights, and this alternative petition provides a parent with adequate notice of issues to be raised at the hearing. Thus, the court did not err in awarding long-term custody without requiring a separate petition limited to that issue. In re Custody & Parental Rights of T.Z. & J.Z., 2000 MT 205, 300 M 522, 6 P3d 960, 57 St. Rep. 806 (2000).

Hearsay Statements of Child Improperly Admitted in Parental Rights Termination Case — Harmless Error: The District Court improperly admitted hearsay evidence related by the child of parents who were subject to a parental rights termination case. However, the improper hearsay was not necessary to the court's determination of proved abuse or neglect of the fitness of the parents and thus did not affect the parents' substantial rights or the result that the court reached. Although the court abused its discretion in admitting the testimony, the error was harmless, and termination of parental rights was affirmed on appeal. Consideration of Nonstatutory Options Not Required Prior to Termination of Parental Rights: Specific criteria for which a court may order termination of the parent-child legal relationship are enumerated in this section. There is no limitation placed upon a court that requires consideration of other options, such as a guardianship, prior to the termination of parental rights. In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999).

Probable Cause That Child Abused or Neglected Not Adjudication of Youth in Need of Care: The father appealed the termination of his parental rights, arguing that the lower court erred in holding that it could terminate his rights based on an earlier adjudication that the child was a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court agreed, ruling that in the earlier hearing, the District Court's finding that there was probable cause to believe that the child was abused or neglected did not constitute an adjudication that the child was a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court upheld the termination on other grounds. In re M.J.W., 1998 MT 142, 289 M 232, 961 P2d 105, 55 St. Rep. 563 (1998).

Argument of Denial of Due Process to Be Raised at Trial: On appeal, Ison argued that her due process rights had been violated in that she was not able to cross-examine a psychologist ordered by the court to complete a posthearing evaluation. The Supreme Court ruled that Ison had not raised her due process argument at the trial court level and in fact only objected to the individual picked to perform the evaluation. In re R.B.O., 277 M 272, 921 P2d 268, 53 St. Rep. 640 (1996).

Reliance on Nonexistent Testimony — Findings of Fact Not Reversed: The Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) moved to terminate the parental rights of M.C. after a long history of both M.C.'s mental illness and her daughter being placed in foster care. The District Court terminated M.C.'s parental rights, basing one of its findings upon the answer to a question concerning M.C.'s mental health that was never given by a social worker before the District Court. The Supreme Court found that there was other evidence before the District Court that M.C.'s mental health was not going to change within a reasonable time, and because the result of a reversal of the District Court's ruling would not ultimately change that ruling, the Supreme Court held that the reliance upon nonexistent testimony was harmless error. In re S.C., 264 M 24, 869 P2d 266, 51 St. Rep. 129 (1994).

No Reliance on Alford Plea in Terminating Parental Rights: Cameron pleaded guilty under an Alford plea to two counts of felony sexual assault, then later claimed that the District Court improperly relied on the plea to terminate his parental rights. The Supreme Court found that the nature of Cameron's plea was irrelevant to the termination of his parental rights because even though he pleaded guilty, the District Court had considered only Cameron's incarceration, the length of his prison sentence, and his refusal to complete sex offender treatment. In re Custody & Parental Rights of M.D., 262 M 183, 864 P2d 783, 50 St. Rep. 1505 (1993).

Child as Witness — Testimony Properly Excluded: In proceedings to terminate a father's parental rights, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to have a child testify as to custody when the threatened harm to the child outweighed any possible relevance the testimony would have. Court Not to Take Judicial Notice of Hearing at Which Parties Not Present or Represented by Counsel: The Streckerts were not present or represented at a hearing by the lower court determining temporary custody of their children. Subsequently, during a hearing terminating parental rights, the District Court took judicial notice of the testimony presented during the temporary custody hearing. The Supreme Court held that the lower court should not have taken judicial notice of evidence presented in the first hearing but refused to reverse the decision on the basis that there was substantial other evidence to support the lower court's ruling. In re D.S., H.S., R.S., R.S., J.S., R.S., & K.S., 253 M 484, 833 P2d 1090, 49 St. Rep. 552 (1992).

Grant of Long-Term Custody Proper — Finding of Abuse and Neglect: Upon motion by the state to terminate parental rights, the District Court ordered that the "parental custodial rights of [mother, father, and stepfather] in and to the youths [B.N. and T.N.], and to their property, are hereby terminated". Under the authority of 41-3-406 (renumbered 41-3-438), the court then awarded permanent legal custody to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) and gave the Department the right to place the children in foster care. The court also awarded supervised visitation rights to the parents and grandparents—an award inconsistent with termination of parental rights. The record clearly showed that neither the state nor the court intended to fully sever parental rights, even though the order used the words "terminated" and "permanent custody". On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the District Court intended to grant the state long-term custody, substantiated by a 10-year history of family turmoil resulting in abuse and neglect of the children, and that placement of the children in foster care was appropriate. In re B.N. & T.N., 245 M 511, 802 P2d 1244, 47 St. Rep. 2225 (1990).

Unclear Findings Not Grounds for Reversal: The mother appealed the termination of her parental rights on the basis that the lower court had never ordered a complete treatment plan for her prior to the termination. The Supreme Court stated that although it was unclear from the findings whether the lower court had found that there had been a treatment plan that was unsuccessful or whether the court had terminated the mother's rights on the basis that she was incarcerated, no grounds for reversal existed. The Supreme Court found that there was sufficient evidence to terminate the mother's parental rights under this section. In re B.H.M., C.M.M., & J.T.H., 245 M 179, 799 P2d 1090, 47 St. Rep. 1967 (1990).

Long-Term Incarceration Unconfirmed by Appellate Review — No Abuse of Discretion: A father whose parental rights were terminated while he was serving a lengthy prison term for aggravated assault of the child argued that the trial court, in the termination proceeding, could not rely upon a criminal conviction and sentence of imprisonment unconfirmed by appellate review. There is no authority for this proposition, and therefore the trial court did not abuse its discretion in severing his parental rights. In re A.B., 239 M 344, 780 P2d 622, 46 St. Rep. 1734 (1989).

No Right to Effective Assistance of Counsel at Termination Hearing — "Fundamental Fairness" Standard: There is no authority for the contention that a parent is entitled to effective assistance of counsel in a termination hearing so long as the procedure followed by the court is fundamentally fair. In re R.T.L.P., 238 M 384, 777 P2d 892, 46 St. Rep. 1354 (1989).

Due Process Properly Afforded Noncustodial Parent: Noncustodial father argued he was not afforded adequate due process in the termination of his parental rights. Although he was not properly notified of the first proceeding in which mother's and "unknown father's" rights were terminated, the District Court rectified the situation by reinstating father's rights, giving him proper notice of a second proceeding, and appointing counsel. Father personally appeared at all subsequent hearings with counsel. This notice and opportunity to appear constituted adequate procedural due process, and termination was proper. In re M.W., 234 M 530, 764 P2d 1279, 45 St. Rep. 2107 (1988).

Termination of Parental Rights Without Treatment Plan — Impossibility Required: After a hearing on the state's petition for temporary custody of C.L.R., the District Court amended the petition pursuant to 41-3-401 (renumbered 41-3-422) and terminated the father's parental rights. At the time of C.L.R.'s birth, both natural parents were incarcerated on convictions resulting from the death of C.L.R.'s half-brother. The father contended that the court erred in terminating his parental rights without following this section properly. He argued that the statute specifically requires establishment of a treatment plan prior to termination. The District Court set forth extensive findings and conclusions prior to determining that C.L.R. would not receive even minimally satisfactory care and would be exposed to extremely high chances of neglect, abuse, and even death if the father were ever allowed to care for the child. The Supreme Court held that the District Court had acted properly in terminating the father's parental rights, but it further stated that a termination of parental rights without first establishing a treatment plan would be allowed only when the facts clearly proved the impossibility of any workable plan. In re C.L.R., 211 M 381, 685 P2d 926, 41 St. Rep. 1436 (1984), followed in In re Custody & Parental Rights of M.D., 262 M 183, 864 P2d 783, 50 St. Rep. 1505 (1993). (Annotator's note: Chapter 388, sec. 3, L. 1985, amended 41-3-609(3) to provide that a treatment plan is not required if "the parent is incarcerated for more than 1 year and such treatment plan is not practical" or if "the death of a sibling caused by abuse or neglect by the parent has occurred".)

Federal Indian Child Welfare Act — Violation of Treatment Plan: A year or more after temporary custody of Indian child was granted the state in proceedings that may not have complied with the federal Indian Child Welfare Act (25 U.S.C. §§ 1901, et seq.), a treatment plan was prepared and approved by the court. The treatment plan was neither suggested nor required by the temporary custody order. In a termination proceeding complying with the Act, it was not error for the District Court to rely on the failure of the parents to comply with the treatment plan. In re M.E.M., 209 M 192, 679 P2d 1241, 41 St. Rep. 636 (1984).

Conditions Existing Prior to Neglect Adjudication — Unnecessary to Prove Continued Existence: District Court could properly base its decision to terminate parental rights on events occurring before the adjudication that child was neglected and was not required to base its decision on a showing by the State that the circumstances and conditions predating the adjudication continued to exist at the time of the decision, where the State had for years been working with and monitoring the family. BEST INTERESTS OF CHILD

Father Incarcerated Majority of Child's Life — Termination of Parental Rights In Best Interests: While the father was incarcerated, he stipulated to his daughter being designated a youth in need of care and entered into a treatment plan. The Department of Public Health and Human Services later filed a petition to terminate his parental rights while he was incarcerated. Following a hearing on the petition that was held shortly after his release, the District Court terminated his rights. On appeal, the father argued that the District Court had abused its discretion because the Department had not demonstrated that reunification with him was not in his daughter's best interests. Although the Supreme Court noted that the father had made efforts and showed a willingness to parent, it agreed that these did not outweigh the daughter's best interests, which included her stated desire not to live with her father, and affirmed the termination. In re I.K., 2018 MT 270, 393 Mont. 264, 430 P.3d 86.

Termination of Parental Rights After Thirty Months — Parent's Relapse, Improvement, and Subsequent Relapse — Reasonableness of Treatment Plan Challenged: The father had his children removed after the Department of Public Health and Human Services found that he used drugs, failed to adequately supervise his children, kept an unsanitary home, and did not ensure that his children received medical care. The District Court granted a petition for emergency protective services and the father stipulated to a treatment plan. Over the course of the proceeding, the father relapsed, improved for a time, relapsed again, and finally showed signs of improvement. Ultimately, the District Court terminated the father's parental rights, finding that the children could not wait any longer for the father to complete his treatment plan. On appeal, the father argued that the treatment plan was not appropriate because it did not provide him with a reasonable amount of time to complete certain tasks and that it erred in determining that he was unfit and not likely to change within a reasonable amount of time. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the father failed to completely comply with his treatment plan, despite coming close, and that the children spending 30 consecutive months in kinship foster care required termination of the father's rights. In re X.B., 2018 MT 153, 392 Mont. 15, 420 P.3d 538.

Termination of Mother's Rights Appropriate Despite Treatment Plan's Failure to Include Chemical Dependency Evaluation — Ineffective Counsel: In a termination of parental rights proceeding, the District Court found that the mother did not complete the approved treatment plan and that she was unlikely to change within a reasonable time because of her drug problem. On appeal, the mother argued that while she and her attorney agreed to the treatment plan, it was deficient because it failed to include a chemical dependency evaluation. The mother also argued that her counsel was ineffective for failing to advocate for the inclusion of an evaluation in the plan. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court, holding that while the failure of the treatment plan to include substance abuse evaluation and treatment was notable, the best interests of the children supported termination of her rights, the difference was being offered help with the drug problem and being required to get help, and the failure to advocate for a treatment plan did not prejudice the mother. In re T.N.-S., 2015 MT 117, 379 Mont. 60, 347 P.3d 1263, followed in In re J.E.L., III, 2018 MT 50, 390 Mont. 379, 414 P.3d 279.

Father's Partial Compliance With Treatment Plan Insufficient — Sufficient Evidence to Support Termination: The Department of Public Health and Human Services initiated a parental rights termination proceeding, alleging the father presented a risk to his children. The District Court ultimately terminated the father's rights. On appeal, the father argued that the Department failed to act in good faith and failed to provide reunification services, that he had partially completed his treatment plan, and that it was reasonable for him to improve. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the Department was not biased and did not act in bad faith, that a parent does not complete a treatment plan by partial or even substantial compliance with a treatment plan, and that the evidence supported the determination that the father was unlikely to improve. In re A.K., 2015 MT 116, 379 Mont. 41, 347 P.3d 711.

Termination of Parental Rights of Both Parents in Best Interest of Child: Both parents appealed the termination of their parental rights. The Supreme Court upheld the termination, holding that the state made reasonable efforts to reunite the mother and her daughter, that the mother's drug addiction rendered her an unfit parent, and that it was not error to terminate the father's rights based on his incarceration for mitigated deliberate homicide. In re A.D.B., 2013 MT 167, 370 Mont. 422, 305 P.3d 739.

Father's Conduct Unlikely to Change Within a Reasonable Time — Reliance on Statutory Presumption Affirmed: In terminating a father's parental rights, the District Court correctly relied on the statutory presumption that the best interests of the children were unlikely to change since both children had been under the care of their grandmother pursuant to a foster care agreement with the Department of Public Health and Human Services for 15 months of the most recent 22 months. The District Court's termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re B.M. and P.M., 2010 MT 114, 356 Mont. 327, 233 P.3d 338.

Sufficient Evidence That Children in Need of Care — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: In 2004, a mother left her two children with a 16-year-old babysitter and did not return for over 24 hours. The children were placed in temporary legal custody with the state, where they remained thereafter. The state attempted to work on reunifying the family, but the mother repeatedly failed to comply with treatment plans, continued her heavy drinking, was arrested several times, and spent periods incarcerated. The children were tribal members, and the state gave proper tribal notification and had an Indian Child Welfare Act expert testify on several occasions that continued parental custody was likely to result in serious emotional or physical harm to the children and that there were no family members available to take the children. The children were adjudicated youth in need of care, and the state eventually sought to terminate the mother's parental rights in 2008. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The children had been in foster care for over 4 years, exceeding the threshold for triggering the presumption that termination was in the children's best interests. A reasonable person could conclude, as did the District Court, that the children were in need of care and that the mother's parental rights should be terminated. Substantial evidence showed that the mother: (1) had been charged with four separate criminal offenses and was the subject of a bench warrant; (2) entered an intensive outpatient drug treatment program but stopped after five sessions, indicating a high potential for substance abuse that could only be controlled by incarceration or inpatient treatment; (3) did not complete any parts of the court-approved treatment plan; (4) missed a number of scheduled visits with the children; (5) failed to address her mental health issues; (6) failed to obtain adequate housing; (7) failed to make reunification with the children a priority; and (8) was unlikely to change her pattern of substance abuse and her unstable lifestyle. Failure to Develop Parenting Skills for Four Earlier Children — Termination of Parental Rights to Fifth Child Warranted Absent Improvement in Parenting Abilities: A mother suffered from a chromosomal abnormality known as velocardiofacial syndrome (VCFS) that caused numerous physical and cognitive difficulties and developmental delays, resulting in mental impairment and limited intellectual capacity. The father suffered severe intellectual and personality handicaps that were diagnosed as developmental and irreversible. All of the couple's children were afflicted with VCFS. Despite the efforts of the state to assist the parents in developing parenting skills over a period of several years, the parents proved unable to care for their special needs children, resulting in the termination of parental rights to the couple's first four children. The state attempted to help the parents with their fifth child, who was the subject of this case, but again the parents were unable to properly care for the child, and the state ultimately sought to terminate parental rights in order to place the child with a family that was able to provide the specialized intensive care necessary for the child's development and well-being. The District Court held that the child was a youth in need of care, and based in part on unchanged circumstances from the four previous adjudications regarding the child's siblings, the court terminated the parents' rights. The parents appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court heard extensive testimony from numerous professionals who worked with the family and opined that because the parents' conditions were permanent, chronic, and irreversible, their inability to care for the child had not changed and would not change in the future. Thus, the court properly concluded that the child was at substantial risk of ongoing or continuing physical or psychological harm by acts or omissions of the parents that were unchanged from their previous parental terminations and that termination in this case was also warranted. Parent's Acquiescence in Adjudicatory Proceedings — Finding That Child Is Youth in Need of Care Based on Parent's Admissions — Stipulation Not Required: A mother contested termination of her parental rights on grounds that her child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The mother was incarcerated at the time of the hearing and contended that although she agreed to a treatment plan, she never admitted that the child met the definition of a youth in need of care or stipulated that the child was in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that the trial court should have specifically inquired of the mother or her counsel whether the mother stipulated that the child was a youth in need of care, but it was not error for the District Court to make that finding based on the mother's own admissions that she was addicted to methamphetamine and needed treatment and that her addiction impacted the child unfairly. The mother was not placed at an unfair disadvantage during the termination proceedings and was represented by counsel at all stages. She never questioned the regularity of the proceedings until appeal. The court held that because 35 months had passed between the adjudicatory hearing and the notice of appeal, it would not be in the child's best interests to prolong the matter, particularly when much of the delay was caused by the mother's repeated relapses and her failure to put the child's interests above her desire to indulge her addiction. The adjudication was proper and did not prejudice the mother, and the District Court was affirmed. In re A.S., 2006 MT 281, 334 M 280, 146 P3d 778 (2006).

Termination of Parental Rights of Father Incarcerated for Failure to Pay Child Support Affirmed: A father was incarcerated for failure to pay child support for more than 10 years, resulting in his inability to be available for his child, who had been in foster care for more than 56 consecutive months at the time of hearing. The father's sentence was to run for about 3 additional years. The District Court properly concluded that the child's paramount best interests and needs were best served by continued stable foster care placement and that there was clear and convincing evidence to support termination of the father's parental rights. In re A.N.W., 2006 MT 42, 331 M 208, 130 P3d 619 (2006).

Termination of Parental Rights in Best Interests of Children Despite Parent's Health Improvements: A mother asserted that her psychologist's testimony demonstrated sufficient improvement in her physical and mental health as to warrant reunification with her children or forestalling termination of her parental rights. The District Court concluded that the mother's condition and conduct were not likely to change in a reasonable time and that it was in the children's best interests to terminate the mother's parental rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the trial court listened to hours of testimony, questioned witnesses personally, was very engaged in the hearing, took judicial notice of other proceedings involving the mother, including criminal proceedings, and reviewed her cases carefully, and concluded that her conduct was not likely to change in a reasonable period of time. The Supreme Court also noted that the psychologist's testimony indicated that the mother's improvement was possibly the result of not having to care for the children and noted the psychologist's continuing concern for the mother's ability to protect the children from abuse or potentially harmful relationships and her unstable moods resulting from deeply rooted personality disorders that were resistant to change. The children's best interests were paramount and took precedence over the mother's parental rights, and the termination order was affirmed. Child in Foster Care for Nineteen Continuous Months — Termination of Parental Rights Presumed to Be in Child's Best Interests: If a child has been in foster care for 15 of the most recent 22 months, the best interests of the child are presumed to be served by the termination of parental rights, pursuant to 41-3-604. Here, after the children were placed with their foster parents, they lived in the foster home for 19 continuous months as of the hearing to terminate parental rights. The District Court did not err in applying the presumption in 41-3-604 in terminating parental rights. In re E.K., C.K., & J.E., 2001 MT 279, 307 M 328, 37 P3d 690 (2001).

Failure of Parents to Comply With Any of Five Different Treatment Plans — Child's Best Interests Paramount: To ensure the proper care of their sexually abused children, the state devised five different treatment plans for the parents over a 2-year period, but none of the plans were successful, so the state sought to terminate parental rights. The parents did not challenge the finding that their children were youths in need of care, but did challenge the appropriateness of the treatment plans, the finding that the plans were unsuccessful, and the finding that their conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The Supreme Court affirmed the termination. Primary consideration must be given to the best interests of the child as demonstrated by the child's physical, mental, and emotional conditions and needs, and the child's interests take precedence over parental rights. Here, the treatment plans were directed at protecting the children from further sexual abuse within the home and were thus appropriate. Although the parents complied with some obligations of the treatment plans, partial compliance is an insufficient basis upon which to premise error in a finding that a plan was not complied with. Further, a District Court should assess a parent's past and present conduct in determining whether that parent's conduct is unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In this case, ongoing incest between the siblings characterized the parents' inability to provide a safe environment to protect the younger children in the foreseeable future. The children had been in periodic foster care for several years, and numerous treatment plans were provided to the parents, who had considerable time to comply. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating parental rights based on these findings of fact. In re D.H., S.H., K.H., N.S., & J.B., 2001 MT 200, 306 M 278, 33 P3d 616 (2001). No Evidence of Significant Change in Parenting Ability — Termination of Parental Rights in Children's Best Interests to Establish Permanency and Stability: The District Court granted permanent custody of three children with the Department of Public Health and Human Services (DPHHS) in 1996 after finding that the mother failed to complete her treatment plan and that existing conditions that rendered the mother unfit were unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The Supreme Court affirmed in In re C.M., 281 M 183, 932 P2d 1063 (1997). The DPHHS subsequently petitioned to terminate the mother's parental rights to two of the children. Reiterating its findings from the 1996 order, the District Court determined that no evidence had been presented that the mother had made any significant progress in her ability to parent, concluding that it was in the children's best interests to terminate the mother's parental rights because the children needed permanent placement to successfully progress in their therapy. The court did grant the mother the right to visit the children when the DPHHS determined that the children were psychologically ready for visitation to occur. The mother appealed. The Supreme Court examined the evidence and affirmed. The children's continued fantasy of being returned to their mother's care someday was detrimental to the therapeutic process, and termination of parental rights was supported by substantial evidence and not otherwise clearly erroneous. In re Custody & Parental Rights of F.M. & S.M., 2001 MT 93, 305 M 189, 24 P3d 208 (2001).

Children's Best Interests Met by Termination of Parental Rights:

The District Court's finding, that it was in the child's best interests to terminate the mother's parental rights, was amply supported in the record. The mother proved unable to follow her doctor's recommendations in regard to exposing her children to her adult male companions, demonstrated a repeated inability to put her children's needs before her own (including her historical inability to select appropriate male companions and accept responsibility for placing the children in dangerous circumstances), had an inconsistent history of visitation, and was unable to meet the youngest child's need for a family environment characterized by very high levels of nurturance, stability, and predictability and by freedom from further risk of sexual abuse or violence. In re B.F., R.F., & M.S., 2000 MT 231, 301 M 281, 8 P3d 790, 57 St. Rep. 954 (2000).

Father argued that the best interests of his children did not require termination of his parental rights, pointing to instances in the transcript where the foster mother testified she had no objection to supervised contact and where a psychologist testified that some contact would pose little risk to the children. However, termination was proper in light of substantial credible evidence by the child psychologist who counseled the children and recommended no visitation and by the father's evaluating psychologist who testified that termination might be beneficial to father in the long run. In re S.P., 241 M 190, 786 P2d 642, 47 St. Rep. 190 (1990).

Termination of Parental Rights Rather Than Award of Temporary State Custody Pending Parent's Release From Prison — Child's Best Interests: Rather than award temporary custody to the state pending release of the mother from incarceration, the District Court terminated the mother's parental rights instead, which she asserted was error. Adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care was not disputed, and two treatment plans were not successful. In reaching its decision that the mother's fitness to parent was unlikely to change, the court considered the mother's possible long-term confinement as well as all reasonable efforts by state protective services to rehabilitate her, relying on evidence regarding her parenting skills, the length of her incarceration, and the child's bonding with a foster family after placement with the family 3 weeks after birth. The court properly gave primary consideration to the physical, mental, and emotional needs of the child and correctly determined that, in the child's best interests, termination of the mother's parental rights was proper rather than awarding temporary custody to the state pending the mother's release from prison. Absence of Court-Approved Treatment Plan Not Bar to Termination of Parental Rights — Warning to Follow Law in Future Cases: In proceedings to terminate a mother's parental rights, the Department prepared and executed a treatment plan, but the mother refused to sign it. The plan was filed with the court, but the judge failed to officially sign it. The court found that the mother had allowed her children to be sexually abused or exploited and terminated her parental rights. The mother appealed on the grounds that this section requires a court-approved treatment plan before parental rights may be terminated. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the termination despite the requirements of this section and warned the Department to follow the law in future cases or risk reversal of terminations. This section does not require that the parent sign the treatment plan in order for the court to approve it. In re Inquiry Into M.M., 274 M 166, 906 P2d 675, 52 St. Rep. 1170 (1995).

Failure to Complete Alcohol Treatment Programs Grounds for Termination of Parental Rights: T.M., whose mother died when he was 14 months old, was diagnosed as having fetal alcohol syndrome and required constant parental supervision. His father was repeatedly incarcerated for alcohol-related offenses and unable to take care of T.M. during those times. T.M.'s father also repeatedly failed to complete treatment programs for alcohol abuse, domestic violence, and anger management. The Supreme Court held that in applying its standard of review, the lower court's decision to terminate T.M.'s father's parental rights was not clearly erroneous given the fact that the record showed that the father had failed to complete required treatment and that it was in the best interests of the child that the father's parental rights be terminated. In re Custody of T.M., 267 M 75, 881 P2d 1333, 51 St. Rep. 952 (1994).

Status as Youth in Need of Care as Satisfaction of Prerequisites for Best Interests Test: The mother argued that the lower court erroneously applied the "best interests of the children" standard in terminating her parental rights. The Supreme Court ruled that the lower court was correct in applying the standard because its finding that the children were youth in need of care met the threshold requirement of finding dependency, abuse, or neglect. In re B.H.M., C.M.M., & J.T.H., 245 M 179, 799 P2d 1090, 47 St. Rep. 1967 (1990), followed in In re Custody & Parental Rights of M.D., 262 M 183, 864 P2d 783, 50 St. Rep. 1505 (1993).

Mother's Conduct Unlikely to Change Significantly Despite Evidence of Recent Rehabilitation: The trial court properly terminated a mother's parental rights and awarded custody of her two children to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) with the authority to consent to adoption when it was shown to be in the best interests of the children. Substantial evidence established that the children were abused and neglected; the mother had agreed to an approved treatment plan but failed to meet its conditions; and the conduct or condition that rendered the mother an unfit parent was not likely to change within a reasonable time. The court properly considered evidence of the mother's alleged rehabilitation but its determination, based on 6 years of neglect and abuse, that her conduct was unlikely to change significantly in the future was based on substantial evidence and was not an abuse of its discretion. In re C.A.R. & P.J.R., 214 M 174, 693 P2d 1214, 41 St. Rep. 2395 (1984).

ABANDONMENT

Sufficient Evidence of Abandonment — Termination of Father's Parental Rights Proper: The District Court did not err in terminating a father's parental rights when the father lived out of state for the child's entire life, made no attempt or plan to establish a relationship with the child, failed to provide any care or financial support for the child, and failed to comply with his treatment plan. The District Court properly gave primary consideration to the emotional needs of the child and determined that the father's conduct was unlikely to change. In re M.J.C., 2014 MT 122, 375 Mont. 106, 324 P.3d 1198.

Termination of Parental Rights — Willful Surrender of Children to Other Parent Without Maintaining Contact for 3 Years — Abandonment of Children: In 2001, the parties divorced and the mother received custody of their two children. In 2006, to avoid termination proceedings against her, the mother stipulated with the Department of Health and Human Services (the Department) to transfer custody of the children to the father. Three years later, the Department removed the children from the father and petitioned to terminate the parental rights of both parents. The District Court ultimately terminated the mother's parental rights, finding that the mother had willfully abandoned the children. The mother appealed, alleging that she could not have abandoned the children when she did not have custody of them. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's ruling that the mother had abandoned her children because she had surrendered custody and had not maintained any contact with the children since 2008. In re E.M.S. and C.A.S., 2011 MT 307, 363 Mont. 68, 265 P.3d 1258.

Stepparent's Petition to Terminate Biological Parent's Parental Rights Granted Given Evidence of Abandonment: A custodial stepparent has standing to petition for termination of a noncustodial parent's parental rights. In this case, the custodial stepmother petitioned for and was granted termination of the noncustodial mother's rights in order to allow for adoption of the child by the stepmother. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court concluded that the mother abandoned the child and thus was an unfit parent. As evidence of abandonment, the court did not err in considering: (1) the mother's time in prison and residential drug treatment, during which she had no contact with the child; (2) during the mother's periods of absence, the mother's struggle with an abusive relationship, use of illegal drugs, and associations with known criminals; (3) the mother's failure to follow through on commitments to care for and visit the child; and (4) a lack of intent on the mother's part to resume care of the child in the future, regardless of any understanding that an initial parenting plan was temporary. Evidence of abandonment was substantial, and the District Court did not err in granting the petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. In re Adoption of K.P.M., 2009 MT 31, 349 M 170, 201 P3d 833 (2009).

Two-Year Wait to Assert Parental Rights — Failure to Advise Parent of Right to Counsel Harmless Error: A father who was incarcerated waited more than 2 years to file for relief following termination of his parental rights, asserting that he was denied due process by not being provided notice of the right to counsel. The Supreme Court agreed that fairness requires that a parent be represented by counsel at parental termination proceedings, but in this case, the error was harmless because the lack of notice was not prejudicial to the father. There was adequate evidence to terminate the father's parental rights, and even if he had been notified and represented by counsel, there was no way that an attorney would have made a difference under the circumstances and the result would have been the same. Denial of the motion for relief was affirmed. In re P.D.L., 2004 MT 346, 324 M 327, 102 P3d 1225 (2004).

Improper Termination of Rights of Noncustodial Parent on Grounds of Abandonment Absent Showing of Willful Surrender of Custody: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights after finding that he abandoned his children by willfully surrendering physical custody for a period of 6 months without manifesting a firm intention to resume physical custody or making permanent physical arrangements for care of the children. The father appealed on grounds that he could not have willfully surrendered custody because he did not have physical custody of the children, who were initially with the mother and then in state foster care. The Supreme Court agreed. Acknowledging that pursuant to In re M.W., 234 M 530, 764 P2d 1279 (1988), it is possible for a court to find that a noncustodial parent has abandoned children, that finding must be based on evidence that the parent did not intend to resume the children's care, which was not the case here. Rather, the District Court in this case found that the father willfully surrendered physical custody, which was directly controverted by the fact that the father could not surrender custody that he did not have. Termination of the father's parental rights under that theory of abandonment was reversible error. In re T.C. & W.C., 2001 MT 264, 307 M 244, 37 P3d 70 (2001).

No Treatment Plan Required to Terminate Parental Rights When Child Abandoned: A mother's parental rights were terminated based on the determination that she had abandoned her children, and the mother appealed. The children had been in out-of-home placement for longer than 1 year, and the mother had no contact with the children for almost 6 years, so no court-approved treatment plan was ever devised for the mother. The Supreme Court found that the mother's minimal efforts to contact the Department of Public Health and Human Services after termination proceedings were initiated were not sufficient to show the mother's intent to resume the care of her children, so the District Court did not err when it terminated the mother's parental rights on grounds of abandonment. A treatment plan is not required when the District Court finds that a parent has abandoned a child. In re J.J. & C.J., 2001 MT 131, 305 M 431, 28 P3d 1076 (2001).

Evidence of Intent to Remedy Child's Situation During Time of Alleged Abandonment — Finding of Abandonment Reversed: The state alleged abandonment by father from September 1994 to January 1995. Evidence showed that father had an unimpressive history as a parent, offering little or no financial or emotional support during the first 5 years of his son's life. Nevertheless, father's actions during the time in question, including a petition to modify the dissolution decree to allow him visitation, contact with the mother to arrange visitation, and a trip from Wisconsin to visit his son, precluded a finding of abandonment during that finite period. In re W.Z., 285 M 16, 946 P2d 125, 54 St. Rep. 1019 (1997).

Termination of Parental Rights Based on Abandonment — Sporadic Attempts to Maintain Custody of Child Held Insufficient: Linda, the natural mother of P.E., left P.E. at a camping site with persons barely known to Linda. For the next 14 months, Linda traveled with persons with known criminal records, failed to give social workers her address and phone number on several occasions, failed to accept or maintain gainful employment, and failed to keep appointments with social workers or to appear at hearings to determine the status of P.E. Despite her expressed intent to resume physical custody, the District Court terminated her parental rights. Citing In re Adoption of C.R.D., 240 M 106, 782 P2d 1280 (1989), the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that Linda's sporadic attempts to maintain physical custody of P.E. did not constitute "a firm intention to resume physical custody" pursuant to 41-3-102. In re P.E., 282 M 52, 934 P2d 206, 54 St. Rep. 237 (1997).

Presence of at Least One Threshold Requirement Necessary — Abandonment: Mother willfully surrendered physical custody of her 6-month-old twins to a neighbor, with the representation that it would be for the day. About 3½ years later, the twins continued to reside with the neighbor, with no evidence that mother ever indicated that she intended to resume custody or attempted to make permanent legal arrangements for the children's care. It was not an abuse of discretion for the District Court to conclude that the children were abandoned pursuant to subsection (1)(b) of this section and that parental rights should be terminated. A court must determine the presence of at least one of the threshold requirements set forth in subsection (1) of this section to terminate a parent-child relationship. Because abandonment was a sufficient basis for termination of parental rights, it was not necessary to determine whether there was a sufficient basis for termination under other provisions of subsection (1) of this section. In re D.H. & F.H., 264 M 521, 872 P2d 803, 51 St. Rep. 386 (1994).

Six-Month Abandonment Requirement Applicable Only to Willful Surrender of Physical Custody: The requirement in 41-3-102(3)(d) that applies a 6-month period to the definition of abandonment that is part of the definition of harm to a child's health or welfare is applicable only to the willful surrender of physical custody of the child. It was therefore proper to terminate the parental rights of a parent who left children for a 5-month period under circumstances that made reasonable the belief that the parent did not intend to resume care of them. In re A.E., C.E., S.R., & J.R., 255 M 56, 840 P2d 572, 49 St. Rep. 877 (1992), followed in In re W.Z., 285 M 16, 946 P2d 125, 54 St. Rep. 1019 (1997).

Lack of Contact for Three Years Constituting Abandonment: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the parental rights of a father who abandoned his child by having no contact for 3 years and by indicating at no time his intention to resume custody until he learned his parental rights had been terminated. In re M.W., 234 M 530, 764 P2d 1279, 45 St. Rep. 2107 (1988).

Statute Constitutional — Abandonment by Noncustodial Parent: Father whose parental rights were terminated questioned the constitutionality of this section with regard to noncustodial parents. The Supreme Court found that the legal relationship between father and child did not change despite the facts that the mother was awarded custody and that the father failed to continue in his obligations to the child. In determining what constitutes abandonment, 41-3-102 considers the action of the parent responsible for the child's welfare, not the action of the custodial or noncustodial parent. In re M.W., 234 M 530, 764 P2d 1279, 45 St. Rep. 2107 (1988).

Evidence of Abandonment — Termination Proper: Evidence of abandonment warranting termination of parental rights was sufficient when the father had no contact and did not state any intention of resuming care of his children for a period of 2 years and did not make known his intention to acquire custody until 3 months after he was informed of the custody proceedings filed by the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). In re M.J.D., C.K.D., & A.R.D., 225 M 200, 731 P2d 937, 44 St. Rep. 167 (1987).

Abandonment — Termination Proceedings to Be Fundamentally Fair: Termination of a natural parent's right to care and custody of a child is a fundamental liberty interest in Montana, which must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures. In a proceeding to terminate parental rights, the mother testified that on the advice of a social worker she refused to disclose to the father, who was in prison, the name of the child's foster parents; the father testified that while in prison he had tried to contact his son and see how he was doing. The Supreme Court held that this testimony contradicted the District Court's finding that father had abandoned child, and the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court for additional findings of fact and conclusions in light of specific requirements of 41-3-102. The Supreme Court also found the District Court record insufficient to conclude whether or not implementation of a treatment plan was attempted or feasible. The rights of parents cannot be terminated unless the parents have failed to comply with a court-approved treatment plan. ABUSE AND NEGLECT

Misapprehension of Stipulations — Termination Proper: The District Court determined a child to be abused or neglected and terminated the parental rights of the child's mother. She appealed, arguing the court had not held fundamentally fair procedures and had found her child to be a youth in need of care based on a stipulation she did not make. The Supreme Court affirmed, noting that the mother was afforded fundamentally fair procedures and had equal opportunity to present evidence and test evidence entered by the Department of Public Health and Human Services. The Supreme Court also noted that a determination of abuse or neglect was sufficient in the case and noted the mother's statements that supported the finding. In re C.S., 2020 MT 127, 400 Mont. 115, 464 P.3d 66.

No Reliance on Previous Adjudication of Youth in Need of Care — Termination Improper: The District Court terminated a mother's parental rights, and the mother appealed. The issue concerned whether the District Court properly determined the child to be abused or neglected while providing the mother fundamentally fair procedures. In a previous case, the child had been placed with the child's father, resolving issues of neglect. The Supreme Court ruled that the state cannot rely on an adjudication as a youth in need of care or a determination of abuse and neglect from a prior case and reversed the termination of parental rights. In re D.D., 2020 MT 126, 400 Mont. 105, 464 P.3d 60.

Continued Neglect of Children Sufficient Basis for Termination of Mother's Parental Rights Without Reunification Efforts: A mother appealed the District Court's termination of her parental rights to her two children under 41-3-423 on the basis of neglect. The Supreme Court held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the mother's parental rights without requiring reunification efforts because the record established that the mother's history of continued and worsening drug use and neglect of her children amounted to "chronic, severe neglect" under 41-3-423(2)(a) and that reunification efforts and treatment plans were not in the best interests of the children. In re E.Z.C., 2013 MT 123, 370 Mont. 116, 300 P.3d 1174. See also In re J.A.B. and L.M.F., 2015 MT 28, 378 Mont. 119, 342 P.3d 35.

Chronic, Severe Neglect — Termination of Parental Rights Affirmed — Consideration of Prior Petition Proper: The parents appealed the District Court's finding that they had subjected their children to chronic, severe neglect and its order terminating their parental rights. The parents argued that the Department of Public Health and Human Services was collaterally estopped from introducing evidence contained in a prior petition for temporary legal custody of the children to establish chronic, severe neglect in the present petition. The parents also argued that their conduct did not rise to the level of chronic, severe neglect. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding the elements of collateral estoppel were not met because the issues in the current and prior petitions were not identical and the prior petition was not dismissed as a final judgment on the merits. The Supreme Court upheld the District Court's finding of chronic, severe neglect, noting that discrete instances of neglect, when viewed within a consistent pattern of similar behavior, provide a clear basis for a finding of chronic, severe neglect. In re M.N., J.N., Jr., & R.N., 2011 MT 245, 362 Mont. 186, 261 P.3d 1047. See also In re E.Z.C., 2013 MT 123, 370 Mont. 116, 300 P.3d 1174, and In re L.N., 2014 MT 187, 375 Mont. 480, 329 P.3d 598, in which the Supreme Court affirmed the termination of parental rights to L.N., the fourth child of the parents of J.N., M.N., and R.N. (see above), on the basis that the parents had previously subjected their older children to chronic and severe neglect.

Requirement That Child Be Adjudicated Youth in Need of Care Met by Parents' Stipulation in Adoption of Treatment Plans — Harmless Error: A father contended that all proceedings related to a parental rights termination were invalid because the children had never been formally adjudicated as youths in need of care. The Supreme Court found that in this case, the absence of a formal adjudication was harmless error because the parents previously agreed that their children were abused or neglected when the parents stipulated to that fact during the adoption of four separate treatment plans. The evidence of abuse and neglect was overwhelming, and if the parents had objected to temporary legal custody or to subsequent District Court findings or if they had disputed the status of the children as youths in need of care, the District Court could have easily made a ruling on the children's status at that time. The parents were afforded full due process at every stage and had ample opportunity to object to the proceedings and findings, yet they stipulated and agreed to the District Court findings through counsel at every turn. Although failure to adhere to statutory requirements governing termination proceedings will generally constitute grounds for reversal, this case was one of the rare occasions that application of the harmless error doctrine was warranted. The procedural error did not affect the outcome of the termination proceedings or substantively prejudice the parents, and termination was affirmed. Evidence of Parent's Conviction for Sexual Abuse of Child Sufficient Basis for Termination of Parental Rights: The state petitioned to terminate C.T.'s parental rights on grounds that his child S.T. and the child's mother had lived with C.T. for 2 years, that C.T. was a convicted sex offender, and that both mother and child had been exposed to domestic violence. Without objection, the District Court took judicial notice of C.T.'s conviction for sexual intercourse with a minor and granted the state's petition. C.T. appealed on grounds that the court abused its discretion by terminating his parental rights on the basis of facts not alleged in the petition or supported by the evidence, asserting that even though the court took judicial notice of the conviction, that court never received the documents into evidence and therefore erred by relying on that evidence in entering its findings of fact. The Supreme Court declined to recognize a distinction between taking judicial notice and entering the noticed facts into evidence. In a civil proceeding, judicially noticed facts are accepted as conclusive, and once a fact is judicially noticed, the party offering the evidence is relieved of the duty to also move for its admission. Thus, C.T.'s conviction was not subject to reasonable dispute, and the District Court was entitled to rely on the conviction as clear and convincing evidence that C.T. had sexually abused a child and to rely on 41-3-423(2)(a) as a statutory basis for terminating C.T.'s parental rights. The District Court was affirmed. In re S.T., 2008 MT 19, 341 M 176, 176 P3d 1054 (2008).

Chronic and Severe Neglect Inclusive of Emotional Neglect: In terminating parental rights without reunification services, the state relied on 41-3-423 and this section in a case of chronic, severe neglect of a child. A parent asserted that parental rights may not be terminated based on a finding of severe emotional neglect, but the Supreme Court held that by definition, neglect includes psychological harm to a child. (See 2023 amendment to 41-3-102.) Here, the parent's ongoing drug use and repeated incarceration resulted in the parent's unavailability to the child and inconsistent caregiving, and this neglect in turn produced high anxiety and emotional disturbance in the child. Parental rights were thus properly terminated based on chronic, severe emotional neglect. In re Custody & Parental Rights of D.S., 2005 MT 275, 329 M 180, 122 P3d 1239 (2005). See also In re M.N., J.N., Jr., & R.N., 2011 MT 245, 362 Mont. 186, 261 P.3d 1047, which held that discrete instances of neglect, when viewed within a consistent pattern of similar behavior, provide a clear basis by which a District Court can find chronic, severe neglect, and In re E.Z.C., 2013 MT 123, 370 Mont. 116, 300 P.3d 1174.

Failure to Protect Child From Physical Abuse and to Feed Child — Sufficient Evidence of Abuse: Following termination of her parental rights, a mother contended that there was insufficient evidence to find that she had abused her child. The Supreme Court disagreed. There was convincing testimony that the mother failed to protect the child from physical abuse by her boyfriend and that on at least one occasion, she neglected to feed the child until 4:30 p.m. This evidence met the statutory definition of child abuse or neglect, and the characterization of her treatment of the child as abuse was not clearly erroneous. In re Custody & Parental Rights of C.J.K., 2005 MT 67, 326 M 289, 109 P3d 232 (2005).

Adjudication of Child as Youth in Need of Care Based on Prospective Abuse Proper: A mother relinquished custody of her three children after the District Court determined that the children were in need of care. When she became pregnant again, the state moved for emergency protective services for the fourth child upon the child's birth. The father contended that because the child was removed from the parents at birth, the child was never abused or neglected and thus could not properly have been adjudicated as a youth in need of care. Citing In re C.P., 2001 MT 187, 306 M 238, 32 P3d 754 (2001), the Supreme Court disagreed. The circumstances related to the prior termination of the mother's parental rights to her three children had not changed, and because she would also be the primary caregiver for the fourth child, there was substantial risk to the health and welfare of the newborn child as well, so the District Court did not err in adjudicating the fourth child as a youth in need of care based on prospective abuse. In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003).

Substantial Risk of Harm to Child — Parental Rights Terminated Despite Lack of Evidence of Abuse or Neglect: A girl was born to a mother who was later divorced and remarried. When the girl was 15, she had sexual intercourse with her stepfather and conceived a baby. The state petitioned for temporary investigative authority (TIA) and emergency protective services (see 2001 amendment to 41-3-427) over both the girl and her baby, pursuant to 41-3-402 (renumbered 41-3-427). The mother then agreed to divorce the stepfather so that he could marry the girl. The petition regarding the girl was dismissed because she was married and was no longer subject to the mother's parental control. At the show cause hearing on the petition regarding protection of the baby, a state social worker testified that, although there was no indication of actual abuse or neglect of the baby, there was concern for the baby's safety should the baby be placed in the home with the girl and stepfather. The state ultimately petitioned to terminate the girl's parental rights to the baby. The District Court determined that the baby was a youth in need of care and terminated the girl's parental rights. The girl appealed on grounds that the court's determination that the baby was a youth in need of care was erroneous, absent any evidence of abuse, neglect, or abandonment, and that the petition for TIA was insufficient on its face because it contained no allegations that the baby was abused or neglected. However, the definition of abuse or neglect in 41-3-102 includes either actual harm or the substantial risk of harm. Thus, the report required by 41-3-427 need set forth in detail only facts supporting the petition's request for TIA based on the assertion that a child is abused or neglected or is in danger of being abused or neglected. The social worker's testimony was considered sufficient to support a finding that there was substantial risk of harm to the baby if returned to the girl's custody; therefore, the District Court's determination that the baby was a youth in need of care was correct. The court's finding that under the circumstances, the baby had little hope of a normal emotional, moral, and psychological development with his parents was also supported by substantial evidence and was not clearly erroneous, based on the social worker's testimony that the girl's relationship with the stepfather was unhealthy, that the family unit exhibited extremely poor boundaries, and that the girl had obvious psychological damage from being sexually abused by her father and would, without successful treatment, be unable to set appropriate boundaries for the baby or be able to understand the risk of harm that her relationship with the stepfather posed to the baby. The Supreme Court affirmed. In re D.T.H., 2001 MT 138, 305 M 502, 29 P3d 1003 (2001).

Child in Danger of Abuse and Neglect Subject to Adjudication Regardless of Whether Actual Abuse or Neglect Occurred: A child who is in danger of being abused or neglected may be considered a youth in need of care regardless of whether actual abuse or neglect occurred, irrespective of a parent's care for the child prior to the parent's incarceration or commitment to a mental hospital. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Record Showing Child to Be Youth in Need of Care and Failure of Mother to Complete Treatment Plan Held Sufficient for Termination of Parental Rights: The parental rights of M.M., the natural mother of A.W-M., were terminated by the District Court based on its finding that A.W-M. was a youth in need of care and that M.M. failed to complete her treatment plan. The Supreme Court reviewed the District Court record and found that the record contained substantial credible evidence that A.W-M. was a youth in need of care, including evidence that A.W-M. was left with a babysitter when she was 7 months old and sick with bronchitis, that after treatment, doctors would not release A.W-M. to her mother's care because her mother "appeared to be high", that M.M. made little effort to comply with her treatment plan, and that A.W-M. had been left with other caregivers for indefinite periods of time. The Supreme Court also found substantial evidence that M.M. could not be expected to complete her treatment plan in the foreseeable future, including evidence that she tested positive for use of a controlled substance, was unable to obtain stable employment or housing, failed to attend court-ordered counseling, visited only sporadically with A.W-M., and agreed in her testimony that she should not be given further time to comply with her treatment plan. In re A.W-M., 1998 MT 157, 289 M 333, 960 P2d 779, 55 St. Rep. 628 (1998).

Absence of Court-Approved Treatment Plan Not Bar to Termination of Parental Rights — Warning to Follow Law in Future Cases: In proceedings to terminate a mother's parental rights, the Department prepared and executed a treatment plan, but the mother refused to sign it. The plan was filed with the court, but the judge failed to officially sign it. The court found that the mother had allowed her children to be sexually abused or exploited and terminated her parental rights. The mother appealed on the grounds that this section requires a court-approved treatment plan before parental rights may be terminated. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the termination despite the requirements of this section and warned the Department to follow the law in future cases or risk reversal of terminations. This section does not require that the parent sign the treatment plan in order for the court to approve it. In re Inquiry Into M.M., 274 M 166, 906 P2d 675, 52 St. Rep. 1170 (1995).

Lack of Care, Supervision, and Guidance — Threats of Sexual and Physical Abuse — Termination Proper: After finding that the children were youths in need of care because they were not under the care and supervision of a suitable adult, had no proper guidance, and were threatened with sexual and physical abuse, the District Court properly terminated mother's parental rights, noting her failure to comply with a treatment plan or to change her conduct that continually endangered her children. In re A.W. & A.V., 247 M 268, 806 P2d 520, 48 St. Rep. 192 (1991).

Continuation of Unfitness of Parents: Evidence in an action to terminate parental rights showing that father had a history of violent behavior, had been arrested for physically abusing his wife, and was known to have abused his children; that both parents routinely drank alcoholic beverages to excess, that they became aggressive and violent under the influence of alcohol, and that they were generally unable to properly care for their children at such times; and that counseling had been unsuccessful because of the parents' hostile and uncooperative attitude and failure to participate clearly supported the finding under subsection (2) of this section that the conduct or condition of the parents rendering them unfit was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Inability to Follow Through on Treatment for Chronic Mental Condition Sufficient to Warrant Termination of Rights: A mother's undifferentiated schizophrenia was a chronic condition, and because of her inability to follow through on her prescribed psychiatric treatment plan, the conduct that rendered her unfit as a mother was not likely to change within a reasonable time. Termination of her parental rights was proper. In re J.W. & J.C., 232 M 46, 757 P2d 769, 45 St. Rep. 855 (1988).

Sexual Abuse and Failure to Seek Treatment — Parental Rights Terminated: The District Court was presented with clear and convincing evidence that children were sexually abused, but the abusive parent did not enter into treatment or have the court approve an appropriate treatment program and was evaluated at court order only. The court properly terminated the parent's rights on the merits. Custody of R.A.D. & J.D., 231 M 143, 753 P2d 862, 45 St. Rep. 496 (1988).

Reasonable Time for Change — Construction With Age of Child: The trial court properly terminated a father's parental rights when there was substantial credible evidence to the effect that despite his good intentions to do so, the father was unable to provide for his child's mental and emotional needs. The child's age (9 years) made it imperative that she be provided with a loving, stable home as soon as possible. Expert testimony indicated that her well-being could not stand further delay. In re D.S.N., 222 M 312, 722 P2d 614, 43 St. Rep. 1291 (1986).

Termination of Mother's Rights — Test: The State met its burden of proof and District Court acted within the proper scope of discretion in terminating mother's parental rights where, among other things, testimony showed that the father lived apart from the mother, the residence was in a consistently filthy and deplorable condition, the child had inadequate sleeping facilities, meals, and clothing, the mother had been evicted three times because of the condition of the home, the child was beginning to manifest autistic behavior, and the mother had been diagnosed as a paranoid schizophrenic with serious ambivalence in regard to her roles as a mother and a person and a lack of ongoing capacity to provide long-term care for the child. Clear and convincing evidence in the record that a child is neglected and that it is in the best interests of the child that parental rights be severed sustains judgment declaring the child to be in the need of care and granting state agency permanent custody with the right to consent to adoption. Mother Alleged Insufficient Visitation and Insufficient Access to Services Prior to Termination — No Failure of Active Efforts When Mother Did Not Request Additional Services: During a District Court hearing on termination of parental rights, a mother with a disability elicited testimony that she may have benefited from more frequent therapeutic sessions and visitation sessions with her children. The District Court terminated her parental rights. The mother appealed, arguing that the insufficient services and visitation demonstrate that the District Court erred in finding that she was unlikely to become fit to parent within a reasonable time. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding that there was no error and that the District Court appropriately weighed the evidence, particularly in light of the fact that the mother never requested additional services or visitation and that evidence supported the conclusion that the child would suffer serious emotional or physical harm if placed in the mother's care. In re K.L.N., 2021 MT 56, 403 Mont. 342, 482 P.3d 650.

Questioning by Guardian Ad Litem at Hearing Allowed — Partial Compliance — Extension of Temporary Legal Custody Proper: The Department of Public Health and Human Services petitioned for emergency protective services following reports of inappropriate behavior by the minors' parents. Eventually, at a hearing to terminate the father's parental rights, the District Court allowed the minors' guardian ad litem to question a child protection specialist and therapist over the objections of the father. The District Court subsequently terminated the father's parental rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the District Court did not err in allowing the children's guardian ad litem to cross-examine witnesses, although some lines of questioning lacked foundation and should have not been permitted. The Supreme Court also found that the Department provided reasonable efforts to reunify the father with the children, that the father's partial compliance with the treatment plan was not sufficient for compliance, that while the Department did not file for a formal motion to extend an order for temporary legal custody the Department nevertheless requested it, and that the father failed to identify which of his three attorneys he believed were ineffective over the course of his 4-year case. In re B.F., 2020 MT 223, 401 Mont. 185, 472 P.3d 142.

Relapse and Domestic Violence at Level of Chronic, Severe Neglect — Termination Proper: In a case involving years of drug abuse relapses and domestic violence, the District Court terminated parental rights without requiring the Department of Public Health and Human Services to make reasonable efforts to reunify the family, finding the aggravated circumstance of chronic, severe neglect. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, finding substantial support for the determination in the repeated history of drug abuse and domestic violence in the child's home. In re C.S., 2020 MT 127, 400 Mont. 115, 464 P.3d 66.

Two Years of Continued Methamphetamine Use — Proper Finding That Condition Unlikely to Change: The District Court terminated the parental rights of a mother who continued to use methamphetamine, did not successfully attend inpatient treatment as recommended by her counselors, and had only one clean urinalysis in 2 years. The District Court found that the conduct or condition rendering the mother unfit to parent was unlikely to change in a reasonable time. On appeal, the Supreme Court reviewed for abuse of discretion and affirmed, finding that the District Court did not clearly err by its finding. In re A.B., 2020 MT 64, 399 Mont. 219, 460 P.3d 405.

Reasonable Efforts When Noncommunicative Parent Moves Out of State: A mother with substance abuse problems failed in many ways to act on the treatment plan created by the Department of Public Health and Human Services and then moved to Idaho, from where she failed to maintain communication with the Department. Subsequently, the District Court terminated the mother's parental rights. Relying on In re R.J.F., 2019 MT 113, 395 Mont. 454, 443 P.3d 387, the mother appealed on the basis that the Department had not made reasonable efforts. Reviewing for abuse of discretion, the Supreme Court affirmed, explaining that the facts showed reasonable efforts by the Department and that the mother had unilaterally moved out of state and failed to maintain contact with the Department. In re R.L., 2019 MT 267, 397 Mont. 507, 452 P.3d 890.

Admission of Drug Results at Termination Hearing Improper — Sufficient Evidence in Support of Termination of Parental Rights: During a parental rights termination hearing, the District Court, citing 41-3-112(4), admitted the parents' drug test results through a court-appointed special advocate (CASA) and subsequently terminated the parents' rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that admitting the drug test results through the CASA was erroneous. The Supreme Court stated that 41-3-112(4) was enacted to allow a guardian ad litem to gather information from collateral sources to form and make recommendations as to the best interest of the child and that the subsection was not enacted as a bypass for the Department of Public Health and Human Services to admit evidence that would otherwise be inadmissible or to cure a party's failure to call a witness to testify. However, the Supreme Court affirmed, finding that admitting the drug test results was harmless and reversal was not warranted because substantial evidence supported the District Court's determination that the parents had failed to complete their treatment plans and that their conduct or the conditions rendering them unfit were unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In re I.M., 2018 MT 61, 391 Mont. 42, 414 P.3d 797.

Failure to Comply with Treatment Plan — Excuse of Misunderstanding Plan Discounted — Termination Proper: Although the mother conceded that she failed to complete most of her treatment plan, she claimed that she mistakenly believed that an alternative plan was being created and that she therefore did not have to comply with the plan. The District Court, however, terminated her parental rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, noting that the fact she had somewhat complied with portions of the treatment plan belied her claim that she did not think she had to complete it. In re A.S., 2016 MT 156, 384 Mont. 41, 373 P.3d 848.

Parent's Perpetual Absence — Implied Finding That Parent Conduct Unlikely to Change Proper — Termination Proper: After the District Court terminated his parental rights, the father appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that the court had not made the statutory finding that he was unfit and unlikely to change his behavior. Noting the father's perpetual absence from the child and from the court proceedings involving the child, the Supreme Court ruled that the District Court had cited to clear and convincing evidence that the condition rendering the father unfit to parent was unlikely to change and applied the doctrine of implied findings in affirming the termination of his rights. In re A.S., 2016 MT 156, 384 Mont. 41, 373 P.3d 848.

Termination of Parental Rights of "Non-Offending" Parent: A child was designated a youth in need of care after being removed from her mother's care. The father did not object to the designation and, although the father was deemed the "non-offending parent", the child was not placed with him because he testified that he could not financially support her or provide her a place to live. The District Court approved a document that had been prepared by the Department of Public Health and Human Services as a treatment plan for the father. However, while the child was in foster placement, the father stopped visiting the child, was placed in jail for partner-family member assault, and was alleged to be using meth. The District Court terminated the father's rights. On appeal, the father argued that he had never received a treatment plan. However, the Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed, noting that even if the term "treatment plan" had been crossed out and the word "checklist" had been written next to it, the content of the document constituted a treatment plan. In re K.B., 2016 MT 73, 383 Mont. 85, 368 P.3d 722.

Unsuccessful Treatment Plan — Incarceration Not Sole Basis of Conclusion — Termination Proper: A father appealed the termination of his parental rights, arguing that the District Court had abused its discretion by concluding that the treatment plan was not successful. Although a District Court may not conclude that a treatment plan has been unsuccessful solely because the parent is incarcerated, the Supreme Court noted that, in this case, the District Court had cited instances of bad behavior by the father while imprisoned that served as the basis for the District Court's termination of rights. Given the District Court's supported findings that the father had "an inability to conform his conduct to law" based on his behavior while incarcerated, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the District Court's conclusion was supported. Mother Unlikely to Change Within Reasonable Time: The Department of Public Health and Human Services removed the mother's two children from her care after 17 referrals over a period of 3 years. The mother stipulated to a treatment plan and to having the District Court adjudicate her children as youths in need of care. However, the mother subsequently failed to abide by the stipulated treatment plan. The District Court eventually terminated the mother's parental rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the District Court properly found that the conduct or condition that made the mother unfit to parent was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Treatment Plan Executed in Good Faith Despite Case Worker Turnover — Due Process Not Violated in Termination Proceedings: The mother appealed the termination of her parental rights, arguing that she was denied due process of law when the Department of Public Health and Human Services did not execute her treatment plan in good faith because it did not adequately account for her history as a victim of domestic violence and because she was assigned six different child protection specialists during the course of her case. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the Department took notice of the mother's history as a victim of domestic violence and, given the Department's provision of numerous services and its efforts to reunite the family, the fact that the mother was assigned numerous case workers did not in itself establish a due process violation. In re T.D.H., 2015 MT 244, 380 Mont. 401, 356 P.3d 457.

Termination of Mother's Rights Appropriate Despite Treatment Plan's Failure to Include Chemical Dependency Evaluation — Ineffective Counsel: In a termination of parental rights proceeding, the District Court found that the mother did not complete the approved treatment plan and that she was unlikely to change within a reasonable time because of her drug problem. On appeal, the mother argued that while she and her attorney agreed to the treatment plan, it was deficient because it failed to include a chemical dependency evaluation. The mother also argued that her counsel was ineffective for failing to advocate for the inclusion of an evaluation in the plan. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court, holding that while the failure of the treatment plan to include substance abuse evaluation and treatment was notable, the best interests of the children supported termination of her rights, the difference was being offered help with the drug problem and being required to get help, and the failure to advocate for a treatment plan did not prejudice the mother. In re T.N.-S., 2015 MT 117, 379 Mont. 60, 347 P.3d 1263, followed in In re J.E.L., III, 2018 MT 50, 390 Mont. 379, 414 P.3d 279.

Father's Partial Compliance With Treatment Plan Insufficient — Sufficient Evidence to Support Termination: The Department of Public Health and Human Services initiated a parental rights termination proceeding, alleging the father presented a risk to his children. The District Court ultimately terminated the father's rights. On appeal, the father argued that the Department failed to act in good faith and failed to provide reunification services, that he had partially completed his treatment plan, and that it was reasonable for him to improve. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the Department was not biased and did not act in bad faith, that a parent does not complete a treatment plan by partial or even substantial compliance with a treatment plan, and that the evidence supported the determination that the father was unlikely to improve. In re A.K., 2015 MT 116, 379 Mont. 41, 347 P.3d 711.

Mother's Failure to Follow Treatment Plan With Ample Opportunity — Fitness of Parent Unlikely to Change: The mother's parenting rights were terminated and she was given approximately 2 years to follow a treatment plan. Ultimately, the District Court found that the mother would not be able to achieve long-term change necessary to provide for her children. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the mother was given sufficient time and that sufficient evidence showed she was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In re A.H., 2015 MT 75, 378 Mont. 351, 344 P.3d 403, followed in In re J.E.L., III, 2018 MT 50, 390 Mont. 379, 414 P.3d 279.

Termination of Parental Rights — Transfer to Tribal Court Denied: The birth mother of a minor considered an Indian child under the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) forfeited parental care, was arrested for DUI, failed in attempts to reunite with the child, and subsequently failed to follow the District Court's treatment plan. Similarly, the father denied paternity, refused to voluntarily undergo paternity tests, and exhibited no interest in caring for the child. The state placed the child in an ICWA-qualified foster home. Eighteen months after the foster care placement, the tribe moved to transfer to tribal court, which was denied by the District Court. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion because ICWA did not require transfer to tribal court and that 41-3-604 and 41-3-609 were satisfied because the mother failed to comply with her parenting plan. In re S.B.C., 2014 MT 345, 377 Mont. 400, 340 P.3d 534.

Child Removed From Mother's Care — Child Subsequently Placed With Father — Motion to Dismiss Mother's Termination Proceedings Correctly Denied: The state removed the petitioner's child from her home based on allegations of abuse and neglect. After the District Court adjudicated the child a youth in need of care, the child's paternity was established. The mother did not comply with the terms of her treatment plan and the state filed a petition to terminate her parental rights. Days prior to the termination hearing, the child was placed with the father after he successfully completed his treatment plan. The mother filed a motion to dismiss the petition because the child had been placed with the father and therefore had been reunited with the child's parent. The District Court denied the motion to dismiss the petition, noting that the child had not been reunited with the mother. Moreover, the District Court concluded, and on appeal the Supreme Court agreed, that 41-3-424 was not intended to benefit a noncompliant, offending parent based on the compliance of a nonoffending parent. In re L.V-B., 2014 MT 13, 373 Mont. 344, 317 P.3d 191.

Untimely Objection to Treatment Plan: A mother appealed the termination of her parental rights, arguing that her court-ordered treatment plan was inadequate because it did not take into account the pain that was the root cause of her addiction. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that raising the objection for the first time at the termination hearing was not timely. Her failure to timely object resulted in the waiver of any argument about the plan's appropriateness on appeal. Furthermore, the mother had stipulated to the plan, and it had taken into account the mother's particular problems. In re C.B., 2014 MT 4, 373 Mont. 204, 316 P.3d 177. See also In re M.B., 2018 MT 205, 392 Mont. 368, 424 P.3d 606.

Failure to Object to Treatment Plan in Timely Manner Precludes Court Consideration of Issue: After a father's parental rights to his children were terminated, the father and his attorney stipulated to the treatment plan and did not object to the fact that it did not address the father's hearing impairment. By failing to object, the father waived any right to argue on appeal about the propriety of the treatment plan. In re T.S., 2013 MT 274, 372 Mont. 79, 310 P.3d 538. Court Determination Regarding Danger of Physical or Emotional Damage to Child — Testimony by ICWA Expert Required — Supplementary Evidence Permitted: Sufficient evidence that reunification would cause serious physical or emotional damage to the children requires testimony by an Indian Child Welfare Act expert; however, such evidence may be supplemented by other evidence in the record, such as a parent's drug use and inability to overcome drug addictions despite treatment programs. In re D.A. and M.A., 2013 MT 191, 371 Mont. 46, 305 P.3d 824, following In re K.B. and T.B., 2013 MT 133, 370 Mont. 254, 301 P.3d 836.

Factors Court May Consider When Evaluating Active Efforts of Department Under ICWA — Incarceration, Supervised Status, and Other Absences: When evaluating whether the Department of Public Health and Human Services made sufficient active efforts to unify a parent with her children under the Indian Child Welfare Act, a court may consider the parent's incarceration, supervised status, and absences while on the lam. Here, the record established beyond a reasonable doubt that the Department undertook active efforts to reunite the parent and her children while trying to work around the parent's incarceration, supervision, and chemical dependency problems. In re D.A. and M.A., 2013 MT 191, 371 Mont. 46, 305 P.3d 824, following A.A. v. Dept. of Family and Youth Services, 982 P.2d 256 (Alaska 1999).

Failure to Comply With Treatment Plan Sufficient to Justify Termination of Parental Rights: The birth mother alleged on appeal that the state failed to prove at the termination hearing that her treatment plan was appropriate or, in the alternative, that the state failed to prove that she did not comply with her treatment plan. The Supreme Court held that a parent who does not object to a treatment plan waives the right to argue on appeal that the plan was not appropriate and that complete compliance with a treatment plan is required. In re H.R. and D.R., 2012 MT 290, 367 Mont. 338, 291 P.3d 583, following In re L.H., 2007 MT 70, 336 Mont. 405, 154 P.3d 622, and followed in In re D.S.B., 2013 MT 112, 370 Mont. 37, 300 P.3d 702. Compliance With Treatment Plan — Actual Effectuation of Purposes Required: Based on the facts of the case, the District Court did not abuse its discretion when it terminated parental rights based on whether the parents complied with the appropriate treatment plan. District Courts must do more than mechanistically check items off a task list. A court must determine whether parents have actually effectuated the purposes of a treatment plan — a parent does not successfully complete a treatment plan by partial or even substantial compliance. In re I.B., 2011 MT 82, 360 Mont. 132, 255 P.3d 56.

Department's Reunification Efforts Held Reasonable — Termination of Parental Rights Over Siblings Held Sufficient Justification — No Abuse of Discretion: After the District Court terminated a mother's parental rights over her child C.J., the mother appealed, claiming as unreasonable the 4½ months that passed between the petition by the Department of Public Health and Human Services (Department) to be exempted from the "reasonable efforts" for reunification requirement under 41-3-423(2)(e), because the mother's rights over C.J.'s two siblings had also been terminated, and the date of the hearing. The Supreme Court held that the Department's efforts were reasonable notwithstanding the Department's petition, that there was no timeline provided in the statutes for the hearing, that the delay in holding the hearing did not subject the mother to a fundamentally unfair proceeding, and that the mother was correctly not given a treatment plan because her circumstances met the requirements of 41-3-609(1)(d) and 41-3-423(2)(e) regarding termination of a mother's rights over one child because her rights over other siblings were previously terminated. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that there was no abuse of discretion by the District Court in terminating the mother's parental rights over C.J. In re C.J., 2010 MT 179, 357 Mont. 219, 237 P.3d 1282.

Incarceration of Parent for More Than One Year — No Requirement for Treatment Plan Prior to Termination of Parental Rights: When her child was only 1 month old, a mother was extradited to Texas and subsequently was sentenced to 2 years in prison. The state sought to terminate parental rights based on the mother's long-term incarceration and the needs of the baby. The District Court found that the baby deserved permanency and that the mother had not shown any likelihood that she could provide needed care considering her history of substance abuse, failure to participate in ordered treatment, continued criminal conduct, and long-term incarceration. The court therefore terminated the mother's parental rights and awarded permanent legal custody of the child to the state, with the right to consent to adoption. The mother appealed on grounds that it was improper to terminate parental rights without first providing an opportunity to complete a treatment plan. The Supreme Court concluded that because the mother was incarcerated for more than 1 year, there was no requirement that a treatment plan be implemented prior to termination of parental rights. Reunification with the mother was not in the best interests of the child, considering placement options and the child's developmental, cognitive, and psychological needs and age. Termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re J.A.S., 2010 MT 47, 355 Mont. 302, 228 P.3d 1119.

Failure of Treatment Plan and Parent's Behavior Unlikely to Change: A mother stipulated that her child was a youth in need of care and subsequently failed to comply with her treatment plan, having been arrested and incarcerated for several felony offenses before completing the plan. There was also substantial evidence that the mother was unlikely to change her behavior in a reasonable time, being deeply involved in alcohol abuse and domestic violence, unable to control her anger and aggression, and a high risk to violate conditions of her parole and to return to prison. Termination of the mother's parental rights was affirmed. In re A.J.W., 2010 MT 42, 355 Mont. 264, 227 P.3d 1012.

Mother's Stipulation That Child Be Adjudicated Youth in Need of Care Prior to Determination of Child's Status as Indian — Parental Termination Proceedings Not Invalidated: The state petitioned for termination of a mother's parental rights based on her lack of progress with the court-ordered treatment plan. The state recognized the child's Indian status and notified the Blackfeet Tribe. The tribe's motion to intervene in order to monitor the proceedings was granted, and the mother's parental rights were terminated the following day after the mother stipulated to adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care. The mother subsequently appealed on grounds that it was error to terminate her parental rights prior to a determination that the child was subject to the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA). The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed. The District Court complied with ICWA in finding by clear and convincing evidence that the child was a youth in need of care and that the child's best interests would be served by termination of the parent-child relationship. The fact that the court accepted the mother's stipulation before definitively establishing the child's Indian status did not invalidate the proceedings. The District Court was affirmed. In re J.M., 2009 MT 332, 353 M 64, 218 P3d 1213 (2009).

Minimal Progress on Treatment Plan With No Hope of Improvement — Termination of Parental Rights Affirmed: Despite repeated warnings in open court and repeated attempts by her social worker and other professionals who tried to work with her, a mother still had not completed treatment plan requirements after 1 year or changed her destructive habits of living with violent substance-abusing men, failing to maintain employment, and failing to take personal responsibility for the serious situation she was in regarding her children. Absent a demonstration that she was committed to making reunion with her children her most important goal or that her situation was not going to change within a reasonable time, the District Court did not misapprehend the court's role or requirements of law in terminating the mother's parental rights. In re C.M.C., 2009 MT 153, 350 M 391, 208 P3d 809 (2009).

Parent in Long-Term Federal Incarceration Unable to Comply With Treatment Plan — Termination of Parental Rights Affirmed: The District Court terminated the parental rights of a father who was incarcerated in federal prison for a long-term sentence. The father asserted that the District Court erred in terminating his parental rights because it was not in the children's best interests and that the court should have allowed the children to continue their relationship with their loving, but temporarily absent, father. The Supreme Court disagreed. The best interests of the child are of paramount importance and take precedence over parental rights, and the need for permanent placement of children in a loving and stable home supersedes the parents' interests. The District Court kept informed about the children's placements and placement failures and made arrangements for their placement in a stable home. Given the fact that the father's long-term incarceration would not provide the opportunity for adequate parenting, and the father's failure to comply with a court-ordered parenting plan, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by terminating the father's parental rights and placing the children in permanent foster care. In re B.S. & G.S., 2009 MT 98, 350 M 86, 206 P3d 565 (2009).

Petition as Adequate Notice: The Supreme Court held that the Department of Public Health and Human Services' affidavit and petition for emergency protective services, adjudication as youth in need of care, and temporary legal custody unquestionably gave the mother notice that the allegations were more than actual physical abuse. In re T.C., 2008 MT 335, 346 M 200, 194 P3d 653, (2008).

Failure to Modify Written Treatment Plan Following Neuropsychological Evaluation Not Error: Following remand pursuant to In re D.B. & D.B., 2007 MT 246, 339 M 240, 168 P3d 691 (2007), the District Court applied the original treatment plan, setting out 21 specific tasks the mother was to accomplish. The mother subsequently underwent a neuropsychological evaluation that identified cognitive and emotional disabilities, but the written treatment plan was not revised to specifically address the results of the evaluation, which the mother asserted rendered the treatment plan inappropriate. The Supreme Court disagreed. There was sufficient evidence to support the appropriateness of the plan, including: (1) testimony from counselors that they were aware of the diagnoses and modified their assistance methods accordingly; (2) evidence that the treatment plan was customized in numerous ways to meet the mother's particular needs; and (3) tasks established in the treatment plan could have been undertaken immediately and pursued on an ongoing and simultaneous basis. Individual Explanations for Findings That Conduct and Conditions Unlikely to Change — Termination Affirmed: Following remand pursuant to In re D.B. & D.B., 2007 MT 246, 339 M 240, 168 P3d 691 (2007), the District Court applied the original treatment plan, setting out 21 specific tasks the mother was to accomplish. The court subsequently examined each of the conditions for compliance and terminated the mother's parental rights. Although the court determined that eight of the tasks had been accomplished and found that the mother's conduct related to five tasks was unlikely to change, the court was not able to definitively conclude whether the mother's conduct regarding the eight remaining tasks was unlikely to change. Nevertheless, the court provided individual explanations for its findings related to all the tasks and thus met the statutory requirement to consider whether the mother would continue to be unfit, unable, or unwilling to provide her children with adequate parental care. The District Court was affirmed. In re D.B. & D.B., 2008 MT 272, 345 M 225, 190 P3d 1072 (2008).

Failure to Complete Treatment Plan and Lack of Evidence That Conduct Likely to Change in Reasonable Time — Children in Foster Care for 17 of 22 Months — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: When D.A. was born in 2003, he and both parents tested positive for methamphetamine, and the state immediately obtained temporary custody of D.A. The case was dismissed 10 months later. When M.A. was born in 2005, the mother again tested positive for methamphetamine, and the state removed both children and placed them in foster care. The parents completed treatment plans and the children were returned to their care. About 2 months later, the parents were arrested on drug-related charges and the children were again removed, placed in foster care, and adjudicated youths in need of care. The parents agreed to another treatment plan, which included addressing and conquering their drug addictions and maintaining visitation with their children, increasing visitation when appropriate, and increasing parenting responsibilities until they were reunited with their children. However, the parents never completed the treatment plan, and their visitation actually decreased because of the children's negative reactions to the visits. Rather than adopt the state's proposed permanency plan calling for reunification, the District Court ordered the state to take steps to permanently place the children. Subsequently, after the children had been in foster care for 17 of the previous 22 months, the state moved to terminate the parents' rights. At the hearing, witnesses testified that it would take another year to know if reunification would be possible. In the interests of the children, the District Court terminated the parents' rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court correctly held that the parents had not completed their treatment plan and that as a matter of fact the conditions rendering the parents unfit were unlikely to change in a reasonable time, based on their past drug use and the effect their use had on their ability to care for their children. Nor was it error for the court to consider the presumption that, because the children had been in foster care for 17 months, termination of parental rights was in the children's best interests. Additionally, there was sufficient evidence for the court to conclude that the state's permanency plan was not in the children's best interests, and having rejected the plan, the court had the authority to order the state to take specific steps to effectuate an alternate plan, which could include adoption of the children. Entering the order following the permanency hearing to advance the children's best interests did not constitute plain error or violate the parents' due process rights, and termination of parental rights was not plain error or an abuse of discretion. In re Custody & Parental Rights of D.A. & M.A., 2008 MT 247, 344 M 513, 189 P3d 631 (2008), followed in In re T.N.-S., 2015 MT 117, 379 Mont. 60, 347 P.3d 1263.

Failure to Abide by Drug Use Restrictions and Housing Requirements in Treatment Plan — Termination of Parental Rights Warranted: A mother's treatment plan required her to remain drug and alcohol free and to maintain appropriate housing for her children. The state asserted that the mother had failed both conditions and sought to terminate her parental rights. The District Court agreed and terminated her parental rights. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Evidence showed that the mother continued to use drugs, even in the presence of her children, was arrested for drug possession, failed numerous urinalysis tests, and failed to show up for drug testing on several occasions. The mother also failed to maintain appropriate housing for her children for 12 of the first 14 months from the beginning of the treatment plan, having lost her housing because of nonpayment of rent. The children were removed from their mother's custody on three separate occasions during periods of sobriety and relapse, yet the children's removal did not prompt the mother to refrain from drug use or from continued abusive relationships that threatened both her and her children. The District Court did not err in concluding that the mother's conduct rendering her unfit to parent was unlikely to change. Failure to abide by the terms of the treatment plan and continuing inappropriate conduct were sufficient to warrant termination of parental rights. In re E.D., N.T., & M.S., 2008 MT 216, 344 M 228, 186 P3d 1283 (2008).

Failure to Apply Proper Statutory Criteria in Termination Proceedings — Reversible Error: Instead of applying the statutory criteria in this section when considering whether to terminate a mother's parental rights, the District Court relied on the legal presumption in 41-3-604 that because the children had been in foster care for 15 of the prior 22 months, termination was appropriate. The Supreme Court reversed. A parent's right to the care and custody of a child is a fundamental liberty interest that must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures. The legal presumption in 41-3-604 alone is not a sufficient basis to terminate parental rights and neither eliminates the substantive requirements in this section nor diminishes the clear and convincing burden of proof on the party seeking to terminate parental rights. By relying on the presumption in 41-3-604, the District Court impermissibly shifted the burden of proof to the mother by concluding that there was insufficient evidence to rebut the presumption. It was not the mother's duty to rebut the presumption, but rather the state's burden to show that the mother failed to complete a treatment plan and that the mother's conduct or condition was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Because the District Court applied the wrong statutory standards, the order terminating parental rights was reversed and the case was remanded for application of the proper statutory criteria. In re D.B. & D.B., 2007 MT 246, 339 M 240, 168 P3d 691 (2007), distinguished on other grounds by In re C.B., 2014 MT 4, 373 Mont. 204, 316 P.3d 177.

Lower Court Finding That Mother's Inability to Parent Unlikely to Change Within Reasonable Period of Time Upheld: The appellant argued that the lower court erred in terminating her parental rights because the facts demonstrated that she was making progress toward making the changes required by her treatment plan. The Supreme Court held that the appellant's argument that she was making progress failed to address the relevant issue of whether she would make the necessary changes within a reasonable time and therefore the appellant had failed to meet her burden of showing that the lower court's findings were clearly erroneous. In re D. F., 2007 MT 147, 337 M 461, 161 P3d 825 (2007).

Mother Allowed to Challenge Trial Court's Findings Respecting Her Treatment Plan Resulting in Termination of Her Parental Rights: The appellant did not object to any of the procedures followed in the lower court proceedings concerning the termination of her parental rights but did argue that the trial court erred in rendering its factual findings. The Supreme Court stated that parental rights are a fundamental liberty interest that must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures and that the lower court's finding of fact were subject to review as to whether the findings were clearly erroneous. The trial court found that the appellant had performed some of the requirements of the treatment plan but had failed to meet other parts, including urinalysis testing. The lower court ruled that in failing to perform all required tasks, the appellant had failed to achieve the overall changes contemplated by the treatment plan. The Supreme Court rejected the appellant's argument that the Supreme Court could excuse noncompliance with any particular aspect of the treatment plan and held that the lower court was correct in finding that the treatment plan had not been fully complied with and that therefore the mother's parental rights should be terminated. In re D. F., 2007 MT 147, 337 M 461, 161 P3d 825 (2007).

Parent's Continued Drug Use Unlikely to Change — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: Facts presented at the termination hearing showed that although the mother successfully completed inpatient drug treatment, maintained sobriety for a time, and was moving toward successful completion of her treatment plan, she relapsed and began using methamphetamine again, and the use continued until the termination hearing. Additionally, she had numerous probation violations, the violations were increasing, she failed to maintain employment, and she had no plan for supporting herself or her child. The child had also been in foster care for more than 17 months, but rather than make every effort to maintain her sobriety so that she could parent her child, the mother's relapses continued. The District Court concluded that despite all the available resources, the mother's addiction was stronger than her desire to remain sober and parent her child and that the condition or conduct rendering the mother unfit to parent was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The mother's parental rights were properly terminated. In re A.S., 2006 MT 281, 334 M 280, 146 P3d 778 (2006).

Supreme Court Avoids Ruling on Whether Parental Rights Termination Proceedings Subject to Americans With Disabilities Act: The father in a parental rights termination proceeding argued that because it was found that he was mentally ill, the Department of Public Health and Human Services violated the Americans With Disabilities Act of 1990 by having his parental rights terminated rather than accommodating his mental illness. The Supreme Court avoided ruling on whether parental termination proceedings are subject to the Act, ruling instead that clinical psychologists had testified that the father would not be able to parent within a reasonable time or for the foreseeable future, indicating that there was no way to accommodate the father's mental illness. In re M.H. & G.H., 2006 MT 208, 333 M 286, 143 P3d 103 (2006).

Conclusion That Parent's Conduct Unlikely to Change Based on Three Failed Treatment Plans — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: Following termination of a mother's parental rights, she appealed on grounds that the District Court's finding that her conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time was clearly erroneous based on her recent sobriety and the opinions of counselors that she could overcome her drug addiction. The Supreme Court held that the finding was not clearly erroneous because it was founded on the mother's well-documented drug history and the fact that the District Court had witnessed her fail three different court-approved treatment plans because of continuing drug use. The evidence that finding that her conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time was substantial and not misapprehended, and the District Court properly acted in the best interests of the children. Termination of the mother's parental rights was affirmed. In re B.B. & J.B., 2006 MT 66, 331 M 407, 133 P3d 215 (2006).

History of Treatment Plan Noncompliance — Termination Despite Recent Efforts to Comply: A mother's parental rights were terminated after the District Court found that her unfitness was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The mother appealed, asserting that the court had erred by relying on past conduct when she had made recent progress in her rehabilitation efforts. The Supreme Court noted that a District Court must assess both past and present conduct and that the decision to terminate parental rights must to some extent be based on a parent's past conduct. In this case, experts testified that the mother had chronic disabilities that precluded her from parenting adequately and that despite efforts to help her learn necessary skills through parenting and anger management classes, she exhibited an inability to implement the lessons. Although the mother had made some progress, the District Court did not err in finding that her conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time and in subsequently terminating her parental rights. In re A.J.E., 2006 MT 41, 331 M 198, 130 P3d 612 (2006).

Total Treatment Plan Compliance Required — Termination Based on Parent's Lack of Responsibility for Conduct Affirmed: A parent contested termination of parental rights, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Uncontested findings showed that the parent did not satisfy the requirement for complete compliance with a treatment plan. Testimony regarding failure of the parent to take responsibility for continued consumption of alcohol and other behaviors and actions constituted substantial evidence that the parent's conduct or condition was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating parental rights. In re T.L. & K.L., 2005 MT 256, 329 M 58, 122 P3d 453 (2005).

Inability of Parent to Relieve Child of Problems Associated With Pathological Parenting Within Reasonable Time — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: A mother admittedly failed to comply with two treatment plans established to deal with her child's serious attachment and behavioral disorder caused by long-term pathological parenting, but she took issue with the District Court's finding that the condition rendering her unfit was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Upon review, the Supreme Court affirmed termination of the mother's parental rights. The state made reasonable efforts to assist the mother in completing the treatment plans, including referrals and payment for a variety of services, and gave the mother an adequate opportunity to address the problems that prevented her from adequately parenting her child. However, the mother failed to provide sufficient evidence showing what had changed that would now cause her to complete her treatment in a reasonable time. Thus, the District Court properly concluded that the conduct or conditions rendering the mother unfit to parent were unlikely to change within a reasonable time and did not abuse its discretion in terminating her parental rights. In re R.T., 2005 MT 173, 327 M 498, 116 P3d 783 (2005).

Appropriateness of Treatment Plans Recommending Parent Seek Treatment for Diagnosed and Undiagnosed Mental Disorders: The Supreme Court has not established a precise test by which to determine whether a particular treatment plan is appropriate, but one factor to be considered is whether a treatment plan addresses the particular circumstances facing both the parent and child. Here, the mother contended that her second and third treatment plans were inappropriate because they required that she obtain treatment for bipolar disorder, for which she had not been formally diagnosed, and because the plans failed to address her posttraumatic stress disorder, for which she had been diagnosed, and to recommend treatment for that condition. The Supreme Court noted that the mother herself testified that she had bipolar disorder and that the treatment plan required that she seek treatment for bipolar disorder and any other condition for which she had been diagnosed. Thus, the treatment plans appropriately covered both disorders, and because the mother failed to successfully comply with the treatment requirements or challenge the other relevant findings, her parental rights were properly terminated. In re D.G. & R.G., 2005 MT 139, 327 M 266, 114 P3d 201 (2005).

Failure of Parent to Meet With Professionals, Conduct Visits With Children, Live Independently, and Address Codependency Issues — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: A mother failed to comply with treatment plan requirements that she attend AlAnon meetings, meet with her social worker, attend visits with her children, detail how she would deal with a seizure by one of her children, live independently and not fall back into abusive relationships that put her children at risk, not allow anyone to reside in her home without approval, and address codependency issues and recognize the risks to her children and herself from associating with people under the influence of alcohol or drugs. This evidence was sufficient to show that the mother failed to comply with the treatment plans and, coupled with evidence that her conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time, was sufficient to warrant termination of the mother's parental rights. In re A.A. & D.A., 2005 MT 119, 327 M 127, 112 P3d 993 (2005), followed in In re L.H., 2007 MT 70, 336 M 405, 154 P3d 622 (2007).

Failure to Timely Object to Appropriateness of Parental Treatment Plan — Waiver of Right to Object: A mother contended that certain requirements of her treatment plans were inappropriate and should not have been considered in terminating her parental rights. However, the mother was represented by counsel at all stages of the matter, including negotiation of the treatment plans, and with advice of counsel agreed to three of the four plans. By failing to object to the treatment plan requirements in a timely manner, the mother waived the argument that portions of the plans were inappropriate. The Supreme Court declined to hold the District Court in error for an action to which the mother acquiesced. In re A.A. & D.A., 2005 MT 119, 327 M 127, 112 P3d 993 (2005). See also In re C.J.M., 2012 MT 137, 365 Mont. 298, 280 P.3d 899.

Complete Treatment Plan Compliance Required — Sufficient Evidence to Support Termination of Parental Rights: Following termination of her parental rights, the mother argued that her minor noncompliance with her treatment plans did not render her an unfit parent. The Supreme Court noted that complete compliance with a treatment plan is required and that substantial or partial compliance is insufficient to prove a parent's fitness or responsibility. Here, the evidence showed that the mother had a long history of choosing drugs over her children and that she either suffered from serious medical problems or was exaggerating the problems in order to claim that she was not capable of securing gainful employment. The District Court refused to accept the mother's claim that she was too disabled to work but was still capable of parenting a young child on a full-time basis, and the Supreme Court affirmed. In re V.F.A., 2005 MT 76, 326 M 383, 109 P3d 749 (2005), followed in In re O.A.W., 2007 MT 13, 335 M 304, 153 P3d 6 (2007). See also In re D.V., 2003 MT 160, 316 M 282, 70 P3d 1253 (2003).

Parent's Inability to Comply With Treatment Plan or Remain Drug-Free — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: Although it was a condition of a mother's treatment plan that she attend parenting classes and remain drug-free, she failed to participate in classes for 7 months and during a 6-month period, she had five positive tests and failed to show up for 16 drug tests, which were also considered failed tests. The District Court concluded that the mother's conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed. Because a court cannot see into the future to determine whether a parent's conduct is likely to change, that determination must to some extent be based on the parent's past conduct. The mother admitted that she was addicted to methamphetamine, and given her consistent inability to remain drug-free, the District Court did not err in finding that the condition rendering the mother unfit to parent was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re Custody & Parental Rights of C.J.K., 2005 MT 67, 326 M 289, 109 P3d 232 (2005). See also In re K.A., 2016 MT 27, 382 Mont. 165, 365 P.3d 478.

Treatment Plan Not Inappropriate — Completion Required: The mother was required to complete a treatment plan. Merely going through the motions but refusing to internalize the lessons and apply them to her own situation was not sufficient compliance. The inclusion in the mother's treatment plan of factors appropriate to a sexual offender based on the misdiagnosis of sexual assault was harmless error, and the mother was not required to complete that portion of the treatment plan. The mother's failure to complete other factors was sufficient to support the District Court's finding that the mother failed to complete the treatment plan. The father's incarceration was not an excuse for failure to complete the required evaluations. Requiring the evaluations as part of the father's treatment plans while he was incarcerated was not inappropriate. In re D.B., 2004 MT 371, 325 M 13, 103 P3d 1026 (2004).

Failure of Mother to Understand Children's Needs in Wake of Father's Incest — Termination Proper: A critical objective of the mother's treatment plan was to achieve an empathetic understanding of her children's needs in the wake of their sexual abuse by their father, yet witness testimony, documentary evidence, and information in the court file showed that the mother often appeared skeptical regarding the children's truthfulness concerning the abuse and was disruptive and antagonistic in Department-sponsored meetings with the children. The mother clearly failed to achieve this critical goal, and subsequent termination of her parental rights was proper based on her failure to comply with the treatment plan. Further, given the mother's long history of disregarding the children's needs, her ongoing exposure of the children to unreasonable risk, and her continued failure to protect them, there was sufficient evidence that her ability to parent was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The statutory criteria for termination of the mother's parental rights was adequately considered, and termination was affirmed. In re M.B., J.B., & W.B., 2004 MT 304, 323 M 468, 100 P3d 1006 (2004).

Failure to Complete Court-Approved Treatment Plan Grounds for Termination of Parental Rights: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights for failing to comply with a treatment plan. The father contended that the court failed to approve the plan offered by the Department. However, the record showed that the court indeed approved the plan and ordered the father to complete it and that the father stipulated to the fact that the Department had offered a treatment plan, confirmed the stipulation at the termination hearing, and testified to the fact that he had been ordered to complete the plan. Termination of the father's parental rights based on failure to complete the treatment plan was affirmed. In re M.B., J.B., & W.B., 2004 MT 304, 323 M 468, 100 P3d 1006 (2004).

Consideration of Parent's Mental Disability in Determining Whether Conduct Likely to Change — No Violation of Americans With Disabilities Act: A mother contended that she should have been granted additional time to comply with her treatment plan because of her mental disability and that failure to grant more time violated the federal Americans With Disabilities Act of 1990 (ADA). The Supreme Court declined to address the applicability of the ADA to parental termination proceedings because the District Court did in fact consider the mother's disability in determining that her inability to parent was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Thus, the criteria for termination of parental rights were properly considered, and because the mother failed to establish that the statutory criteria were not met, termination was affirmed. In re J.B.K. & J.T.K., 2004 MT 202, 322 M 286, 95 P3d 699 (2004), followed in In re M.H. & G.H., 2006 MT 208, 333 M 286, 143 P3d 103 (2006).

Unsuccessful Treatment Plan, Remedial Services, and Rehabilitative Program — Indian Parental Rights Properly Terminated: The District Court terminated the parental rights of an Indian mother. On appeal, the mother contended that the court's determination that the child would suffer serious emotional or physical damage if the child was returned to her was not proved beyond a reasonable doubt. The Supreme Court noted that state law requires successful completion of a parenting plan and that the federal Indian Child Welfare Act requires that active efforts be made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs to prevent the breakup of an Indian family, but that in this case, both the state and federal measures proved unsuccessful. The District Court received substantial testimony from qualified cultural and other experts upon which it could conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that the prospect of the mother providing primary care was likely to subject the child to serious harm, so the mother's parental rights were properly terminated. In re M.R.G., 2004 MT 172, 322 M 60, 97 P3d 1085 (2004).

Fundamental Liberty Interest Recognized in Fundamentally Fair Procedures for Termination of Parental Rights — Credibility of Witnesses Within Discretion of Trial Court: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights for failure to comply with or complete a treatment plan, including successful completion of an anger management program. On appeal, the father contended that the District Court: (1) failed to acknowledge a parent's fundamental right to the care and custody of a child: (2) gave greater credence to the testimony of the child than that of the father; (3) incorrectly found that the father had not successfully completed the anger management program; and (4) failed to consider the testimony of the father's therapist. The Supreme Court considered the arguments and affirmed. Although the District Court did not specifically address the fundamental liberty interest, the court did protect the liberty interest by following fundamentally fair statutory procedures. Further, although the father did complete all the anger management classes, he was unable to admit that he had an anger problem or demonstrate changes in his behavior after taking the program. Last, it was within the discretion of the District Court to weigh the credibility of the witnesses, and the Supreme Court declined to reweigh the evidence absent an abuse of that discretion. In re J.C.B. & L.E.C., 2004 MT 111, 321 M 110, 88 P3d 1280 (2004).

District Court Not Limited to Consideration of Only Physical Neglect in Termination of Parental Rights: The final petition for termination of a mother's parental rights specifically cited physical neglect as its basis, and the mother contended that the District Court was thus barred from considering any evidence beyond physical neglect, such as psychological abuse, as demonstrated by the living conditions in her home. The District Court did not rule on the issue, but simply made the underlying findings necessary to terminate the mother's parental rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although it may have been better if the final petition had listed other grounds, it is proper for the state to consider other causes of abuse and neglect during proceedings because the purpose of the proceedings is to protect the child. The final petition also cited failure to comply with the treatment plan as another basis for termination. The treatment plan addressed the mother's psychological issues related to her parenting skills, so the mother was clearly on notice that psychological issues could be considered. Based on the record, parental rights were properly terminated because the mother failed to comply with the treatment plan, she was unable to properly and consistently parent her children by understanding and meeting each of their needs, her conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time relevant to the developmental needs of the children, and termination was in the best interests of the children. In re J.G., C.G., & M.G.-E., 2004 MT 104, 321 M 54, 89 P3d 11 (2004). See also In re T.D.H., 2015 MT 244, 380 Mont. 401, 356 P.3d 457.

Partial Attempts to Rehabilitate and Comply With Treatment Plan Compared to History of Noncompliance — Finding of Unlikelihood of Fitness Within Reasonable Time Affirmed: A mother did not contest that her children had been adjudicated in need of care or that she had failed to comply with her treatment plan, but did assert an insufficiency of evidence that she was unlikely to become a fit parent within a reasonable time. The District Court compared the mother's partial attempts to comply with her treatment plan in the 3 months preceding the hearing to her history of noncompliance over the course of 17 months and concluded that, taken as a whole, it was unlikely that the mother would become a fit parent within a reasonable time. Noting that evidence of rehabilitation on the part of a parent is germane to the issue of that parent's ability to care for a child in the future but does not render a District Court powerless to find future danger to the child, the Supreme Court found no error in the determination that despite some evidence of rehabilitation, the conduct rendering the mother unfit was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re J.C. & R.B., 2003 MT 369, 319 M 112, 82 P3d 900 (2003).

Complete Compliance With Treatment Plan Required: Substantial or partial compliance with a treatment plan is insufficient to prove that a person is prepared to be a fit or responsible parent. The District Court did not err when it found that, despite the fact that a mother completed a chemical dependency evaluation, the condition rendering her unfit was unlikely to change in a reasonable time because she made minimal efforts to comply with a treatment plan by failing to consistently submit to random drug testing, failed to submit verification of attendance at required meetings, did not attend individual counseling and psychiatric appointments, neglected to take prescribed medications, and failed to maintain a healthy relationship with her children by maintaining frequent and consistent contact. In re S.H. & B.H., 2003 MT 366, 319 M 90, 86 P3d 1027 (2003).

No Abuse of Discretion in Giving More Weight to Testimony of Guardian Ad Litem Than Parent: In determining the best interests of the children, the District Court relied more on the testimony of a guardian ad litem than on that of the mother. The mother contended that the guardian's testimony was highly prejudicial and based on hearsay, violated her due process rights, and lowered the state's burden of proof. She also contended that the statute that allowed the guardian's testimony was unconstitutional. Without reaching the issue of constitutionality, the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court did not rely on the guardian's testimony in determining whether the mother complied with her treatment plan or whether her unfitness was likely to change within a reasonable time. Those criteria were established by other testimony, so the District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the mother's parental rights. In re S.H. & B.H., 2003 MT 366, 319 M 90, 86 P3d 1027 (2003).

Sufficient Evidence of Failure to Comply With or Complete Six Treatment Plans — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: A mother of four children had six court-approved treatment plans over several years. The most recent plan included a provision that the mother not see the father of two of the children. Nevertheless, the two continued their relationship, which culminated in removal of the children following a violent domestic disturbance. The state sought to terminate the mother's parental rights, and despite the mother's contention that she had made some progress on the treatment plans, the District Court terminated her parental rights. The Supreme Court affirmed. There was sufficient evidence that the mother continued her drug use, did not submit timely drug tests, missed meetings and counseling sessions, was belligerent, failed to maintain a job or provide stable income, missed the children's medical, dental, counseling, and day-care appointments, and failed to maintain a home apart from the children's father or deal effectively with that relationship. Absent evidence that conditions were likely to change within a reasonable time, parental rights were properly terminated. In re T.J.H., J.H., J.L., & A.L., 2003 MT 352, 318 M 528, 81 P3d 504 (2003).

No Demonstration of Mental Stability Necessary to Parent High-Needs Children — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: The last two court-approved treatment plans established four goals for the mother: (1) address her mental health issues; (2) establish a stable, consistent, and safe environment for the children; (3) address the children's mental health needs; and (4) establish a healthy relationship with the children and effectively parent. The District Court found that the mother failed to comply with the treatment plan and terminated her parental rights. The mother appealed on grounds that she was complying with the terms of the treatment plan, but the Supreme Court affirmed. To successfully complete the plan, the mother needed to demonstrate that she would no longer become overwhelmed with the stresses of her life, which she failed to do. After receiving services under various social programs, she would show improvement for a time but invariably relapsed into her previous way of doing things as she became overwhelmed. She missed meetings and was likely to return to the lifestyle that gave rise to the proceedings. She failed to comply with the plan because she denied the state access to her mental health care providers. Most importantly, she did not demonstrate sufficient mental ability to be able to parent her high-needs children. Parental rights were properly terminated. In re C.H., S.H., & D.H., 2003 MT 308, 318 M 208, 79 P3d 822 (2003).

Failure to Meet Department Treatment Plan — Rights Terminated:

Substantial evidence supported the District Court's conclusion that the mother did not comply with all of the tasks and goals of her treatment plan and that the conduct or condition rendering her unable to adequately parent her children was not likely to change in a reasonable time. The District Court properly resolved any conflicting evidence and terminated the mother's parental rights. In re A.F. & A.C., 2003 MT 254, 317 M 367, 77 P3d 266 (2003).

A family preservation treatment plan listed four goals: (1) a plan for reunification; (2) a safety plan for the children; (3) timelines; and (4) a backup plan, including concurrent placement. The parents acknowledged that they did not comply with the goal of completing tasks within the established timelines, and the Department had been working with the parents for more than a year to get them to complete the treatment plans in order to reunify the family. Safety and cleanliness goals were not met, and psychological profiles of the parents indicated a lack of ability to provide a safe and appropriate home environment for their young children. There was little evidence that the condition rendering the parents unfit was likely to change within a reasonable time. The parents' compliance with the various treatment plans was characterized by a pattern of increasing their efforts as hearings approached and then slipping back into their previous behavior patterns. The statutory criteria for terminating parental rights was met, and the District Court did not err in doing so. The parents' contention of District Court error in finding that the mother had lost custody of another child because of her inability to parent, which was unsupported in the record, did not constitute grounds for dismissal because the error would have had no significant impact on the result and was therefore harmless. In re C.B. & J.B., 2001 MT 42, 304 M 252, 20 P3d 117 (2001), and In re J.O., 2015 MT 229, 380 Mont. 263, 354 P.3d 1242.

Findings of fact that were applied in terminating mother's parental rights were not clearly erroneous. She had failed to comply with and successfully complete two treatment plans, and conditions making her unfit as a parent, including chronic alcoholism, were unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In re W.Z., 285 M 16, 946 P2d 125, 54 St. Rep. 1019 (1997).

The children of Kevin and Toni were adjudicated "youths in need of care", and a court-approved treatment plan was established. More than a year after the plan was established, the District Court found that neither Kevin nor Toni had successfully completed the plan and that neither was likely to complete the plan within a reasonable time. The District Court found that neither parent had maintained weekly contact with a social worker, neither obtained a parenting assessment and evaluation, and for some time, neither complied with the requirement that each submit to random drug and alcohol urinalysis. When Toni did comply, she tested positive for cocaine use three times. Both Kevin and Toni failed to comply with the treatment plan when they failed to report their incarceration to a social worker. Additionally, Kevin and Toni together and Toni individually at times lived in one bedroom apartments that were not suitable for their children, even though the treatment plan required them to maintain a home suitable for the children. The record also showed that the children had not been attending school, the parents had taught the children how to shoplift, and neither parent had returned to Montana to work on regaining custody or to visit the children. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that the District Court did not err in finding that Kevin and Toni failed to complete their treatment plan and did not err in terminating Kevin and Toni's parental rights. In re B.C., 283 M 423, 941 P2d 106, 54 St. Rep. 690 (1997).

The state showed by clear and convincing evidence that the statutory criteria for termination of parental rights had been met when proof was offered in evidence of mother's failure to: (1) obtain a valid driver's license; (2) successfully complete parenting classes; and (3) make weekly contacts with her social worker. When combined with maternal grandmother's testimony as to abuse, neglect, and exposure to alcohol and drugs, mother's parental rights were properly terminated. In re N.R.M., 261 M 502, 862 P2d 1171, 50 St. Rep. 1428 (1993).

The county Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) developed a three-phase plan designed to reunite a mother with her children. The goal of phase one was to restore the mother's mental and emotional health and capability to a level sufficient to enable her to conduct herself in a manner that would make it reasonable for mental health professionals to believe her likely to function responsibly as an adult, parent, and homemaker. Phase two called for the mother to maintain the stability established in the first phase. Phase three was to attempt to restore full custody of the children to the mother through reintegration into the mother's home. Although progress was apparent under the first two phases, failure to achieve the third phase was sufficient to warrant relinquishment of parental rights. In re A.H., T.H., & J.A.H., 236 M 323, 769 P2d 1245, 46 St. Rep. 395 (1989).

Failure to Adjudicate Youth in Need of Care Precluding Termination of Parental Rights: A parent contended that parental rights were improperly terminated because the child was not properly adjudicated as a youth in need of care. The Supreme Court noted that such adjudication is a threshold requirement before a court may grant temporary legal custody, order a parental treatment plan, or terminate parental rights. The state argued that the child was found to be a youth in need of care during earlier guardianship proceedings in a different District Court. The Supreme Court cited In re F.M., 2002 MT 180, 311 M 35, 53 P3d 368 (2002), for the holding that evidence received at a hearing on a collateral matter, such as a guardianship proceeding, did not satisfy the adjudicatory requirements of 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437). Further, it was improper for the District Court to approve a treatment plan 10 months prior to proper adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care, in violation of 41-3-420 (renumbered 41-3-443) and this section (formerly numbered 41-3-406), which also rendered the requirements of 41-3-609 unsatisfied. Because the child was not properly adjudicated a youth in need of care, court approval of a treatment plan was improper and termination of parental rights was reversed. In re B.N.Y., 2003 MT 241, 317 M 291, 77 P3d 189 (2003).

Children in Foster Care for Years Coupled With Failure to Comply With Treatment Plan — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: At least three experts testified that the mother failed to comply with a treatment plan. This fact, coupled with the fact that the children were adjudicated youths in need of care and had been in foster care for more than 15 of the most recent 22 months, was sufficient to terminate the mother's parental rights. In re K.S., D.S., & C.S., 2003 MT 212, 317 M 88, 75 P3d 325 (2003).

Finding That Continuing Parental Relationship Would Cause Child Serious Emotional and Physical Damage — Rights Properly Terminated: Termination of parental rights based on a District Court finding that a child's continued relationship with the father would likely cause the child serious emotional and physical damage, applying the best interests of the child standard, was supported by substantial credible evidence, was not an abuse of discretion, and was affirmed. In re D.V., 2003 MT 160, 316 M 282, 70 P3d 1253 (2003). See also In re D.A. and M.A., 2013 MT 191, 371 Mont. 46, 305 P.3d 824.

Completion of Five of Six Treatment Plan Elements — Improper Termination of Parental Rights of Incarcerated Parent: Although the state was aware that the father was incarcerated and would remain so during the schedule incorporated in a treatment plan, the state did not invoke subsection (4)(c) of this section, which provides that a treatment plan is not required for an incarcerated parent, but relied instead on subsection (1)(f) of this section, which allows termination of parental rights upon failure of the parent to comply with a treatment plan. The treatment plan here required the incarcerated parent to maintain a chemically free lifestyle, establish a consistent and stable lifestyle, and establish a safe environment and a healthy relationship with the children. The residential and employment requirements proved inapplicable because the parent was incarcerated, but the parent completed five of the six remaining applicable tasks related to maintenance of a chemically free lifestyle. However, development of a treatment plan with the knowledge that the parent would be incarcerated during the plan's applicable period, requiring compliance with the plan, and then terminating parental rights because incarceration rendered the plan unsuccessful did not constitute a good faith effort by the state to preserve the parent-child relationship and the family unit. Thus, it was erroneous to terminate the parental rights in this case, and the Supreme Court ordered vacation of the portion of the District Court's order that terminated the incarcerated parent's rights. In re A.T. & J.T., 2003 MT 154, 316 M 255, 70 P3d 1247 (2003). However, see In re J.B., 2016 MT 68, 383 Mont. 48, 368 P.3d 715, in which a parent's bad behavior while incarcerated served as a proper basis for determination that the parent's treatment plan was not successful.

Failure to Comply With Treatment Plan Requirement for Provision of Stable Home With Adequate Housing and Income — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: A mother relinquished custody of her three children after the District Court determined that the children were in need of care. When she became pregnant again, the state moved for emergency protective services for the fourth child upon the child's birth. When the state moved to terminate the father's parental rights based on failure to comply with two treatment plans, the father contended that because the child was removed from the parents at birth, the child was never abused or neglected and thus could not properly have been adjudicated as a youth in need of care. Because 41-3-443 requires that an adequate treatment plan must identify the problems or conditions that resulted in abuse or neglect, the father asserted that the treatment plans were not adequate because the child was not abused or neglected. The Supreme Court disagreed. Because the mother as primary caregiver could not provide for the children, the onus was on the father to provide a safe environment for the new child. Both treatment plans required that the father provide a stable home for the child with adequate housing and income, but the father could provide no evidence of substantial compliance with either plan, being unable to secure either a residence or a job. Thus, the District Court did not err in determining that both elements of this section were present and in terminating the father's parental rights. In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003).

Parent's Mental Illness, Emotional Problems, and Limited Intellectual Functioning Unlikely to Change Within Reasonable Time — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: Because of a mother's serious mental problems, emotional problems, and limited intellectual functioning, she was unable to make sufficient improvement to allow her to safely parent her children, so the District Court terminated her parental rights. The mother appealed. The Supreme Court noted the fundamental liberty interest of a parent's right to the care and custody of a child, but affirmed the termination based on substantial credible evidence that there was little chance that, despite the mother's love for her children, the mother's condition was likely to change within a reasonable time or that parenting would become easier as the children grew older, given the mother's intellectual deficits that would not improve with age. In re S.C., M.J., C.C., & K.C., 2003 MT 93, 315 M 188, 68 P3d 685 (2003).

Failure to Stop Drinking and Complete Chemical Dependency Counseling During Treatment Plan Period — Chemical Dependency and Antisocial Personality Disorder Unlikely to Change — Parental Rights Terminated: A father entered into successive treatment plans wherein he agreed to complete chemical dependency testing and counseling, attend parenting classes, contact a social worker on a weekly basis, and maintain visitation with his child in accordance with the recommendations of the child's counselor. However, the father did not stop drinking or follow through with chemical dependency counseling during the treatment plan period. The father pointed out that he and a woman with whom he was living successfully parented his biological child and two other children for 2 years prior to the termination hearing, demonstrating that his antisocial disorder and alcoholism did not preclude him from parenting. The Supreme Court was not impressed, noting that the woman's parenting ability did not compensate for the father's unwillingness to address his chemical dependency and the fact that he never established a meaningful relationship with his child. Although counselors testified that the father could address his problems through intensive therapy, the father's conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time, and his parental rights were properly terminated. In re J.V., S.V., T.V., & M.V., 2003 MT 68, 314 M 487, 67 P3d 242 (2003).

Pressure of Full-Time Employment Combined With Fragile Mental Health Making Demands of Parenting Insurmountable — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: After the mother failed to comply with a second parenting plan, the District Court terminated her parental rights. The mother appealed on grounds that she had made significant strides during the treatment plan period, addressing her chronic depression with medication and psychological counseling, securing gainful employment, and locating affordable housing. Nevertheless, the court's findings that financial and psychological problems continued to adversely impact her ability to care for her children and the likelihood that the conditions were unlikely to change within a reasonable time were not clearly erroneous. Testimony from community social workers confirmed that the pressures of full-time employment, combined with the mother's fragile mental health, made insurmountable the demands of parenting children with special needs. Parental rights were properly terminated. In re J.V., S.V., T.V., & M.V., 2003 MT 68, 314 M 487, 67 P3d 242 (2003).

Unlikely Change in Conduct and Failure to Complete Treatment Plan Within Two Years Warranting Termination of Parental Rights: Considering the District Court's unchallenged and sufficiently supported findings regarding the father's failure to complete any portion of a treatment plan within 2 years, the Supreme Court held that the District Court's finding that the father's ability to parent was not likely to change within a reasonable time was not in error. Termination of the father's parental rights was affirmed. In re L.S., 2003 MT 12, 314 M 42, 63 P3d 497 (2003).

Failure to Complete Treatment Plan Within Eighteen Months — Unfit Conduct Unlikely to Change — Termination of Parental Rights Proper: The District Court terminated the mother's parental rights. The mother argued on appeal that the court's finding that she was unlikely to complete a treatment plan and that the condition rendering her unfit was unlikely to change was erroneous because she was leading a stable, child-centered life in Wyoming. However, that argument ignored contrary testimony from a clinical psychologist, a therapist, and a social worker that she had not completed any of her treatment plans and had essentially refused to obtain mental health and alcohol counseling. The Supreme Court held that the fact that the mother had not completed a treatment plan within 18 months indicated that she was unlikely to complete one within a reasonable time and that the conduct rendering her unfit was also unlikely to change within a reasonable time; therefore, termination of her parental rights was affirmed. In re Custody & Parental Rights of M.A.D. & C.D., 2003 MT 10, 314 M 38, 62 P3d 717 (2003).

Admitted Failure to Complete Treatment Plan by Father With Serious Mental Illness — Termination of Parental Rights Without Visitation Upheld: The lower court's determination that the father did not complete his treatment plan was supported by the father's admission that he did not complete it, and his partial compliance with the plan was not sufficient. The testimony of the father and his psychologist and the father's conduct supported the lower court's determination that he had bipolar disorder and severe mental illness, making him unfit to parent, and that his parental rights should be terminated and he should be denied visitation with the children. Adequate Showing of Failure to Complete Treatment Plans — Termination of Parental Rights Not Improper: Despite testimony that the mother was a loving parent struggling against incredible odds to parent her children, it was not error for the District Court to terminate her parental rights after the children had been in state custody for 22 of the preceding 26 months and after the court found that she did not complete court-approved treatment plans, failed to remain drug-free and alcohol-free and to complete chemical dependency treatment, failed to participate regularly in her own individual therapy, did not consistently attend family therapy with her children, was unwilling to work consistently on parenting skills, did not terminate her relationship with a partner who abused one of the children, and failed to work consistently with a psychiatric nurse practitioner to monitor her medication needs. Parental Rights Terminated Despite Parent's Contention That No Treatment Plan in Effect: A mother successfully completed two treatment plans, and her three children were returned to her care. A few months later, officials at the children's Jefferson County school notified the Department of Public Health and Human Services that the children had hitchhiked 12 miles into town to get to school on at least four occasions and had already missed 8 days of school. The children were placed in foster care, and the Department filed for temporary legal custody. A treatment plan was developed in Jefferson County in December 2000, but in January 2001, the mother informed the Department that she was moving to Lewis and Clark County. She was instructed to establish a suitable home in Lewis and Clark County and to continue working on the treatment objectives while awaiting transfer of the case between counties. About 2 months later, the mother was arrested for operating a methamphetamine lab in her apartment. The children were adjudicated youths in need of care, and the mother's parental rights were terminated about 8 months later. She appealed on grounds that she never actually had a treatment plan during the 6 months preceding the termination and that the Department should have designed a treatment plan that she could have completed during her incarceration. The Supreme Court disagreed. The December 2000 treatment plan was to be in effect for 180 days, but it was the mother who determined the shortness of the plan by participating in dangerous criminal activity. Although a new treatment plan was not yet developed in Lewis and Clark County, the Jefferson County plan was still in effect. The District Court correctly concluded that the mother did not comply with or successfully complete the court-approved treatment plan and was unlikely to make significant progress within a reasonable time to meet the children's needs. Parental rights were properly terminated. In re Custody of A.L.R., A.A.R., & T.C.R., 2002 MT 183, 311 M 76, 54 P3d 17 (2002).

Violation of Treatment Plan Requiring No Contact Between Parents — Parental Rights Terminated: One condition of a treatment plan required the mother to refrain from contact with the father because the relationship was destructive and abusive and posed a danger to the mother and the children. Nevertheless, the mother continued to maintain contact with the father throughout the case, going so far as to hide the contact and engage in a pattern of dishonesty with professionals involved in the case, who were unwilling to work with her because of her dishonesty. Although the mother was partly successful with some goals of the treatment plan, her dishonesty required appointment of an entirely new treatment team, making completion of the treatment plan within a reasonable time unworkable. Findings that the mother was unable to put her children's needs before her own, to meet the emotional needs of the children, to understand relationships that put the children at risk, and to refrain from contact with the father were sufficient to warrant termination of parental rights. In re F.M. & D.M., 2002 MT 180, 311 M 35, 53 P3d 368 (2002).

Past and Present Behavior Considered as Indication of Parental Fitness and Potential to Change — Failure to Provide Nurturing Environment: Over a 2-year period, a mother entered into four different treatment plans aimed at reunification with her children. A primary element of each plan was that she provide a safe and nurturing environment for the children, yet several planned reunifications were delayed, usually as a result of volatile altercations between the mother and her husband. The altercations traumatized the children, and the postponed reunifications disillusioned them. Because of the mother's propensity to enter abusive relationships, none of the treatment plans were successfully completed. Based on the mother's history, it was highly likely that she would continue with abusive relationships and remain unable to remove herself from violent relationships or establish a safe and nurturing environment for the children. Further, she exhausted all the services that were available to facilitate reunification, including individual counseling for the children and herself, chemical dependency counseling, parenting classes, couple's counseling, family intervention, and referral to emergency housing and counseling for women in domestic violence cycles, and even given additional time, no new services would become available. The state went well beyond the requirements of making reasonable efforts to provide reunification services available for the mother and family, but the efforts proved unsuccessful. Given the mother's history and unlikely ability to change, it was in the children's best interests to protect them from exposure to the chronic family violence and to terminate the mother's parental rights and grant permanent placement of the children with the state. Parent Facing Several Years of Incarceration Unlikely to Change Within Reasonable Time — Parental Rights Terminated: The father attempted to comply with a treatment plan for less than 2 months before being arrested and jailed on drug-related charges. By continuing his drug use, the father ruined his chances for a favorable plea agreement, and faced several years of incarceration. The District Court correctly concluded that the father's substance abuse problems were unlikely to change within a reasonable time and that he failed to successfully complete the court-ordered treatment plan, so his parental rights were properly terminated. In re A.L., A.L., & C.L., 2002 MT 169, 310 M 480, 51 P3d 1131 (2002).

Termination of Parental Rights Without Treatment Plan — Reversal Warranted When Two Doctors Not in Agreement That Inability to Parent Cannot Be Remedied Within Reasonable Time: This section allows the termination of parental rights without a treatment plan if two medical doctors or clinical psychologists agree that a person cannot assume the role of parent. In In re Baby Boy Scott, 235 M 253, 767 P2d 298 (1988), the Supreme Court added an additional requirement that the doctors must also testify that the condition of the parent is unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In the present case, the District Court terminated a father's parental rights without a treatment plan after one doctor testified that it would probably be decades before the father could assume the role of parent, while a second doctor testified that it would be difficult to determine a time because it depended on so many variables but that the father could theoretically assume the role of parent if given the opportunity to participate in an ongoing treatment plan with strict supervision and continuous monitoring by trained professionals. The Supreme Court held that it is insufficient for both doctors to agree merely that a person is currently unable to parent. Both must also agree that the condition making a parent unable to assume that role is unlikely to change within a reasonable time (see 2003 amendment). Here, the doctors were not in agreement regarding the likelihood of the father's condition to change, so the basic statutory requirements were not met, and the District Court improperly terminated the father's parental rights. In re C.R.O., 2002 MT 50, 309 M 48, 43 P3d 913 (2002).

No Error in Finding That Conduct Rendering Father Unfit Unlikely to Change — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: The father attempted to work through seven consecutive treatment plans over a 3-year period, all designed to address his admitted problems with drugs and alcohol, anger management and associated abuse and neglect issues, and to reunite him with his children. Nevertheless, the father continued to drink and use drugs despite the plans' prohibition on their use, refused urinalysis tests on eight different occasions, did not attend Alcoholics Anonymous as required, made death threats to social workers, and refused to allow social workers into his home, which ultimately resulted in termination of his parental rights. On appeal, it was not contested that the children had been adjudicated youths in need of care or that the father had not successfully completed the treatment plans, but the father did contest the District Court's finding that the conduct or condition rendering him unfit was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The Supreme Court agreed with the father's assertions that he had made progress with positive life changes, but there was also evidence that the father would not be able to elevate his parenting abilities to a minimal standard in time to be developmentally beneficial to the children. There was no clear error in the District Court's finding that the conduct or condition rendering the father unfit was unlikely to change within a reasonable time, so the termination of parental rights was affirmed. In re T.A.G. & K.L.G., 2002 MT 4, 308 M 89, 39 P3d 686 (2002).

Petition to Terminate Parental Rights Properly Dismissed — Sufficient Evidence of Compliance With Treatment Plan: The District Court denied a petition to terminate a mother's parental rights and ordered her child returned to her within 30 days. The guardian ad litem appealed, contending that several of the court's findings were clearly erroneous and that the court had made findings without sufficient evidence and misapprehended the effect of the evidence. The Supreme Court affirmed. Although it stated that all of the treatment plan tasks had not been accomplished, the District Court was satisfied that the mother had substantially complied with her treatment plan as a whole, that the plan was successful, and that she could provide adequate care for her child. The District Court was thorough in its analysis, made findings pertaining to each goal in the plan, and summarized the completion of the treatment plan based on those findings. Although bonding issues remained, the District Court attributed the lack of bonding to the fact that the mother was living and working in Iowa while the child was in foster care in Montana, rather than to an inability to bond. The finding that the mother had substantially complied with the treatment plan was not clearly erroneous. In re B.B., 2001 MT 285, 307 M 379, 37 P3d 715 (2001).

No Bright Line Definition of Appropriate Treatment Plan: Because of the unique circumstances of each case, no bright line definition of what constitutes an appropriate treatment plan is possible. Factors routinely considered are: (1) whether the parent was represented by counsel; (2) whether the parent stipulated to the treatment plan; and (3) whether or not the treatment plan takes into consideration the particular problems facing both the parent and the child. It is, however, imperative that the process by which a treatment plan is implemented be fair. In re A.F.-C., 2001 MT 283, 307 M 358, 37 P3d 724 (2001). See also In re Custody & Parental Rights of M.M., 271 M 52, 894 P2d 298 (1995), and In re A.N. & C.N., 2000 MT 35, 298 M 237, 995 P2d 427 (2000).

Failure of Parents to Comply With Any of Five Different Treatment Plans — Child's Best Interests Paramount: To ensure the proper care of their sexually abused children, the state devised five different treatment plans for the parents over a 2-year period, but none of the plans were successful, so the state sought to terminate parental rights. The parents did not challenge the finding that their children were youths in need of care, but did challenge the appropriateness of the treatment plans, the finding that the plans were unsuccessful, and the finding that their conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. The Supreme Court affirmed the termination. Primary consideration must be given to the best interests of the child as demonstrated by the child's physical, mental, and emotional conditions and needs, and the child's interests take precedence over parental rights. Here, the treatment plans were directed at protecting the children from further sexual abuse within the home and were thus appropriate. Although the parents complied with some obligations of the treatment plans, partial compliance is an insufficient basis upon which to premise error in a finding that a plan was not complied with. Further, a District Court should assess a parent's past and present conduct in determining whether that parent's conduct is unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In this case, ongoing incest between the siblings characterized the parents' inability to provide a safe environment to protect the younger children in the foreseeable future. The children had been in periodic foster care for several years, and numerous treatment plans were provided to the parents, who had considerable time to comply. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating parental rights based on these findings of fact. In re D.H., S.H., K.H., N.S., & J.B., 2001 MT 200, 306 M 278, 33 P3d 616 (2001).

Admission of Letter Referencing Treatment Plan Not Arbitrary or Beyond Bounds of Reason — Parent's Claim of Illiteracy Questionable: In addition to presenting a revised treatment plan to the father when he was incarcerated, a state social worker sent the father's counsel a letter advising that unless the state heard otherwise, it would be assumed that counsel had no objections to the treatment plan. The letter also advised counsel of the father's claim of illiteracy. The state was not notified of any objections, and the District Court admitted the letter as evidence of a treatment plan. The father's subsequent motion to strike the treatment plan on grounds that the plan was not submitted to counsel prior to submission to the District Court and that the father could not read or write was denied. The Supreme Court affirmed. Based on the District Court's observations, the father's claim of illiteracy was questionable at best, and if there were objections to the treatment plan, presumably they would have been raised. The District Court did not err in relying on the treatment plan and in terminating the father's parental rights for completely failing to comply with the plan. In re R.F., 2001 MT 199, 306 M 270, 32 P3d 1257 (2001).

Mental or Emotional Illness Rendering Mother Unable to Parent Children Within Reasonable Time — Parental Rights Properly Terminated: A mother contended that her parental rights were improperly terminated based on evidence that she did not complete her parenting plan, including the therapy and visitation provisions of the plan. The family had two vehicles, but the mother did not attempt to take one when she left the father, failed to meet the requirement for weekly supervised visits, and maintained only sporadic contact with her children for almost a year. The therapy provisions of the treatment plan required the mother to obtain individual therapy and continue in therapy until she could demonstrate a clear understanding of how to protect her children from further emotional, physical, and sexual abuse and neglect, put that understanding into practice for at least 6 months, and address her own parenting issues, self-esteem, prior family history, signs of sexual abuse, and dependency on the children's father at the cost of her children's safety. The trial court noted that the mother could not have applied her therapy for 6 months as required because she had not had custody of the children since the plan was put into place. The court also found that the mother was not willing or able to carry out the tasks associated with parenting because of her mental or emotional illness and that her conduct was unlikely to change, as evidenced by her failure to comply with the treatment plan within 15 months. Absent clear error, the termination of the mother's parental rights was affirmed. In re M.F.B., D.A.B., M.S.B., & S.L.B., 2001 MT 136, 305 M 481, 29 P3d 480 (2001).

Appropriateness of Treatment Plan Requirement That Parents Provide Explanation of Child's Injuries: Four treatment plans were developed with the parents, the purpose of all of which was to: (1) return the child to parental custody; (2) enable the parents to provide a safe and nurturing environment for the child; (3) enable the parents to develop an awareness of the child's needs and an ability to meet those needs; (4) help the parents develop minimal parenting skills; and (5) resolve the issues that led to the child's abuse, which included a requirement that the parents provide a reasonable and consistent explanation for the child's injuries. The parents were subsequently convicted of endangering the welfare of the child, and the state petitioned for custody. Prior to the permanent custody hearing, the mother moved to strike the task that required an explanation of the child's injuries, but the state never filed a brief in response to the motion. Nevertheless, the motion was denied. Following the termination of the mother's parental rights, she challenged the appropriateness of that task on grounds that the task placed her in the untenable position of having to choose between incriminating herself and failing to complete the treatment plan, in violation of her right against self-incrimination, relying on In re A.N., 2000 MT 35, 298 M 237, 995 P2d 427 (2000). The Supreme Court found her reliance on In re A.N. misplaced. The mother waived her self-incrimination privileges by voluntarily testifying regarding her knowledge of the child's injuries at both the permanent custody hearing and during the criminal proceeding and could not argue later that the disputed task impinged on her constitutional privilege against self-incrimination. Further, the state's duty to protect children, as set out in 41-3-101, necessitated that the parents come to terms with the reasons why the child was abused, and without demonstrable willingness from the parents to resolve the abuse issues, the District Court had no assurance that the child would not be abused again. Thus, the task was a fair requirement in the treatment plan, and the District Court did not err in concluding that the plan was appropriate or in denying the motion to strike the task from the plan. Denying the motion was within the court's discretion regardless of whether the state filed a brief in response to the motion. In re A.C., 2001 MT 126, 305 M 404, 27 P3d 960 (2001).

Parents' Failure to Provide Explanation of Child's Injuries or Change Conduct — Termination of Parental Rights Proper: As a condition of a treatment plan, the District Court required the parents to provide a reasonable and consistent explanation for their child's life-threatening injuries, which was a reasonable and appropriate task. After 2 years of trying unsuccessfully to resolve the abuse issues, the District Court concluded that the treatment plan was unsuccessful because both parents had steadfastly maintained ignorance as to how the child was injured. The court also concluded that the parents' conduct was unlikely to change and terminated parental rights. The mother appealed on grounds that the court's determinations were not supported by clear and convincing evidence. The Supreme Court affirmed. The standard of review is whether the District Court's findings are clearly erroneous. Here, substantial evidence supported the conclusion that the treatment plan was not complied with and that the condition rendering the mother unfit was unlikely to change within a reasonable time, and that finding was not clearly erroneous. In re A.C., 2001 MT 126, 305 M 404, 27 P3d 960 (2001), overruling In re B.F., 2000 MT 231, 301 M 281, 8 P3d 790 (2000), and subsequent decisions to the extent that In re B.F. suggested that the Supreme Court should review a District Court's findings in a parental termination case to determine whether the findings are supported by clear and convincing evidence.

Long-Term Incarceration as Impediment to Parenting Ability — Treatment Plan Impractical: The father was sentenced to two life terms in prison with no eligibility for parole for 60 years for killing his girlfriend and her daughter. The District Court held a hearing on the termination of the father's parental rights but allowed no evidence or testimony other than the fact of his incarceration and length of sentence. The court determined that a treatment plan was impractical in light of the father's long-term incarceration and terminated his parental rights. The father appealed on grounds that a treatment plan must be established before parental rights can be terminated unless a showing of facts clearly proves the impossibility of any workable plan. Treatment plans are intended to improve a parent's ability to meet a child's needs in order to help the parent regain custody and preserve the parent-child relationship. However, in this case, no treatment plan could be devised that would remedy the fact of the father's long-term incarceration. His imprisonment presented an insurmountable impediment to his ability to provide for his child's physical, mental, and emotional needs, so the District Court did not err in finding that a treatment plan was impractical. Because a plan was not required, the court needed only to consider whether the father's conduct or condition rendering him unfit as a parent was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Two life terms in prison so severely limited the father's parenting abilities that continuation of the parent-child relationship was not in the child's best interests, so termination of his parental rights was proper. In Re Custody & Parental Rights of M.W. & C.S., 2001 MT 78, 305 M 80, 23 P3d 206 (2001).

Sufficient Evidence to Terminate Parental Rights Without Prior Treatment Plan: The requirement of a treatment plan may be waived under this section upon a finding that "two medical doctors or clinical psychologists submit testimony that the parent cannot assume the role of parent". Two doctors did submit evaluations to that effect in this case, and the District Court waived the treatment plan requirement. On appeal, the mother contended that the doctors' testimony was canceled by the testimony of two other doctors, called by her, who testified positively regarding the mother's ability to parent. However, the evaluation of one of the mother's doctors was conducted for the limited purpose of determining whether the mother was qualified for Social Security income, and the other doctor's testimony exclusively addressed the issue of whether the mother should be permitted to continue weekly visits with the child and did not deal with the issue of her potential to assume the role of parent. Thus, the District Court did not err when it terminated the mother's parental rights based on the testimony by two medical doctors or clinical psychologists that the mother could not assume the role of parent without the court first requiring implementation of an appropriate parenting plan. In re A.M., 2001 MT 60, 304 M 379, 22 P3d 185 (2001).

Evidence Improperly Admitted Regarding Incident With "Baby Think It Over" Doll — Parental Rights Terminated Based on Statutory Criteria: The Department received a referral regarding J.M.'s birth, indicating that the parents had intellectual disabilities. The parents were provided with a "Baby Think It Over" doll, which is an infant simulator used in parenting classes that records incidents of neglect and significant abuse if not tended to. The simulator also measures a parent's ability or willingness to respond to an infant's time demands. The simulator recorded an incident of abuse for which the parents had no explanation. As part of a subsequent proceeding to terminate parental rights, the District Court allowed the introduction of evidence regarding the incident. Parental rights were terminated based on the parents' noncompliance with their treatment plan. On appeal, the mother contended that the court erred in allowing evidence regarding the doll because a sufficient foundation was not provided for admission of the evidence. The Supreme Court agreed that the state failed to provide a sufficient foundation for admission of the evidence, such as whether the doll was functioning properly at the time that it was used and whether the results of its use were reliable. The doll's recordation of an incident of abuse did not establish a consequential fact relevant to the state's contention that the parents had not complied with their treatment plan and that the parents' condition was unlikely to change, so the evidence was inadmissible. However, the state did provide sufficient other evidence to support its contention. Thus, although evidence regarding the doll was erroneously allowed, the evidence would not have affected the outcome of the case, so the error was harmless. In re J.M., 2001 MT 51, 304 M 303, 21 P3d 618 (2001).

Finding That Father Unlikely to Change Because of Incarceration Upheld: Michael argued that his parental rights should not have been terminated because he had substantially complied with his court-ordered treatment plan by completing anger management and parenting classes, attending substance abuse treatment, and staying sober. The lower court found that because of his incarceration, Michael was unlikely to be able to change within a reasonable time the condition of being unable to provide a stable home for his son. The Supreme Court held that reasonable evidence supported the lower court's findings and therefore it had properly terminated Michael's parental rights. In re Custody & Parental Rights of C.F., H.F., & J.F., 2001 MT 19, 304 M 134, 18 P3d 1014 (2001).

Substantial Compliance Does Not Constitute Successful Completion: Michael argued that his parental rights should not have been terminated because he had substantially complied with his court-ordered treatment plan by completing anger management and parenting classes, attending substance abuse treatment, and staying sober. The Supreme Court held that substantial compliance was not enough because Michael, by returning to incarceration, was unable to provide a stable home, food, and clothing for his son and therefore the lower court had not erred in terminating his parental rights. In re Custody & Parental Rights of C.F., H.F., & J.F., 2001 MT 19, 304 M 134, 18 P3d 1014 (2001), following In re J.H., 2000 MT 11, 298 M 41, 994 P2d 37 (2000).

Inclusion of Self-Incriminating Requirement as One Element of Parenting Plan — Harmless Error: As part of his third parenting treatment plan, the father was required to affirmatively explain the cause of his child's injuries, assume responsibility for any injuries inflicted on the child, and cooperate with law enforcement to resolve the related criminal charges against him. In essence, the state used the treatment plan to make an official inquiry into the child's injuries, leaving the father with the Hobson's choice of either disclosing his involvement in the child's injuries and incriminating himself in the criminal proceeding or facing certain termination of his parental rights. The Supreme Court found the requirement to be inappropriate. However, the requirement impacted only one goal of five that the District Court found were not successfully met and only one task of four that were not completed. Thus, inclusion of the inappropriate requirement did not significantly impact the District Court's decision to terminate the father's parental rights or result in substantial injustice. The error was harmless, and the Supreme Court affirmed. In re A.N. & C.N., 2000 MT 35, 298 M 237, 995 P2d 427, 57 St. Rep. 155 (2000).

Unsuccessful Short-Term Treatment Plans — Parental Rights of Incarcerated Parent Terminated: The mother was offered two short-term treatment plans while she was incarcerated and was led to believe that if she completed these plans, she would be allowed to parent her child upon release from prison. The short timeframe for the treatment plans was due to representations made by the mother regarding when she expected to be released, but the state conducted no followup investigation to determine when she would actually be eligible for release and what the conditions of her release would be. Her incarceration was subsequently extended, and after determining that the treatment plans were not successful, the District Court terminated her parental rights. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding no error in the District Court's conclusion. In re J.H., 2000 MT 11, 298 M 41, 994 P2d 37, 57 St. Rep. 60 (2000).

Error in Finding That Parent Not in Compliance With Either Preincarceration or Incarceration Treatment Plan — Termination of Rights Affirmed Absent Evidence of Likely Change in Parental Conduct: A parenting plan was drawn for a mother, but she did not comply with it because of her subsequent incarceration. A second plan was then drawn that took into account the mother's incarceration. The District Court later concluded, incorrectly, that the mother had not complied with either plan. However, whether the parent's contrary conduct occurred before the treatment plan or after the termination of the plan, the results were essentially the same because the plan could not be considered successful under its terms. Further, the court relied on clear and convincing evidence in determining that the mother's conduct or condition that rendered her unfit was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Having addressed each applicable statutory requirement, the court's termination of the mother's parental rights was affirmed. Failure to Complete Treatment Goals — Child in State Custody for Over Twenty Months — Substantial Evidence Supporting Termination of Parental Rights: Applying the standard of whether substantial evidence supported the District Court's findings of fact, the Supreme Court affirmed the termination of the mother's parental rights. Although the mother made positive changes in her life in the months preceding the hearing, she did not successfully complete or meet the goals of any of four court-approved treatment plans during the more than 20 months that her child was in Department custody. On this record, the District Court's finding that the conduct or condition that rendered her unfit to parent her child was unlikely to change within a reasonable time was supported by substantial evidence and was not otherwise erroneous. In re J.M.J., 1999 MT 277, 296 M 510, 989 P2d 840, 56 St. Rep. 1119 (1999).

Termination of Incarcerated Father's Parental Rights Proper — Treatment Plan Impractical: The District Court did not err when it concluded that a treatment plan was not practical for an incarcerated father who, even with parole, would be limited to only supervised visits with his children. No treatment plan would obviate the difficulty that the children would have in knowing him as their father after his extended incarceration. The incarceration and sentencing conditions presented a substantial long-term impediment to his ability to provide for the children's physical, mental, and emotional needs, limiting his parenting abilities to the extent that continuation of the parent-child relationship was not in the children's best interests. Therefore, it was not error for the District Court to terminate the father's parental rights. No Treatment Plan in Effect at Time of Mother's Unauthorized Contact With Father — Termination of Parental Rights Reversed: When the mother surreptitiously contacted the father, who had had his parental rights terminated after being convicted of murdering the couple's other child, the state petitioned to terminate the mother's parental rights as well. Parental rights may be terminated when each of the following statutory requirements has been established: (1) the child must have been adjudicated a youth in need of care; (2) an appropriate treatment plan must have been approved by the court but not been complied with by the parent or not been successful; and (3) the conduct or condition of the unfit parent is unlikely to change within a reasonable time. In this case, the Supreme Court reversed the termination order in the absence of clear and convincing evidence that the mother failed to comply with a court-approved treatment plan because there was no treatment plan in effect at the time of her unauthorized contact with the father. Conditions Constituting Impractical Treatment Plan — Parent's Lack of Cooperation in Providing Information Insufficient to Render Plan Impractical: The District Court found that a treatment plan for an incarcerated father was impractical considering the length of incarceration, the father's lack of cooperation with the Department in refusing to release his medical records, and the distance between Montana and Minnesota where he was incarcerated. The court terminated his parental rights. A Department social worker told the incarcerated father that there could be no evaluation or treatment plan unless he released his medical records, which he did not do. Thus, implementation of a treatment plan was not discussed. At a minimum, the impracticality provision requires that the Department discuss the possibility of implementing a treatment plan with a parent, but not only was no plan discussed, the Department did not advise the father that his cooperation was necessary for him to participate in a plan. A parent's lack of cooperation in disclosing information is an insufficient ground by itself to conclude that a treatment plan is impractical unless the parent has been clearly informed that cooperation is necessary. Appropriateness of Treatment Plan for Incarcerated Person: At the hearing on the petition for temporary legal custody, the mother testified by telephone because she was in prison in Idaho at the time for battery of a minor. She stated that she had 88 days left until she was eligible for release and that she was willing to work on a treatment plan while incarcerated. The social worker who prepared the plan recognized that the mother was limited in what she could accomplish while in prison and would be unable to complete the plan until she was released but pointed out that the prison programs would fulfill some of the treatment plan requirements. Because of disciplinary problems, she was not paroled. The mother later asserted, and the Supreme Court agreed, that most of the treatment plan was designed for a person who was not incarcerated. However, the plan was drafted when the mother had a chance of being released and was directed at the problems facing her and the children. She was adequately represented by counsel and did not object to the plan as presented. The District Court did not err in finding that the treatment plan was appropriate and that termination of parental rights was proper given the mother's neglect in even attempting to comply with the plan and given the denial of her parole because of her bad behavior. Well-Intentioned Efforts Toward Success of Treatment Plan — Insufficient Minimum Compliance Justifying Termination of Parental Rights: A mother's attempts to comply with the terms of four approved treatment plans, though well-intentioned, were insufficient to meet minimum compliance with the plan and did not constitute successful treatment. A treatment plan can be unsuccessful even when the tasks dictated by the plan are completed. The District Court held correctly that continuing the parent-child relationship would likely result in continued abuse or neglect of the children because of the mother's repeated inability to protect the children from abuse by others and that her conduct, having failed to change significantly in the past, was unlikely to change within a reasonable time in the future. Record Showing Child to Be Youth in Need of Care and Failure of Mother to Complete Treatment Plan Held Sufficient for Termination of Parental Rights: The parental rights of M.M., the natural mother of A.W-M., were terminated by the District Court based on its finding that A.W-M. was a youth in need of care and that M.M. failed to complete her treatment plan. The Supreme Court reviewed the District Court record and found that the record contained substantial credible evidence that A.W-M. was a youth in need of care, including evidence that A.W-M. was left with a babysitter when she was 7 months old and sick with bronchitis, that after treatment, doctors would not release A.W-M. to her mother's care because her mother "appeared to be high", that M.M. made little effort to comply with her treatment plan, and that A.W-M. had been left with other caregivers for indefinite periods of time. The Supreme Court also found substantial evidence that M.M. could not be expected to complete her treatment plan in the foreseeable future, including evidence that she tested positive for use of a controlled substance, was unable to obtain stable employment or housing, failed to attend court-ordered counseling, visited only sporadically with A.W-M., and agreed in her testimony that she should not be given further time to comply with her treatment plan. Treatment Plan Never Offered to Incarcerated Parent — Termination of Parental Rights Improper Absent Plan: Father had been incarcerated for more than 1 year, so pursuant to subsection (4)(b) of this section, the District Court terminated the father's parental rights on the grounds that: (1) a treatment plan was impractical in light of his incarceration; (2) the date of his release from prison was unknown; and (3) he had shown minimal interest in his child. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that neither the Department nor the social worker involved in the case ever presented or examined the possibility of a treatment plan with the father; therefore, the practicality of a treatment plan could not be determined when a treatment plan had never been offered or discussed. Failure to demonstrate the impracticality of an unoffered treatment plan constituted reversible error. Complete History Relevant to Termination of Incarcerated Parent's Parental Rights: This section recognizes that a child may need help while a parent is incarcerated and that such help cannot be delayed pending the parent's release. Thus, a treatment plan is not required if the parent's incarceration for more than 1 year makes a treatment plan impractical. Further, a complete history of a parent's neglect and abuse of the children and of all attempts to comply with prior treatment plans is relevant to whether parental rights should be terminated, rather than a parent's performance only under the latest treatment plan. The primary consideration is the physical, mental, and emotional conditions and needs of the children. In re K.F.L. & N.L., 275 M 102, 910 P2d 241, 53 St. Rep. 57 (1996).

Absence of Court-Approved Treatment Plan Not Bar to Termination of Parental Rights — Warning to Follow Law in Future Cases: In proceedings to terminate a mother's parental rights, the Department prepared and executed a treatment plan, but the mother refused to sign it. The plan was filed with the court, but the judge failed to officially sign it. The court found that the mother had allowed her children to be sexually abused or exploited and terminated her parental rights. The mother appealed on the grounds that this section requires a court-approved treatment plan before parental rights may be terminated. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the termination despite the requirements of this section and warned the Department to follow the law in future cases or risk reversal of terminations. This section does not require that the parent sign the treatment plan in order for the court to approve it. In re Inquiry Into M.M., 274 M 166, 906 P2d 675, 52 St. Rep. 1170 (1995).

Failure to Complete Alcohol Treatment Programs Grounds for Termination of Parental Rights: T.M., whose mother died when he was 14 months old, was diagnosed as having fetal alcohol syndrome and required constant parental supervision. His father was repeatedly incarcerated for alcohol-related offenses and unable to take care of T.M. during those times. T.M.'s father also repeatedly failed to complete treatment programs for alcohol abuse, domestic violence, and anger management. The Supreme Court held that in applying its standard of review, the lower court's decision to terminate T.M.'s father's parental rights was not clearly erroneous given the fact that the record showed that the father had failed to complete required treatment and that it was in the best interests of the child that the father's parental rights be terminated. Failure to Complete Treatment Plan — Out-of-Home Placement for Over Two Years — Termination of Parental Rights Upheld: The District Court did not err in terminating a father's parental rights when the father failed to complete treatment recommended by psychological evaluations, failed to enter into counseling to develop effective methods of discipline and to understand the children's needs as victims of sexual abuse, and continued to deny various aspects of the mother's sexual abuse of the children. Overwhelming evidence that the father failed to comply with critical parts of the treatment plan met the statutory requirements for termination of parental rights. Appropriateness of Treatment Plan Requiring Psychological Therapy for Indigent Mother: Mother contended that the court-ordered treatment plan implemented in her case was inappropriate because the court failed to consider her financial situation when it ordered her to undergo treatment that included continuing psychotherapy, for which she was required to pay, and that her indigency thus doomed the plan to failure. Noting that the treatment plan was agreed to by the mother on advice of counsel, the Supreme Court found substantial testimony regarding failure of the treatment plan, beyond her indigency, that indicated circumstances that rendered the plan unsuccessful but not necessarily inappropriate. Successful Treatment Plan, Not Just Compliance With Plan, Required: Parents contended their parental rights were wrongfully terminated because there was no evidence that the treatment plan failed or that their lack of fitness was unlikely to change. However, the treatment plan required not only compliance with but a successful completion of the plan, which was not accomplished. Coupled with the fact of ongoing and continuous unfitness unlikely to change within a reasonable time, termination of parental rights was proper. Operation of Treatment Plan Interrupted by Parent's Incarceration — Termination of Parental Rights Affirmed: The District Court did not err in terminating a mother's parental rights rather than awarding long-term custody to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) when: (1) a 6-month treatment plan had not even begun when the mother was incarcerated 4 months after approval of the plan; (2) although her incarceration may have interfered with her ability to complete the plan, her failure to timely begin the plan, coupled with her failure to complete previously assigned parenting tasks, foretold the potential failure of the plan; and (3) the mother's conduct was unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Partial Compliance With Treatment Plan — Possibility of Change of Conduct — Parental Rights Terminated: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating parental custody and transferring legal custody to the state when evidence showed that the mother only partially complied with a treatment plan and that the possibility that she might be able to change her conduct in 8 to 12 months was outweighed by the immediacy of the children's needs for stability and predictability. Failure of Parent to Complete Court-Approved Treatment Plan — Burden of Proof Met in Termination of Parental Rights: The state met the burden of proof in terminating parental rights after showing, by clear and convincing evidence, that the father of the youths in need of care did not comply with several tasks required under a court-approved treatment plan, including: (1) meeting with therapists on a scheduled basis; (2) completing a series of parenting classes; (3) establishing contact with and visiting the children; and (4) providing a home large enough to accommodate all the children. Further, the state was responsible to assist the father in establishing treatment but was not required to force him to comply with the treatment plan. Exceptions to Treatment Plan Requirement: A mother's parental rights may be extinguished without a finding that she has not complied with a court-approved treatment plan or that such plan has been unsuccessful. Exceptions in the statute allow for extinguishment of parental rights of a mentally ill person without establishing a court-approved treatment plan as long as two medical doctors testify that the parent is so severely mentally ill that she cannot assume the role of parent. In this case, three psychiatrists testified that the mother suffered from chronic schizophrenia and agreed that her history of mental illness showed little hope that she could assume her parental role. In re Baby Boy Scott, 235 M 253, 767 P2d 298, 45 St. Rep. 2362 (1988).

Failure of Rehabilitative Training as Criteria for Termination: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating parental rights upon finding that despite several years of rehabilitative training to improve the mother's parenting and home management skills, she was unfit, unable, and unwilling to care for her children and failed to provide a stable home environment. Substantial Credible Evidence to Terminate Parental Rights: Evidence was held sufficient to support trial court's findings that appellant failed to comply with court-approved treatment plan and that appellant's condition which rendered her unfit to be a parent is unlikely to change within a reasonable time. Substantial credible evidence supports the findings, and they may not be set aside unless clearly erroneous. In re R.M.B., Youth in Need of Care, 213 M 29, 689 P2d 281, 41 St. Rep. 1925 (1984).

STANDARD OF REVIEW

Standard and Sufficiency of Evidence Challenged: Parents whose parental rights were terminated and who had inadequately asserted their child was an Indian child challenged the standard of review used in District Court. The Supreme Court affirmed, explaining that the federal Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 did not apply, and that the waiver effect of the parents' unqualified stipulations precluded any subsequent assertion of error and resulting review regarding evidentiary sufficiency. One parent also challenged the sufficiency of the evidence. The Supreme Court found that the District Court's rulings were supported by substantial record evidence that was minimally sufficient to satisfy the applicable clear and convincing evidence standard. In re L.H., 2021 MT 199, 405 Mont. 173, 492 P.3d 1218.

Standard of Review — Custody Determinations and Termination of Parental Rights:

The Supreme Court reviews a District Court decision to terminate parental rights to determine whether there was an abuse of discretion. The District Court's conclusions of law are reviewed to determine whether the law was interpreted correctly. The test for abuse of discretion is whether the trial court acted arbitrarily, without employment of conscientious judgment, or exceeded the bounds of reason resulting in substantial injustice. A parent's fundamental liberty interest in the right to the care and custody of a child must be protected by fundamentally fair procedures. To satisfy the statutory requirements for terminating parental rights, a District Court must make specific factual findings, and those finding are reviewed to determine whether they are clearly erroneous. Although a decision to terminate parental rights is not to be taken lightly, the District Court decision is presumed to be correct and will not be disturbed on appeal unless there is a mistake of law or a finding of fact not supported by substantial evidence that would amount to a clear abuse of discretion. In re D.V., 2003 MT 160, 316 M 282, 70 P3d 1253 (2003), following In re J.V., S.V., T.V., & M.V., 2003 MT 68, 314 M 487, 67 P3d 242 (2003), and In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003), and followed in In re V.F.A., 2005 MT 76, 326 M 383, 109 P3d 749 (2005). The Supreme Court has adopted a different standard of review for nonjury findings of fact than is applied to jury verdicts. The standard set out in Interstate Prod. Credit Ass'n v. DeSaye, 250 M 320, 820 P2d 1285 (1991), is the appropriate standard to be applied to purely factual findings in a proceeding to terminate parental rights. The rule set out in In re Marriage of Burris, 258 M 265, 852 P2d 616 (1993), that the court generally will review conclusions of law to determine whether they are correct, is the appropriate basis for reviewing most conclusions of law in a termination proceeding. However, the conclusion that a child is abused or neglected involves a decision that is neither purely factual nor purely legal and is thus analogous to a District Court's determination of conscionability when reviewing marital and property settlement agreements. Thus, in challenges to a District Court's determination regarding abuse or neglect, review involves a determination as to whether there was an abuse of discretion. In re D.H. & F.H., 264 M 521, 872 P2d 803, 51 St. Rep. 386 (1994).

The same standard of review applies to both termination of parental rights and custody determinations. As set out in In re R.A.D., 231 M 143, 753 P2d 862, 45 St. Rep. 496 (1988), in both instances the District Court's decision is afforded all reasonable presumptions as to the correctness of the determination, and therefore the decision will not be disturbed on appeal unless there is a mistake of law or a finding of fact not supported by substantial evidence that would amount to a clear abuse of discretion. Review of District Court Findings Regarding Termination of Parental Rights: In reviewing a District Court's findings regarding termination of parental rights, the Supreme Court will not consider whether the evidence will support a different finding or substitute its judgment for that of the factfinder regarding the weight given to the evidence. Further, determining whether conduct or a condition rendering a parent unfit is likely to change within a reasonable time requires an assessment of the parent's past and present conduct. In re L.S., 2003 MT 12, 314 M 42, 63 P3d 497 (2003), followed in In re D.G. & R.G., 2005 MT 139, 327 M 266, 114 P3d 201 (2005). Definition of Clear and Convincing Evidence: In the context of parental rights termination cases, clear and convincing evidence is defined as simply a requirement that a preponderance of the evidence be definite, clear, and convincing or that a particular issue be clearly established by a preponderance of the evidence or by a clear preponderance of the proof. The requirement does not call for unanswerable or conclusive evidence. In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999). Test to Determine if Findings Clearly Erroneous: The Supreme Court adopted the following test to determine whether findings used in terminating parental rights are clearly erroneous: (1) the record will be reviewed to see if the findings are supported by substantial evidence; (2) if the findings are supported by substantial evidence, the Supreme Court will determine whether the trial court misapprehended the effect of the evidence; and (3) if substantial evidence exists and the effect of the evidence has not been misapprehended, the Supreme Court may still find clear error when, although there is evidence to support it, a review of the record leaves the court with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. Applying the test in the present case, the finding that a continued relationship between parents and children would result in continued abuse of the children was consistent with the evidence and was not clearly erroneous. Failure to Complete Alcohol Treatment Programs Grounds for Termination of Parental Rights: T.M., whose mother died when he was 14 months old, was diagnosed as having fetal alcohol syndrome and required constant parental supervision. His father was repeatedly incarcerated for alcohol-related offenses and unable to take care of T.M. during those times. T.M.'s father also repeatedly failed to complete treatment programs for alcohol abuse, domestic violence, and anger management. The Supreme Court held that in applying its standard of review, the lower court's decision to terminate T.M.'s father's parental rights was not clearly erroneous given the fact that the record showed that the father had failed to complete required treatment and that it was in the best interests of the child that the father's parental rights be terminated. Case Notes

Department's Failure to Comply With Discovery Not Due Process Violation — No Alleged Undiscovered Evidence to Defeat Termination Petition: After a motion to compel discovery, the Department of Health and Human Services represented to a father that there was no additional relevant or discoverable information relating to a termination action concerning his parental rights. Based on that representation, the father did not review files made available by the Department or depose the child protection specialist whose files were at issue. At trial, testimony was presented that undisclosed emails existed, and the father argued that because the Department violated its discovery obligations, he was denied due process because he could not properly prepare for the termination hearing. However, the District Court held that the father had received due process and declined to dismiss or continue the case. At trial, the father testified on his own behalf and cross-examined witnesses, including the witnesses whose communications had not been disclosed properly, and the court ultimately terminated the father's parental rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the father did not allege any information in the undiscovered communications that could have led to additional evidence that would defeat the petition for termination. The District Court acted within its discretion when it determined that the father's due process rights were not violated by the failure of the Department to comply with its discovery obligation. In re M.B., 2018 MT 205, 392 Mont. 368, 424 P.3d 606.

Mother Lacked Standing to Challenge Placement of Indian Child After Parental Rights Terminated: The District Court issued an order terminating the parental rights of the appellant mother and ordering the placement of two children, C.B.D. and P.M.P., in separate placements. On appeal, the mother challenged the placement of P.M.P. only and did not challenge the termination itself. The Supreme Court held that the mother lacked standing to appeal P.M.P.'s placement. Because her appeal came after the District Court terminated her parental rights, she no longer had any legal status relative to P.M.P. and therefore she was alleging an injury to a civil right that she no longer had and made no effort to regain. The appeal of P.M.P.'s placement did not stay the termination of her parental rights, and therefore she lacked standing to maintain her appeal. In re C.B.D. & P.M.P., 2017 MT 108, 387 Mont. 347, 394 P.3d 202.

No Standing by Former Parent to Object to Child's Placement or Assert Child's Rights: Once the parent-child relationship is terminated by the District Court, a former parent has no standing to object to the court's subsequent placement of the child with the Department or by adoption. Similarly, a former parent has no standing to assert a violation of the child's rights as guardian ad litem because the former parent no longer represents the child. In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999). See also In re C.B.D. & P.M.P., 2017 MT 108, 387 Mont. 347, 394 P.3d 202.

Sua Sponte Modification of Postadoption Visitation Agreement Within Discretion of District Court: The rule that in the context of separation agreements made between spouses, parties cannot make binding agreements concerning the support, custody, or visitation of children applies equally to postadoption agreements made between an adopted child's birth parents and adoptive parents. The best interests of the child are paramount, and sua sponte modification of an original visitation agreement in this case was within the discretion of the District Court after determining the best interests of the adopted child. Groves v. Clark, 1999 MT 117, 294 M 417, 982 P2d 446, 56 St. Rep. 490 (1999). See also In re Marriage of Mager, 241 M 78, 785 P2d 198, 47 St. Rep. 97 (1990), and In re Marriage of Widhalm/Miller, 279 M 97, 926 P2d 748, 53 St. Rep. 1067 (1996).

Postadoption Visitation Agreement Between Natural Mother and Adoptive Parents — Responsibilities of District Court: Groves consented to the adoption of her child by the Clarks on the condition that the Clarks sign a visitation agreement allowing Groves to have specified contact with her daughter. After the document was signed and the adoption completed, the Clarks tried to terminate Groves' contact with her daughter. Groves brought an action for specific performance of the visitation agreement, but the District Court held that the agreement was void from its inception under 40-8-125 (now repealed). The Supreme Court reversed, holding that In re C.P., 221 M 180, 717 P2d 1093 (1986), was distinguishable and that the Legislature would not have enacted 40-8-136 (now repealed) if 40-8-125 (now repealed) terminated the interests of the natural parent altogether. The Supreme Court also noted that 40-8-136 (now repealed) also places a burden upon the adoptive parents and, in this case, upon the adoption agency that acted as Groves' agent, to make sure that the visitation agreement was filed in accordance with that statute. The Supreme Court also concluded that under 40-8-114 (now repealed), the District Court has a responsibility to make sure that the enforcement is in the best interests of the child. Groves v. Clark, 277 M 179, 920 P2d 981, 53 St. Rep. 703 (1996). The District Court did not err when it later modified sua sponte the parties' postadoption visitation agreement to provide weekend visitation and weekly telephone contact with the birth mother because the modification was determined to be in the best interests of the child. The finding was supported by substantial evidence, and the court did not misapprehend the effect of the evidence. Adoptive parents do not have sole discretion in deciding whether a postadoption visitation agreement should be enforced. Rather, the adoptive parents' wishes are but one factor among many to be considered in determining the child's best interests under 40-4-212. Groves v. Clark, 1999 MT 117, 294 M 417, 982 P2d 446, 56 St. Rep. 490 (1999).

Refusal to Grant Contact — Child's Best Interest: A natural mother may be allowed to maintain contact with her child after her parental rights have been extinguished only upon a showing that contact is in the child's best interest. In this case, the mother failed to present any testimony regarding the effect such contact would have upon the child. In addition, the record clearly shows that it would not be in the child's best interest to allow the mother to maintain contact with him. In re Baby Boy Scott, 235 M 253, 767 P2d 298, 45 St. Rep. 2362 (1988).

Termination of Parental Rights While Maintaining Possibility of Parental Contact — Adoption Exception: There is no apparent conflict in terminating parental rights while simultaneously maintaining the possibility of parental contact. It was within the trial judge's discretion to terminate the mother's parental rights, due to her recurring mental problems, while allowing contact with the children if the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) determined it was in the children's best interests, since the children had a psychological attachment to their mother. However, when parental rights are terminated, continuing contact is allowable only in exceptional cases. In the event of adoption, continuing contact cannot be court-ordered even with Department approval. In re Declaring V.B., T.B., D.B., & B.B. Youths in Need of Care, 229 M 133, 744 P2d 1248, 44 St. Rep. 1838 (1987), followed in In re D.G., 244 M 17, 795 P2d 489, 47 St. Rep. 1408 (1990).

Parents to Have No Visitation Rights After Termination of Parental Rights Proceeding: Neither 40-8-125 (now repealed) nor 41-3-611 provides for a retention of visitation rights by the natural parent in the event of termination of parental rights and later adoption. In re C.P., 221 M 180, 717 P2d 1093, 43 St. Rep. 728 (1986).

Title 37, chapter 50, subchapter 9, ARM Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children.

Case Notes

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Termination of Parental Rights Improper — Remand for Consideration of Placement with Father: Although the out-of-state father had been the primary parent of the children, they were removed from the mother's care after she refused to return them to the father. The father's court-appointed attorney advised him to stipulate to the state's petitions, failed to object to the children being placed with their maternal grandparents, and never requested a placement hearing. Ultimately, the father's parental rights were terminated and the father appealed. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the father's attorney had provided ineffective counsel, and remanded the matter to the District Court to consider the father as the first placement option for the children. In re B.H., 2020 MT 4, 398 Mont. 275, 456 P.3d 233.

Jurisdiction Over Termination of Parental Rights Proper: A mother appealed the termination of her parental rights, arguing that the District Court erred in not staying the proceedings because once the mother left Montana for Utah and the child was placed with a Utah foster family, Montana was an inconvenient forum and no longer held exclusive and continuing jurisdiction over the proceedings. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that Montana was not an inconvenient forum under 40-7-108 because the evidence required for the proceeding was not located in Utah and did not require any evidence from Utah and that because there was not an ongoing proceeding in Utah, the District Court did not err in refusing to relinquish jurisdiction under the continuing jurisdiction provision of the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, 40-7-202, which requires a pending proceeding in another state. In addition, absent any pending Utah proceeding, Article V of the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children, codified at 41-4-101, dictated that Montana retain jurisdiction after the child was placed in Utah in order to adjudicate the proceeding. In re A.R.B., 2013 MT 310, 372 Mont. 274, 312 P.3d 425.

Youth Committed to Program in Nonadjacent State — School District Not Liable for Related Education Costs: The Youth Court committed a youth to a program for sexual offenders located in Minnesota. Cost was $148 a day, of which $48 were education costs, and the court assigned payment of that portion to the youth's school district. On appeal of the assignment, the Supreme Court found that 20-5-314 authorized reciprocal tuition agreements only with states adjoining Montana but found no statutory method to calculate tuition to be paid to a school in a state not adjacent to Montana. Absent specific statutory authority, the Supreme Court held that the Youth Court erred in finding the school district liable for the youth's education costs. In re W.J.H., 226 M 479, 736 P2d 484, 44 St. Rep. 817 (1987).

Definition of "Sending Agency" — Applicability: Mother argued that she should be considered the "sending agency" under Article II of this section and that she therefore had jurisdiction to effect the return of her child whom she had formally released for adoption. The Supreme Court refused to interpret the definition so broadly, holding that such an interpretation would mean that no state or private licensed adoption agency would ever be able to act with assurance that its conduct was final. In re Male Child Born July 15, 1985, to L.C., 221 M 309, 718 P2d 660, 43 St. Rep. 835 (1986).

Jurisdiction After Child Placed for Adoption Out of State: Once a parent voluntarily signed and executed a form relinquishing parental rights to an adoption agency, the adoption agency became the "sending agency" as defined in 41-4-101, Art. II, with the power to place the child for adoption out of state. The only standing the parent then had in Montana courts was to seek a revocation of the relinquishment with the adoption agency as copetitioner. Under 40-6-135(7) (now repealed), the relinquishment became irrevocable once the child was placed for adoption out of state, and Montana lost jurisdiction. In re Male Child Born July 15, 1985, to L.C., 221 M 309, 718 P2d 660, 43 St. Rep. 835 (1986).

Violation of Interstate Compact on Placement of Children — Illegal Placement as a Result — Revocation of Parents' Consent: Failure of prospective adoptive parents to notify the appropriate public authorities in writing before bringing their prospective adoptive child into Montana violated the Interstate Compact on Placement of Children. The prospective adoptive parents' status as custodians did not prevent the operation of the Compact. By virtue of the failure of the prospective adoptive parents to comply with the Compact, the placement of the child with the prospective adoptive parents in Montana constituted illegal placement under the provision of the Compact, and the failure to comply constitutes full and sufficient grounds for the revocation of the previously executed parents' consent. In re the Adoption of T.M.M., 186 M 460, 608 P2d 130 (1980).

Attorney General's Opinions

Responsibility for Tuition of Child in Legal Custody of Local Welfare Department: If a local welfare department has legal custody by a temporary or permanent order for placement of a minor child and places that child with foster parents outside the school district of residence (residence of the natural parents in most cases), tuition would have to be paid by the district of residence. If the placement of the child is outside the state, financial responsibility for school costs would rest with the sending agency under the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children. 40 A.G. Op. 69 (1984).

Case Notes

Valid Memorandum of Agreement Allowing State to Investigate Child Abuse Allegations on Reservation and Pursue Substantiation Proceedings Against Tribal Member: The Assiniboine and Sioux Tribes of the Fort Peck Reservation entered a memorandum of agreement with the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the Montana Department of Public Health and Human Services (DPHHS), allowing DPHHS to place Indian children with enrolled tribal members living on the reservation. DPHHS subsequently placed a Minnesota Indian child with the child's great-aunt Hanna on the Fort Peck Reservation, but the placement was terminated after DPHHS received reports that the child was being abused or neglected. DPHHS subsequently initiated an investigation into the cause of the abuse and issued a substantiated report that Hanna had abused or neglected the child. Hanna moved for a fair hearing, and because no criminal charges had been filed, DPHHS began the fair hearing process. Hanna then moved to dismiss the substantiation proceeding on jurisdictional grounds. The hearings officer held that the tribe maintained exclusive jurisdiction over Indian youth and that DPHHS's substantiation proceedings interfered with tribal sovereignty. DPHHS appealed the decision in District Court, arguing that pursuant to the memorandum of agreement, DPHHS had jurisdiction to issue the substantiated report under state law and policy because DPHHS had licensed Hanna as a kinship foster care provider in the first place. The District Court agreed and reversed the hearings officer's decision. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The purpose of the agreement was to allow eligible Indian children on the Fort Peck Reservation to receive services and foster care maintenance payments, and the agreement was a valid, federally authorized agreement. Under the agreement, DPHHS was assigned the responsibility of investigating allegations of abuse and neglect, documenting conclusions of the investigation in a final report, and making the final decision about an individual's licensing status, and the agreement did not contemplate tribal jurisdiction regarding these issues. Therefore, DPHHS had jurisdiction to pursue substantiation proceedings against Hanna. In re Fair Hearing of Hanna, 2010 MT 38, 355 Mont. 236, 227 P.3d 596.

Chapter Case Notes

Refusal to Issue Jury Instructions Instructing Jury to Consider Youth Characteristics in Determining Youth's Culpability — No Abuse of Discretion: The Youth Court did not abuse its discretion by refusing to instruct the jury to consider youth characteristics in determining the defendant's guilt. The Supreme Court declined to extend jurisprudence regarding consideration of youth characteristics during sentencing to a Youth Court jury's determination of guilt or innocence. In re J.W., 2021 MT 291, 406 Mont. 224, 498 P.3d 211.

Youth Tried, Convicted, and Sentenced Under Transfer Statute Correctly Sentenced as Persistent Felony Offender: In 1999, when Mainwaring was a juvenile, he pleaded guilty to mitigated deliberate homicide and was convicted pursuant to 41-5-206 and sentenced pursuant to 41-5-2503(1)(a). A part of that sentence was later suspended under 41-5-2510. Later, shortly after turning 21, Mainwaring assaulted a child. The state brought assault charges against Mainwaring and then sought to have the court designate Mainwaring as a persistent felony offender (PFO). The District Court approved the designation as a PFO, based on Mainwaring's 1999 felony conviction, and Mainwaring was convicted and sentenced to 20 years in prison. The Supreme Court held that a conviction under 41-5-206(6) was equivalent to any adult felony conviction and that there is nothing in the Montana Youth Court Act or the Criminally Convicted Youth Act that precludes the application of the PFO statutes and designation to an individual previously convicted of a felony when the individual was a youth. Citing St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 M 276, 119 P3d 1194 (2005), the Supreme Court held that the District Court therefore had the authority to apply the PFO statutes and designation to Mainwaring. The Supreme Court also overruled Mainwaring's due process objections and affirmed his conviction. St. v. Mainwaring, 2007 MT 14, 335 M 322, 151 P3d 53 (2007).

Youth Court — Lack of Jurisdiction to Determine Place and Length of Commitment: B.L.T., a 15-year-old youth, was charged with theft, escape, and criminal mischief. The Youth Court ordered that B.L.T. be committed to the custody of the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections), with placement at Pine Hills until he reached the age of 18. The Supreme Court noted that 41-5-103 defines "legal custody" as including the right to determine "with whom the youth shall live and for what period". The Supreme Court noted that even though the Youth Court has continuing jurisdiction over a youth under 41-5-205, placement by the Youth Court is not tantamount to a sentence of imprisonment because the purpose of the Montana Youth Court Act is rehabilitation rather than punishment in a penal institution. This purpose is consistent with 41-5-523 (renumbered 41-5-1512), which allows the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) to determine the place and length of placement of the youth. The Youth Court therefore had no authority to commit to Pine Hills for a specific period of time. In re B.L.T., 258 M 468, 853 P2d 1226, 50 St. Rep. 617 (1993).

Youth Not Denied Equal Protection by Sentencing System More Severe Than System Imposed on Adults: A youth has not been denied her right to equal protection of the law by imposition of a term of commitment upon her that is longer than the criminal sentence an adult would receive for the same act. Adults and minors are not similarly situated with respect to state sentencing laws because: (1) the purpose of their detention is not the same, that of the adult offender being both retributional and rehabilitational; and (2) the physical liberty interests of minors and adults are qualitatively different. In re C.S., 210 M 144, 687 P2d 57, 41 St. Rep. 970 (1984), followed in In re T.A.S., 244 M 259, 797 P2d 217, 47 St. Rep. 1590 (1990), and In re S.M.K.-S.H., 2012 MT 281, 367 Mont. 176, 290 P.3d 718.

Juvenile — Traffic Violation — Guilty Plea — Ability to Waive Rights: The provisions of the Youth Court Act do not apply to traffic violations. The youth who was accused of failure to drive in a careful and prudent manner was not subject to a jail sentence if found guilty. He therefore did not have the right to counsel and could knowledgeably waive his rights without the presence of counsel or his parents. State ex rel. Maier v. City Court, 203 M 443, 662 P2d 276, 39 St. Rep. 1560 (1982).

Family Travel and Counseling Expenses Properly Denied: A youth sentenced to a youth correctional facility requested funds to enable his family to visit at the facility and to participate in family counseling. The request was denied by the Youth Court, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Although one purpose of the Montana Youth Court Act is to preserve the unity and welfare of the family whenever possible, there is no provision for family travel expenses, and the Youth Court did not abuse its discretion in denying expenses absent a showing that: (1) family visits and counseling would be beneficial; (2) counseling was required; (3) funds were available; or (4) the Department of Corrections would not have made similar arrangements following disposition. Case Notes

Seventeen-Year-Old Defendant Charged in District Court — Denial of Transfer to Youth Court Proper: A 17-year-old defendant was charged directly in District Court with two consolidated counts of sexual intercourse without consent concerning two separate incidents. The District Court subsequently denied the defendant's motions to have the charges moved to Youth Court, concluding that the defendant's age, home environment, conduct while on release, minimization of his alleged conduct, and need for more structured supervision made the District Court a more appropriate forum. The defendant agreed to a nonbinding plea agreement for one of the charges and was sentenced to 50 years in prison with 10 years suspended. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the District Court correctly denied the motions for transfer to Youth Court. However, the Supreme Court found that the District Court erred by not including the requirements of 41-5-2503 and remanded to modify the judgment. St. v. Talksabout, 2017 MT 79, 387 Mont. 166, 392 P.3d 574, distinguished in St. v. Johnson, 2023 MT 167, 413 Mont. 202, 534 P.3d 676.

Youth Offender Jointly and Severally Liable for Restitution Award — Failure to Consider Youth's Ability to Pay — Plain Error Warranting New Restitution Hearing: At his plea hearing, the youth defendant admitted to having committed criminal mischief as part of a common scheme, in violation of 45-6-101 and 45-2-101. The youth admitted his participation in 2 nights of vandalism, causing $16,020.63 in damages, out of 11 total nights of vandalism, worth total damages of $78,702.09. At the restitution hearing, the Youth Court held the youth jointly and severally liable for the entire $78,702.09 without inquiring into the extent of the youth's assets or prospects for future earnings. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that it was plain error for the Youth Court to fail to consider the youth's ability to pay the restitution. The Supreme Court took up the issue sua sponte because the error implicated the youth's fundamental constitutional rights under Article II, sec. 15, Mont. Const., as a youth in the Youth Court system faces a different disposition and therefore is not similarly situated to an adult who commits the same offense. Additionally, the criminal mischief statute at 45-6-101(2) expressly requires the court to impose restitution only after fully considering the convicted person's ability to pay. The Supreme Court held that the Youth Court's failure to consider the youth's ability to pay raised questions of the fundamental fairness of the proceedings against him and remanded for a new restitution hearing to consider the youth's ability to pay the full amount of restitution. In re K.E.G., 2013 MT 82, 369 Mont. 375, 298 P.3d 1151.

Jury Instruction on Purpose of Youth Court Act Improper: The Youth Court's act of instructing a deadlocked jury on the legislative purpose of the Youth Court Act was prejudicial because it introduced the positive impact that a guilty verdict would have on the defendant youth and distracted the jurors from weighing only the elements of the criminal charges. St. v. E.M.R., 2013 MT 3, 368 Mont. 179, 292 P.3d 451.

Appropriate Conditions on Probation of Delinquent and Serious Youth Sex Offender: As a youth, D.A.S. was convicted of sexual assault and placed in a youth correctional facility. When D.A.S. turned 18, jurisdiction and supervisory responsibility were transferred from Youth Court to District Court until age 25, and numerous supervisory conditions were attached, including prohibitions on the use of drugs and alcohol, a curfew, and a requirement that D.A.S. obtain a GED 1 year prior to expiration of the sentence. D.A.S. objected to these conditions on grounds that they were unrelated to the crime of sexual assault, but the Supreme Court affirmed, applying St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342, M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), which allows imposition of conditions that have a nexus either to the offense or to the offender. In this case, both alcohol and drug prohibitions were reasonably related to D.A.S.'s rehabilitation and placement in a sexual offender program. A curfew was reasonable to ensure development of a consistent and healthy routine and was reasonable given legislative intent to provide youth offenders with additional supervision. Completion of the high school equivalency test was not an abuse of discretion because it was consistent with legislative intent to rehabilitate youth offenders through competency development, especially given D.A.S.'s expressed desire to further his education. In re D.A.S., 2008 MT 168, 343 M 360, 184 P3d 349 (2008).

Similar Purposes of Adult and Youth Sentencing Statutes Regarding Public Safety and Rehabilitation: In its transfer order, the Youth Court concluded that adult sentencing policies are similar to the sentencing purposes of the Montana Youth Court Act in that both are designed to ensure rehabilitation, accountability, and protection of the community. Spina contended that the conclusion was a misstatement of the law because the declaration of purpose in the Montana Youth Court Act does not promote accountability. The Supreme Court held that, although not identical, the statutes have similar purposes, including holding individuals accountable for their actions through the imposition of restitutionary measures. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Youth Legally Capable of Committing Crime — Jurisdiction When Crime Disclosed After Majority: The District Court has jurisdiction to try an individual charged at age 22 for felonies allegedly committed at age 15, as provided in the court's constitutional grant of jurisdiction over all felonies. The Youth Court Act does not contain any direct statement or implication that the Legislature intended to set the minimum age of criminal responsibility at 16, making a 15-year-old incapable of committing a crime. The primary purposes of statutes defining a "delinquent youth" and providing for transfer to District Court are to clarify that delinquency proceedings are noncriminal and to prohibit prosecution of youths in District Court while they are youths. State ex rel. Elliot v. District Court, 211 M 1, 684 P2d 481, 41 St. Rep. 1184 (1984).

Predetention Hearing: The facts of this case did not demonstrate a violation of this statute by the youth court's denial of assistance of available counsel in a predetention hearing. In re Marten, 174 M 343, 570 P2d 1122 (1977).

Dispositional Stage — Fitness of Parents: At the dispositional stage the concern for the best interests of the youth and community is paramount. The court need not, therefore, make specific findings as to the fitness of the parents. In re Geary, 172 M 204, 562 P2d 821 (1977).

Repeal of Conflicting Laws: By the enactment of Ch. 227, L. 1943 (now repealed), and its amendments covering juveniles and creating juvenile courts, the Legislature intended to repeal all prior laws in conflict therewith and amended the general criminal code insofar as it conflicts with the statutes relating to juveniles. State ex rel. Dahl v. District Court, 134 M 395, 333 P2d 495 (1958).

Disqualification of Judge: Section 93-901, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), which governed the removal of judges in civil actions and matters, applies to juvenile delinquency proceedings as it is the legislative intent that delinquency proceedings are to be treated as civil proceedings. State ex rel. Ostoj v. McClernan, 129 M 160, 284 P2d 252 (1955).

Paternal Nature of Proceedings: Proceedings under the juvenile delinquency law, section 10-601, et seq., R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), are in no sense criminal, as the law does not contemplate punishment for an offense committed by an erring minor. The law is no more than an administrative police regulation for the saving of the child and the protection of society. In administering it the courts act more in a paternal than in a judicial capacity, and the proceedings to be conducted under the act are exclusive. State ex rel. Palagi v. Freeman, 81 M 132, 262 P 168 (1927).

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 799, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because [section 14] [41-5-1008, renumbered 41-5-1908] grants the board of crime control authority to adopt rules necessary to implement provisions of this bill.

It is the intent of the legislature, in enacting this bill, to provide alternatives to the detention of youth in adult jails in order to meet the requirements of Senate Bill No. 38, which prohibits the detention of youth in adult jails.

In order to ensure that alternatives to jail are established, the legislature intends that each county have the primary responsibility to provide youth detention services, as required by [section 2] [41-5-810, renumbered 41-5-1803]. In addition, in order to stimulate the development of needed services, the legislature intends to provide state grants authorized in [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902], using state and federal funds, to assist counties in providing a spectrum of services for the detention and care of youth. These services are intended to include but are not limited to youth detention facilities, short-term detention centers, holdovers, attendant care, home detention, and programs for the transportation of youth to regional detention facilities.

The legislature intends that counties receiving state grants should share in the costs of services in order to prevent excessive utilization of services and to give counties a financial incentive to hold down program costs. For this reason, [section 10] [41-5-1004, renumbered 41-5-1904] requires that state grants be provided on a matching basis or, if in a block grant, based on a percentage of the approved cost of services.

In order to discourage the use of secure detention and to promote the use of less costly, nonsecure community-based programs, the legislature intends to provide state grants to counties at a higher rate of payment for such services, including holdovers, attendant care, and other alternatives to secure detention.

The legislature further intends that, as a condition of receiving state grants under [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902], each county shall develop a written plan for providing youth detention services, including alternatives to secure detention. The development of county plans is required to ensure that formal planning does, in fact, occur and to make certain that state grants are not provided for services that are not well planned in advance.

As a further condition of receiving state grants under [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902], each county shall, within a reasonable period of time, demonstrate compliance or substantial compliance with state law and policies contained in the Montana Youth Court Act relating to the detention and placement of youth. The legislature intends that the board of crime control review and monitor counties receiving grants under [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902] to assure compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act.

Finally, the legislature intends that the board of crime control adopt rules as authorized in [section 14] [41-5-1008, renumbered 41-5-1908]. In adopting rules, the board may:

(1) establish requirements for approved holdovers consistent with the definition of holdovers provided in 41-5-103(13);

(2) designate geographical areas of the state that are eligible for creation of a youth detention region under [section 4] [41-5-812, renumbered 41-5-1805]. In designating these areas, the board shall use available state data showing the number of youth held in detention in each county of the state.

(3) adopt procedures governing the distribution and allocation of funds in accordance with [sections 10 and 11] [41-5-1004 and 41-5-1005, renumbered 41-5-1904 and 41-5-1905];

(4) provide a system to review and monitor counties under [section 9] [41-5-1003, renumbered 41-5-1903] to assure that counties receiving grants are in compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act;

(5) provide standards for determining compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act pursuant to [section 9] [41-5-1003, renumbered 41-5-1903]. These standards should be based upon comparable standards for compliance with sections 223(a)(12) and 223(a)(14) of the federal Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974.

(6) establish a process for providing notice and fair hearings required under [section 9] [41-5-1003, renumbered 41-5-1903] in order to terminate state grants to counties that fail to attain compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act."

1987 Amendments: Chapter 475 inserted definition of detention facility.

1983 Amendments: Chapter 233, at end of (17), deleted "and Swan River youth forest camp".

Chapter 465 made the following changes: in (2), substituted present definition for "the department of institutions, the department of social and rehabilitation services, and any division or department of either"; in (18) and (19) inserted "substitute" after "temporary"; deleted former (20), which read: "District youth guidance home means a family-oriented residence established in a judicial district of the state of Montana as an alternative to existing state youth correctional facilities, the function of which is to provide a home and guidance through adult supervision for delinquent youths and youths in need of supervision."; and inserted definition of substitute care.

Case Notes

Valuation of Damaged Automobile of "At Least $1,000" in Youth Court Held Insufficient to Support Adjudication as Delinquent Youth — Failure to Develop Argument in Brief: J.D.N. was adjudicated in Youth Court of damaging an automobile that the court valued to be of "at least $1,000" for the purposes of 45-6-101. The court concluded that J.D.N. committed felony criminal mischief and was therefore adjudicated to be a delinquent youth under 41-5-1502. J.D.N. argued that the finding by the court that the vehicle was worth "at least $1,000" was insufficient to support an adjudication that he was a delinquent youth as defined in 41-5-103. The Supreme Court agreed, noting that the criminal mischief statute uses the language "in excess of $1,000." The Supreme Court therefore remanded the case to the Youth Court and directed a disposition consistent with the finding that J.D.N. committed an offense that, if committed by an adult, would be a misdemeanor. The court declined to enter an order dismissing the petition charging J.D.N. to be a delinquent youth, saying that J.D.N. had failed to develop an argument for that result in his brief and that the court would not do it for him, citing St. v. Torgerson, 2008 MT 303, 345 M 532, 192 P3d 695 (2008). In re J.D.N., 2008 MT 420, 347 M 368, 199 P3d 189 (2008).

Youth Court — Lack of Jurisdiction to Determine Place and Length of Commitment: B.L.T., a 15-year-old youth, was charged with theft, escape, and criminal mischief. The Youth Court ordered that B.L.T. be committed to the custody of the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections), with placement at Pine Hills until he reached the age of 18. The Supreme Court noted that this section defines "legal custody" as including the right to determine "with whom the youth shall live and for what period". The Supreme Court noted that even though the Youth Court has continuing jurisdiction over a youth under 41-5-205, placement by the Youth Court is not tantamount to a sentence of imprisonment because the purpose of the Montana Youth Court Act is rehabilitation rather than punishment in a penal institution. This purpose is consistent with 41-5-523 (renumbered 41-5-1512), which allows the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) to determine the place and length of placement of the youth. The Youth Court therefore had no authority to commit to Pine Hills for a specific period of time. In re B.L.T., 258 M 468, 853 P2d 1226, 50 St. Rep. 617 (1993).

Youth Properly Adjudicated Delinquent Improperly Committed to Correctional Facility: H.F. violated the terms of her probation by violating curfew and using alcohol. She was adjudged a delinquent youth and placed in the custody of the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) until age 19. H.F. was also placed in a youth correctional facility on the basis of being a serious juvenile offender. The Supreme Court held that the youth had properly been designated a delinquent youth and placed in the Department's custody. However, the acts that constituted a violation of her probation were not the serious acts set out in the statutory definition of a serious juvenile offender. Therefore, the Youth Court was without authority to place her in a correctional facility. In re H.F., 242 M 381, 791 P2d 53, 47 St. Rep. 826 (1990).

Youth Violating Probation Conditions: H.F.'s mother filed a complaint charging the youth with ungovernable behavior. H.F. entered into a consent agreement that established 13 rules of probation. The youth subsequently violated several of the rules, was adjudicated a delinquent youth, and was committed to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) until the age of 19. The Supreme Court held that H.F. had been properly designated a delinquent youth because one of the statutory grounds for such adjudication is violation of parole. In re H.F., 242 M 381, 791 P2d 53, 47 St. Rep. 757 (1990).

"Delinquent Youth" — Felony Basis: The Youth Court's finding that the youth had committed a deliberate homicide, although based entirely on circumstantial evidence, was supported by substantial evidence in the record and therefore was sufficient to support a finding that he was a delinquent youth within the meaning of 41-5-103. St. v. Twoteeth, 219 M 101, 711 P2d 789, 42 St. Rep. 1873 (1985).

Youth Legally Capable of Committing Crime — Jurisdiction When Crime Disclosed After Majority: The District Court has jurisdiction to try an individual charged at age 22 for felonies allegedly committed at age 15, as provided in the court's constitutional grant of jurisdiction over all felonies. The Youth Court Act does not contain any direct statement or implication that the Legislature intended to set the minimum age of criminal responsibility at 16, making a 15-year-old incapable of committing a crime. The primary purposes of statutes defining a "delinquent youth" and providing for transfer to District Court are to clarify that delinquency proceedings are noncriminal and to prohibit prosecution of youths in District Court while they are youths. State ex rel. Elliot v. District Court, 211 M 1, 684 P2d 481, 41 St. Rep. 1184 (1984).

Youth in Need of Supervision (Now Youth in Need of Intervention) Who Violates Probation by Truancy Adjudged Delinquent Youth: The Montana Youth Court Act, which allows a youth in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention) who has violated probation to be adjudged a delinquent youth, is not unconstitutional as violative of the due process, equal protection, or cruel and unusual punishment provisions of the United States and Montana Constitutions. The Supreme Court rejected appellant's assertion that a juvenile status offender who violated the terms of her probation by truancy should not be considered a delinquent youth and subjected to greater punishment for the same conduct which originally gave the Youth Court authority to designate her a youth in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention). In re C.H., 210 M 184, 683 P2d 931, 41 St. Rep. 997 (1984).

"Delinquent Youth": The Youth Court's finding that the youth had committed a burglary, a charge which the youth admitted and which was supported by the evidence, was sufficient to support a finding that he was a delinquent youth within the meaning of 41-5-103. In re V.R.B., 201 M 127, 653 P2d 133, 39 St. Rep. 2001 (1982).

Dispositional Stage — Fitness of Parents: At the dispositional stage the concern for the best interests of the youth and community is paramount. The court need not, therefore, make specific findings as to the fitness of the parents. In re Geary, 172 M 204, 562 P2d 821 (1977).

Citation to Parents: Although youths admitted violations contained in the petition while on the stand, court was without jurisdiction to order commitment where second hearing proceeded upon citation to parents that was not in compliance with section 10-606, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed). St. v. Johnson, 141 M 1, 374 P2d 504 (1962).

Criminal Court Jurisdiction: The words "and carrying a deadly weapon or weapons with intent to assault" do not modify robbery or any of the other specifically listed crimes; therefore, as to the crime of robbery, possession of a weapon need not be charged. State ex rel. Keast v. District Court, 136 M 367, 348 P2d 135 (1959). (Dissenting opinion, 136 M 367, 348 P2d 135 (1959).)

Age Controlling Element: The controlling element in juvenile laws is age, not minority. Section 12276, R.C.M. 1921 (now repealed), relating to juvenile delinquents, reveals the legislative intention to include rather than exclude married minors. Marriage releases a child from parental authority, but it does not change the status of a child from that of a minor to that of an adult. State ex rel. Foot v. District Court, 77 M 290, 250 P 973, 49 ALR 398 (1926).

Attorney General's Opinions

Delinquent Youth Charge for Probation Violation: A youth in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention) who violates probation could be charged by petition as a delinquent youth under the definition of a delinquent youth in this section and could then be committed for a period of more than 6 months. This is an alternative to a revocation proceeding under 41-5-533 (renumbered 41-5-1431). 40 A.G. Op. 74 (1984).

Case Notes

Absence of Youth Court Procedure to Determine Competency of Youths Not Violative of Equal Protection: Attorneys for a 9-year-old youth charged with arson contended that the youth lacked the capacity to form the requisite mental intent to commit the crime and that the youth was too young to understand the process against him and to effectively assist in his defense. A motion was made to dismiss. The Youth Court determined that the youth understood the charges and his rights and sentenced the youth to 2 years' probation. On appeal, the youth asserted that the Youth Court Act violated the constitutional guarantee of equal protection by not providing a procedure to evaluate the competency of youths similar to the procedure for determining the competency of adults to stand trial. The Supreme Court disagreed. A youth alleging incompetency based on immaturity is not similarly situated to an adult criminal defendant alleging mental disease or defect. All youths experience a period of immaturity, which most youths outgrow, but the same cannot be said for a mental disease or defect. The court noted that the logical extension of the youth's argument would require that immature youths be placed in mental health facilities until they are mature enough to stand trial. Because immature youths are not similarly situated to adult criminal defendants alleging mental disease or defect, equal protection was not implicated. In this case, substantial evidence indicated that the youth could consult with his attorneys and understand the proceedings against him and that the youth could form the requisite criminal intent of purposely and knowingly starting a fire. The youth was fit to proceed and did not suffer from a mental disorder, and the youth's due process rights were protected by hearings at which the youth's competency to proceed was determined. The Youth Court was affirmed. In re G.T.M., 2009 MT 443, 354 M 197, 222 P3d 626 (2009). See also State ex rel. Elliot v. District Court, 211 M 1, 684 P2d 481 (1984), and In re S.M.K.-S.H., 2012 MT 281, 367 Mont. 176, 290 P.3d 718, in which the court determined the youth was not similarly situated to an adult because he faced a different disposition for assault with a weapon as a delinquent youth than an adult would face in District Court.

Youth Court Adjudication Not Considered Conviction — No Authority to Require Adjudicated Youth to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender Under Pre-2007 Law: In 1998, 16-year-old Hastings was adjudicated a delinquent youth in Youth Court, admitting one offense of sexual intercourse without consent, and was committed to the Department of Corrections (DOC). When Hastings turned 18 in 2000, his case was transferred to District Court until age 25 based on the parties' stipulation that Hastings had not completed sex offender treatment or paid restitution and was at high risk to reoffend. The District Court then determined that Hastings had violated the conditions of the Youth Court order and committed Hastings to the DOC and also required that Hastings register as a level 2 sex offender. Hastings initially registered as a sex offender, but failed to update registration after moving and was subsequently charged with failure to maintain registration. Hastings moved to dismiss the charge, asserting that he had not been convicted of a sexual offense and that neither the commitment order nor statutes required him to register after discharging his sentence. The motion was denied, and Hastings appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Although the Youth Court had the authority to require sex offender registration pursuant to 41-5-1513, no requirement was made in this case. Because the Youth Court adjudication did not constitute a conviction, the District Court could not impose registration requirements under 46-18-201. (Note that the 2007 Legislature amended 46-23-502 to include an adjudicated youth in the definition of a sexual or violent offender.) The District Court's opinion that 41-5-1513 suggests a wholesale incorporation of sexual offender registry into the Montana Youth Court Act was erroneous, and absent statutory authority, a court may not impose a registration requirement. Failure to grant Hastings' motion to dismiss was error, and the case was remanded for dismissal. St. v. Hastings, 2007 MT 294, 340 M 1, 171 P3d 726 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), and St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

Washington Youth Sexual Offender Required to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender if Residing in Montana: At age 15, Villanueva was adjudicated guilty of first degree rape in Washington state and was later required to register for life in that state as a sexual offender. Villanueva subsequently moved to Montana where he resided for 6 weeks. After being arrested for a domestic disturbance, it was discovered that Villanueva had not registered as a sexual or violent offender in Montana, and he was charged with failure to register. Villanueva contended that Montana law did not apply to his Washington registration requirement because he did not meet the definition of sexual or violent offender under 46-23-502 and because a 1989 Attorney General's opinion held that juveniles adjudicated delinquent under the Montana Youth Court Act whose cases have not been transferred to District Court are not required to register. Villanueva moved to dismiss the charge, but the District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the Washington definition of sexual offender may not have been identical to the Montana definition, Villanueva was nevertheless a sexual offender under Washington law and was therefore required to register in Montana under 46-23-504. Further, Villanueva could not rely on the Attorney General's opinion because he was not adjudicated under the Montana Youth Court Act. The Supreme Court noted that the Washington sexual offender registration law also required Villanueva to register in another state if he changed state residency, so under both Washington and Montana law, Villanueva was required to register as a sexual offender. Villanueva's motion to dismiss was properly denied. St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

Evidence and Disposition — Admission in Criminal Proceeding — Reversible Error: On appeal by defendant following his conviction, the Supreme Court held that evidence given in a Youth Court proceeding against a juvenile and evidence of the disposition of the juvenile in such a proceeding are to be excluded for all purposes. It was reversible error requiring a new trial when, upon cross-examination of defendant's character witness, the prosecutor asked the witness if he knew of a charge of attempted rape when defendant was 15 years old and service of 6 months' probation. The questions of the prosecutor in regard to the juvenile proceedings were evidence and inadmissible. St. v. Holzworth, 201 M 54, 651 P2d 1255, 39 St. Rep. 1949 (1982).

County, Not State, Required to Fund Legal Expenses of Indigent Juvenile Under Youth Court Act: Youth Court defense expenses are not included in 3-5-901 as a specific expense that the state is required to fund; thus, the Legislature did not intend the state to be responsible for funding Youth Court expenses. Rather, pursuant to 41-5-104 (now repealed) and this section, the Board of County Commissioners is required to fund the legal defense expenses of an indigent youth against whom a petition has been filed in Youth Court. 48 A.G. Case Notes

No Absolute Right to Counsel at Placement Hearing — Due Process: A delinquent youth was not denied due process when, pursuant to 41-5-523 (renumbered 41-5-1512), he was placed in a youth incarceration facility without an adversarial hearing to decide his placement. Beyond commitment of the youth by the Youth Court, the delinquent youth has no absolute right to counsel at the placement hearing. However, the youth is not without due process rights at the hearing stage. A youth placement committee created by this section (formerly 41-5-525) makes a recommendation to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections), which can accept or reject the recommendation under 41-5-527 (renumbered 41-5-123, now repealed). In addition, the Youth Court can modify that decision if placement is not in the best interests of the child. In re Peterson, 235 M 313, 767 P2d 319, 46 St. Rep. 13 (1989).

Youth Court Jurisdiction Under 45-5-214 Not Exclusive Jurisdiction — District Court Jurisdiction Over Youth Offender May Be Established in Conjunction With Commission of Enumerated Felony. St. v. Pehringer, 2023 MT 146, 413 Mont. 122, 533 P.3d 657.

District Court's Continued Imposition of House Arrest Upheld After Youth Court Transfer Upheld: The Youth Court and the District Court did not err in imposing house arrest with restrictive conditions on the appellant pending a final disposition of his case. Pursuant to the Youth Court's order, the appellant was no longer under Department of Corrections supervision once he turned 18 years old. However, pursuant to 41-5-203, the Youth Court had jurisdiction over the appellant until he turned 21 or until it transferred jurisdiction to the District Court. Once the appellant's case was transferred to it, the District Court had the authority to impose conditions consistent with the underlying Youth Court disposition, and continuation of the appellant's house arrest in keeping with the Youth Court's order was consistent with the underlying Youth Court disposition order. In re J.W., 2016 MT 330, 386 Mont. 1, 387 P.3d 195.

Failure to Notify Parents of Hearing to Transfer Jurisdiction to District Court — Statutory Notice Requirement Not Jurisdictional — Youth Court Jurisdiction: E.G. was found to be a delinquent youth by the Youth Court. The commitment order stated that the Youth Court would retain jurisdiction until E.G. was 21 and would consider transfer of the case to District Court. Shortly after E.G. turned 18, the state filed a motion to transfer supervisory control to the District Court. E.G. was represented by his attorney and expressly consented to the transfer. The parties discussed the parental notification requirements in 41-5-208, but E.G. consented to continue the hearing, regardless of whether his parents received notice. The Youth Court entered an order granting the motion to transfer supervision of E.G. to District Court until he was age 25, with potential release from supervision for good behavior. However, after E.G. violated conditions of his probation, the District Court sentenced him to the Department of Corrections until age 25, with no time suspended. On appeal, E.G. claimed that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to revoke probation because his parents did not receive notice of the Youth Court transfer hearing under 41-5-208. The Supreme Court affirmed the sentence and held that the parental notice requirement does not withdraw, circumscribe, limit, or affect the Youth Court's jurisdiction over the issue of transferring supervision to District Court. In re E.G., 2014 MT 148, 375 Mont. 252, 326 P.3d 1092.

Minor's Prior DUI in City Court Properly Applied to Felony DUI Charge — No Violation of Constitutional Rights in City Court: Allen was arrested for a felony fourth DUI in 2004. Calculation of the number of DUIs included Allen's first arrest in 1997 as a minor, to which Allen pleaded guilty in City Court. Allen contended that it was improper to include the 1997 conviction in the total because that conviction was constitutionally infirm in that the City Court failed to advise him of his rights, including the right to counsel, and accepted his guilty plea without consent of a parent. Allen further contended that as a minor he was incapable of knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently waiving the right to counsel. The Supreme Court disagreed. City Court records provided direct evidence that Allen's 1997 conviction was not obtained in violation of Allen's constitutional rights, and Allen failed to rebut the presumption of regularity that attached to the 1997 conviction. With specific regard to the right to counsel argument, the court noted that because the Youth Court does not have concurrent jurisdiction with the City Court over traffic violations, including DUIs, Allen was incorrect in claiming that the right to counsel could only have been waived by Allen and a parent at the 1997 proceedings. Therefore, application of Allen's 1997 conviction in calculating a felony DUI was not error. St. v. Allen, 2009 MT 124, 350 M 204, 206 P3d 951 (2009).

No Youth Court Authority to Expunge DUI Offenses — Elements of Judicial Estoppel Not Met: Following Darrah's completion of a Youth Drug Court program in 2004, the Youth Court ordered that Darrah's prior criminal record be expunged, including a previous minor in possession offense and a 2002 DUI. Darrah was subsequently charged in 2005 with second offense DUI, based on the prior 2002 DUI, and in 2006 Darrah was charged with third offense DUI. Citing the principle of judicial estoppel, Darrah asserted that because the Youth Court record had been expunged, the 2002 DUI should not count against him. The District Court disagreed and Darrah appealed. The Supreme Court applied the elements of judicial estoppel set out in Vogel v. Intercontinental Truck Body, Inc., 2006 MT 131, 332 M 322, 137 P3d 573 (2006), and determined that Darrah had failed to demonstrate that each element was met, so judicial estoppel did not apply. Further, there is no authority under which the Youth Court could order expungement of Darrah's DUI offenses. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Darrah, 2009 MT 96, 350 M 70, 205 P3d 792 (2009), following St. v. Chesley, 2004 MT 165, 322 M 26, 92 P3d 1212 (2004).

Due Process Satisfied by Requiring Hearing After Information Filed — Butler Overruled: In St. v. Butler, 1999 MT 70, 294 M 17, 977 P2d 1000 (1999), the Supreme Court held that to satisfy due process, a youth must be afforded a hearing prior to the filing of an information in District Court to charge the youth as an adult. Subsequent amendment to 41-5-206 established a transfer hearing requirement within 30 days after leave to file an information is granted. The amendment was held to satisfy due process, so to the extent that Butler required a hearing before filing in District Court, Butler was overruled. St. v. McKee, 2006 MT 5, 330 M 249, 127 P3d 445 (2006).

Direct Filing of Information in District Court Rather Than Filing in Youth Court Violative of Due Process — Probable Cause Hearing Required: Pursuant to 41-5-206, Butler, a youth, was charged in District Court with attempted deliberate homicide and attempted robbery. Butler moved to have the District Court declare 41-5-206 unconstitutional on grounds that it violated his right to due process by allowing the prosecution to file an information directly in District Court rather than Youth Court without first affording him a hearing. The motion was denied, and Butler appealed. Although it is within the province of the prosecution to move the District Court for leave to file an information in that court if the youth has attained a certain age and is alleged to have committed certain unlawful conduct, the prosecution's discretion ends at that point. Absent a pure prosecutorial waiver system, the ultimate decision rests with the District Court, which must make specific findings that there is probable cause to believe the youth committed the offense and that, because of the seriousness of the offense, the case should be filed in District Court. In Butler's case, the District Court based its decision solely on the affidavit of the prosecution and Butler did not have the opportunity, with assistance of counsel, to challenge the specific findings of the court. Although declining to declare the entire statute unconstitutional, the Supreme Court cited Kent v. U.S., 383 US 541, 16 L Ed 2d 84, 86 S Ct 1045 (1966), in holding that because the decision in this regard is potentially critically important to the youth, under the 14th amendment to the United States Constitution, Butler's right to due process requires that the District Court hold a hearing when rendering a decision under 41-5-206(3). St. v. Butler, 1999 MT 70, 294 M 17, 977 P2d 1000, 56 St. Rep. 291 (1999), followed and applied retroactively in St. v. O'Neill, 1999 MT 224, 296 M 71, 985 P2d 154, 56 St. Rep. 886 (1999). Butler was overruled, to the extent that it requires a hearing before filing in District Court, in St. v. McKee, 2006 MT 5, 330 M 249, 127 P3d 445 (2006).

Termination of Youth Court Jurisdiction — No Bar to Jurisdiction of District Court: The defendant was under 18 years of age when the crime of which he was accused was committed. When the defendant was 20 years old he confessed, and the County Attorney filed a petition in the Youth Court, seeking a declaration that the defendant was a delinquent youth and requesting authority to incarcerate him. The defendant turned 21 before the motion was ruled on. He then was charged with deliberate homicide in District Court. The defendant contended that when the Youth Court lost jurisdiction over him under 41-5-205, the District Court did not have jurisdiction because once jurisdiction has attached under 41-5-203, the District Court can never assume jurisdiction over the offense underlying the Youth Court's proceeding absent transfer under 41-5-206, which did not occur here. The Supreme Court held that on termination of Youth Court jurisdiction, there was no bar to the exercise of jurisdiction by the District Court under Art. VII, sec. 4(1), Mont. Const., 3-5-302, and 46-2-201, over felony proceedings against the defendant. Exclusive original jurisdiction of the Youth Court does not divest a District Court of jurisdiction over crimes committed by a juvenile defendant. St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985).

Youth Court — Prosecution of Felonies: In two cases pending in the Youth Court, two youths, ages 14 and 15, were charged with numerous felony counts. The State sought to arrest the proceeding in order to move that the youths be transferred to the jurisdiction of the District Court under 41-5-206. The State contends that the requirement for transfer contained in that statute effectively gives the Youth Court all jurisdiction over all felony criminal cases if the youth charged is less than 16 years old and that this provision conflicts with Art. VII, sec. 4(1), Mont. Const., which provides for District Court jurisdiction. The State also contends that this constitutional provision gives the District Court exclusive jurisdiction in all criminal cases amounting to a felony and that a youth under 16 years is legally capable of committing a felony. In denying the state's application for relief, the Supreme Court held that: (1) the term "original jurisdiction", as used in that section of the constitution, does not mean exclusive jurisdiction; and (2) felonies may be prosecuted in the Youth Court because when it acts in jurisdiction it is acting as a District Court. In re T.L.G. & M.E.H., 214 M 164, 692 P2d 1227, 41 St. Rep. 2388 (1984).

Youth Legally Capable of Committing Crime — Jurisdiction When Crime Disclosed After Majority: The District Court has jurisdiction to try an individual charged at age 22 for felonies allegedly committed at age 15, as provided in the court's constitutional grant of jurisdiction over all felonies. The Youth Court Act does not contain any direct statement or implication that the Legislature intended to set the minimum age of criminal responsibility at 16, making a 15-year-old incapable of committing a crime. The primary purposes of statutes defining a "delinquent youth" and providing for transfer to District Court are to clarify that delinquency proceedings are noncriminal and to prohibit prosecution of youths in District Court while they are youths. State ex rel. Elliot v. District Court, 211 M 1, 684 P2d 481, 41 St. Rep. 1184 (1984).

Traffic Offenses by Youths — Jurisdiction: Section 61-12-601 (now repealed), giving District Courts, Justices' Courts, and Municipal and City Courts concurrent original jurisdiction of all proceedings concerning unlawful operation of motor vehicles by persons under the age of 18, does not give jurisdiction to Youth Courts or grant the named courts jurisdiction concurrent with Youth Courts. Youth Court jurisdiction is fixed by 41-5-203, which specifically excludes traffic violations. State ex rel. Maier v. City Court, 203 M 443, 662 P2d 276, 40 St. Rep. 560 (1983).

Possession of Alcohol by Youth — Prosecutor's Choice of Forum: In light of 45-5-624, the County Attorney has sole discretion over which court (Justice's or Youth Court) hears a case involving illegal possession of alcohol by a minor. Edward v. Collings, 193 M 426, 632 P2d 325, 38 St. Rep. 1240 (1981).

Jurisdiction Over Indian Juveniles: The juvenile court did not have jurisdiction of charges of alleged acts of delinquency by enrolled Indians within the exterior boundaries of the reservation, although the tribal court had "remanded" the proceedings to juvenile court pursuant to a reservation code provision, where the State had not accepted jurisdiction through affirmative legislation and special tribal election. Blackwolf v. District Court, 158 M 523, 493 P2d 1293 (1972).

Involuntary Manslaughter: Conviction of involuntary manslaughter (now negligent homicide, 45-5-104), arising from driving an automobile while intoxicated, was proper notwithstanding defendant's contention that since he was a juvenile and "delinquent child" within the meaning of the juvenile code he could be punished only civilly for his acts and not criminally. St. v. Medicine Bull, 152 M 34, 445 P2d 916 (1968).

Right to Trial by Jury:
A child under the age of 16 years may never be tried for a law violation in the District Court. He is solely under the exclusive jurisdiction of the juvenile court. State ex rel. Dahl v. District Court, 134 M 395, 333 P2d 495 (1958). (Annotator's note: See sec. 3, Ch. 60, L. 1985, for crimes for which a child 12 years of age or more may be tried as an adult.)

Where a minor, charged with being a delinquent, made a demand for a jury trial on the day preceding the trial and at the opening of the trial, the court was without jurisdiction to try him without a jury. Application of Banschbach, 133 M 312, 323 P2d 1112 (1958).

Disqualification of Judge: Section 93-901, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), which governs the removal of judges in civil actions and matters, applies to juvenile delinquency proceedings as the legislative intent as found in the juvenile statutes indicates that delinquency proceedings are to be treated as civil proceedings. State ex rel. Ostoj v. McClernan, 129 M 160, 284 P2d 252 (1955).

Criminal Liability: It is the child as defined in section 10-602, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), to whom this part is primarily applicable and the one with whom the juvenile courts and authorities are ordinarily concerned. When such person arrives at the age of 18, he is an adult and under the criminal laws of this state is subject to the same rules of society as is any other adult no matter what his age may be. Exceptions found in this part are those regarding the person between 18 and 21 years of age, and such exceptions have to do with detention of such person and trial of such person if the offense for which he is charged occurred prior to the time he reached the age of 18. State ex rel. Bresnahan v. District Court, 127 M 310, 263 P2d 968 (1953). (See dissenting opinion in 127 M 310, 263 P2d 968 (1953).)

District Court Jurisdiction: Section 10-603, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), provided that the juvenile court shall have exclusive original jurisdiction in proceedings concerning any person under 21 years of age charged with having violated any law of the state, with specified exceptions. The District Court and not the juvenile court had jurisdiction over a defendant who was charged with attempted rape and who was under 21 but over 18 years of age at the time the alleged act was charged to have been committed. State ex rel. Bresnahan v. District Court, 127 M 310, 263 P2d 968 (1953).

Case Notes

Transfer Request to Youth Court Properly Denied — Interests of Community Protection Not Served — Nature of Offense Supported Finding: A 17-year-old defendant was charged as an adult with one count of sexual intercourse without consent and one count of sexual assault. Subsequently, the District Court denied a motion to transfer prosecution to Youth Court, and the defendant was sentenced to 6 years and 60 days in a county detention center. On appeal, the Supreme Court considered three factors in 41-5-206 and determined that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the lengthier term of supervision available in District Court would better serve the interest of community protection. Moreover, the District Court properly considered sufficient credible evidence through testimony concerning the nature of the offense in determining that a transfer to Youth Court was not warranted. 1987 Amendment: In (2) substituted present language for former text that read: "at the time of commitment of the youth to the custody of the department of institutions".

Case Notes

Youth Court Authority to Extend Probation Period at Probation Revocation Proceeding — No Violation of Equal Protection: At age 14, the appellant admitted to the charge of assault with a weapon and was placed on probation until his 18th birthday by the Youth Court. Two years later, the appellant admitted to possession of a handgun, in violation of his probation agreement. At the disposition hearing, the Youth Court revoked the appellant's probation, committed him to the Pine Hills Youth Correctional Facility until his 18th birthday, and extended his probation term until his 21st birthday to ensure he would be fully rehabilitated. The appellant appealed the Youth Court order on the grounds that the Youth Court had no authority to impose an additional probationary period beyond the period in the initial order. The appellant also asserted that he was denied equal protection of the law because he was similarly situated to an adult who committed assault with a weapon but was treated differently because the adult could not be subject to an additional probation period upon revocation. The Supreme Court upheld the order of the Youth Court because, under 41-5-1431, the court could have issued an order of commitment to the correctional facility and required the appellant to remain on probation until his 21st birthday at the original hearing. In addition, the Supreme Court determined that the appellant was not similarly situated to an adult who committed assault with a weapon because specific statutory provisions within the Youth Court Act ensure minors are treated differently from adults, including emphasizing rehabilitation, which was the Youth Court's justification for extending the appellant's probation. In re S.M.K.-S.H., 2012 MT 281, 367 Mont. 176, 290 P.3d 718.

Retention of Jurisdiction Proper: A youth appealed the Youth Court's denial of his motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction, arguing that the Youth Court lost jurisdiction when his probation ended when he turned 18 years old and therefore lacked jurisdiction to transfer the matter to District Court. The Supreme Court, distinguishing In re K.D.K., 2006 MT 187, 333 Mont. 100, 141 P.3d 1212, affirmed, concluding that the Youth Court retained jurisdiction because it had not terminated its jurisdiction pursuant to 41-5-205 and because 41-5-208 allows the Youth Court to transfer a matter to District Court at any time after the youth reaches the age of 18 but before the youth reaches the age of 21. In re T.M.L., 2012 MT 9, 363 Mont. 304, 268 P.3d 1255.

District Court Order Revoking Youth's Probation and Committing Him to Department Judged Reversible Error — No Authority of Department to Impose Standard Probationary Conditions: As a youth of 13, defendant committed sexual assault and was placed on probation with the condition that he complete an outpatient sexual offender treatment program. When the program had not been completed 2 years later, defendant's probation was revoked and he was placed at Pine Hills until age 18 and until completion of the Pine Hills sexual offender program, and if he failed to complete the program, he would be required to register as a sexual offender. When defendant turned 18, he was released from Pine Hills without completing the program. Defendant then stipulated to transfer supervisory control to District Court. The stipulation included a provision that defendant complete sexual offender treatment by age 25 and provided that defendant would have to register as a sexual offender if the treatment was not completed. Although the stipulation contained no other conditions or restrictions, defendant also signed a form that included the standard conditions of probation adopted by the Department of Corrections (DOC). Defendant subsequently violated some of the standard probation conditions, and the state petitioned to revoke probation. Defendant moved to dismiss the petition, but the District Court denied the motion and committed defendant to the DOC until age 25. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The stipulation placed only one condition on defendant, that being the requirement to complete sexual offender treatment by age 25. Defendant was not yet 25 years old, so that condition was not violated. The standard DOC probation conditions were imposed by the DOC, not by the court, and the DOC was not authorized to add conditions to those articulated by the court's judgment, nor did the court have authority to revoke defendant's probation for failure to abide by conditions added by the DOC after the sentence. Therefore, the District Court's judgment revoking defendant's probation and committing him to the DOC was reversible error. St. v. Andersen-Conway, 2007 MT 281, 339 M 439, 171 P3d 678 (2007).

No Authority of Youth Court to Order Youth to Pay Restitution Past Age of Majority: In 2000, a 12-year-old who admitted sexually assaulting an 8-year-old was adjudicated a delinquent youth by the Youth Court and placed on probation until age 18. Probation conditions included payment of restitution and the costs of the victim's therapy. In 2003, the Youth Court was notified by a restitution officer that a therapist had advised that counseling for the victim and the victim's mother was complete and that the restitution amount owed was $4,507.53; however, no restitution hearing was held. Nevertheless, the state and the youth's parents executed a restitution agreement specifying that the youth was liable for payment of restitution and identifying $4,507.53 as the total restitution due. The Youth Court signed the 2003 agreement, and $4,507.53 was subsequently paid in full. In 2005, the state requested a restitution hearing, noting that the victim's mother had submitted additional restitution claims of $4,352.93 for therapeutic sports activity for the victim and $8,309.25 for university schooling costs for the mother. At a hearing held 2 days before the end of the youth's probation, the Youth Court claimed jurisdiction over the youth for financial purposes until the youth turned 21 and ordered the youth to pay $12,662.18 in additional restitution to cover the mother's claims for sports and school-related costs. The youth appealed on grounds that the Youth Court had no authority to order additional restitution, and the Supreme Court reversed. The Youth Court limited its retention of jurisdiction beyond the youth's 18th birthday to enforcement of financial obligations set forth in the original disposition order and in the 2003 agreement establishing the total restitution to be paid by the youth. Therefore, the Youth Court did not have jurisdiction to impose additional restitution in a stand-alone order after the youth's probation, of which payment of restitution was a condition, expired, and the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to vacate the order for additional restitution. (See 2023 amendment to 41-5-205.) In re K.D.K., 2006 MT 187, 333 M 100, 141 P3d 1212 (2006), distinguished in In re T.M.L., 2012 MT 9, 363 Mont. 304, 268 P.3d 1255, and in In re S.M.K.-S.H., 2012 MT 281, 367 Mont. 176, 290 P.3d 718, in which the Supreme Court upheld a Youth Court order extending the youth's probation period at a revocation hearing when the original probation had not terminated.

Youth Court Jurisdiction Improperly Extended for Youth Charged With Crime Punishable by Life in Prison: In the case of a youth charged with felony sexual intercourse without consent, the Youth Court was without legal basis to extend its jurisdiction beyond the youth's 21st birthday because the youth was charged with a crime punishable by life imprisonment. In re N.V., 2004 MT 80, 320 M 442, 87 P3d 510 (2004).

Termination of Youth Court Jurisdiction — No Bar to Jurisdiction of District Court: The defendant was under 18 years of age when the crime of which he was accused was committed. When the defendant was 20 years old he confessed, and the County Attorney filed a petition in the Youth Court, seeking a declaration that the defendant was a delinquent youth and requesting authority to incarcerate him. The defendant turned 21 before the motion was ruled on. He then was charged with deliberate homicide in District Court. The defendant contended that when the Youth Court lost jurisdiction over him under 41-5-205, the District Court did not have jurisdiction because once jurisdiction has attached under 41-5-203, the District Court can never assume jurisdiction over the offense underlying the Youth Court's proceeding absent transfer under 41-5-206, which did not occur here. The Supreme Court held that on termination of Youth Court jurisdiction, there was no bar to the exercise of jurisdiction by the District Court under Art. VII, sec. 4(1), Mont. Const., 3-5-302, and 46-2-201, over felony proceedings against the defendant. Exclusive original jurisdiction of the Youth Court does not divest a District Court of jurisdiction over crimes committed by a juvenile defendant. St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985).

Chapter 609 near end of (8), after "proper", inserted "including a state youth correctional facility under the procedures of 53-30-212 [renumbered 52-5-111]".

1985 Amendment: Inserted (1)(a)(i) allowing the transfer to District Court of a prosecution involving a youth 12 years of age or older who is charged with sexual intercourse without consent, deliberate homicide, mitigated deliberate homicide, attempted deliberate homicide, or attempted mitigated deliberate homicide; in (1)(a)(ii)(A) substituted "negligent homicide as defined in 45-5-104" for "criminal homicide as defined in 45-5-101"; and at end of (7) inserted "however, no youth under 16 years of age may be confined in the state prison".

1981 Amendment: Inserted subsections (1)(a)(x), allowing attempt of acts enumerated to be transferred to criminal court, (2)(c), allowing court to consider severity of offense in determining transfer, and (6), referring offenses not enumerated to youth or criminal court for trial; substituted "may" for "shall" after "court" in the introductory clause of (2); added the provision relating to prior juvenile history with youth courts to the end of (2)(b).

Evidence of Youth Offender's Attributes Inform Nature of Offense Inquiry — Denial of Transfer to Youth Court Reversed. St. v. Johnson, 2023 MT 167, 413 Mont. 202, 534 P.3d 676.

District Court Jurisdiction Over Youth — Jurisdiction Proper Over Misdemeanor Count Only When Arising Out of Commission of Felony — Misdemeanor Committed Close in Time But in Different Location Involving Different Parties Insufficient to Establish District Court Jurisdiction. St. v. Pehringer, 2023 MT 146, 413 Mont. 122, 533 P.3d 657.

Youth Court Jurisdiction Under 45-5-214 Not Exclusive Jurisdiction — District Court Jurisdiction Over Youth Offender May Be Established in Conjunction With Commission of Enumerated Felony. St. v. Pehringer, 2023 MT 146, 413 Mont. 122, 533 P.3d 657.

110-Year Sentence Not De Facto Life Sentence — Crime Committed While 17 Years Old: The defendant committed a murder in Montana when he was 17 years old. While subsequently serving a sentence in Washington for another murder, the defendant was convicted in Montana and sentenced to 110 years. The sentence was set to run concurrent with his Washington sentence. On a petition for writ of habeas corpus, the defendant argued that the sentence violated his eighth amendment rights because he committed the offense when he was 17 years old, the sentence amounted to a de facto life sentence, and the sentencing court failed to consider the special circumstances of his youth. The Supreme Court held that Miller v. Alabama, 567 U.S. 460 (2012), and subsequent cases apply to discretionary sentences in Montana. The Supreme Court analyzed the unique circumstances of the sentence, finding that the defendant's eligibility for day-for-day good time credit and concurrent nature with the Washington sentence did not render the District Court's sentence a de facto life sentence. Steilman v. Michael, 2017 MT 310, 389 Mont. 512, 407 P.3d 313. However, see In re J.W., 2021 MT 291, 406 Mont. 224, 498 P.3d 211, declining to extend the holding of Steilman regarding consideration of the unique characteristics of youth to a youth court jury's consideration of culpability.

Seventeen-Year-Old Defendant Charged in District Court — Denial of Transfer to Youth Court Proper: A 17-year-old defendant was charged directly in District Court with two consolidated counts of sexual intercourse without consent concerning two separate incidents. The District Court subsequently denied the defendant's motions to have the charges moved to Youth Court, concluding that the defendant's age, home environment, conduct while on release, minimization of his alleged conduct, and need for more structured supervision made the District Court a more appropriate forum. The defendant agreed to a nonbinding plea agreement for one of the charges and was sentenced to 50 years in prison with 10 years suspended. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the District Court correctly denied the motions for transfer to Youth Court. However, the Supreme Court found that the District Court erred by not including the requirements of 41-5-2503 and remanded to modify the judgment. St. v. Talksabout, 2017 MT 79, 387 Mont. 166, 392 P.3d 574, distinguished in St. v. Johnson, 2023 MT 167, 413 Mont. 202, 534 P.3d 676.

Transfer Request to Youth Court Properly Denied — Interests of Community Protection Not Served — Nature of Offense Supported Finding: A 17-year-old defendant was charged as an adult with one count of sexual intercourse without consent and one count of sexual assault. Subsequently, the District Court denied a motion to transfer prosecution to Youth Court, and the defendant was sentenced to 6 years and 60 days in a county detention center. On appeal, the Supreme Court considered three factors in 41-5-206 and determined that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the lengthier term of supervision available in District Court would better serve the interest of community protection. Moreover, the District Court properly considered sufficient credible evidence through testimony concerning the nature of the offense in determining that a transfer to Youth Court was not warranted. St. v. Dietsch, 2013 MT 245, 371 Mont. 460, 308 P.3d 111, distinguished in St. v. Johnson, 2023 MT 167, 413 Mont. 202, 534 P.3d 676.

Untimely Youth Court Transfer Hearing — Failure to Move for Transfer to Youth Court Within Statutory Timeframe Not Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Lindsey was charged with sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault from incidents that occurred when he was 16 and 17 years old. A hearing to transfer the case to Youth Court was not held within 30 days, but Lindsey, who was 18 years old at the time he was charged, pleaded guilty to sexual assault in District Court and waived a Youth Court transfer. Prior to sentencing, Lindsey obtained new counsel and moved to withdraw his guilty plea. However, Lindsey waived his claim that he was denied due process by the lack of a timely transfer hearing. In addition, Lindsey did not receive ineffective assistance of counsel when his first counsel failed to move for dismissal of the charges on the ground that a timely transfer hearing was not held. Lindsey had time to prepare for the hearing, the District Court considered the transfer, and there was no evidence Lindsey was substantially prejudiced by the delay. St. v. Lindsey, 2011 MT 46, 359 Mont. 362, 249 P.3d 491.

Authority of District Court to Sentence Youth to Department of Corrections for Fifteen Years With None Suspended: After Quesnel violated five conditions of a suspended sentence for sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault, Quesnel was sentenced to 15 years with the Department of Corrections with a recommendation for placement at the state prison and that parole eligibility be conditioned on completion of sexual offender treatment. Quesnel was a youth at the time of the offenses but was charged directly in District Court as an adult. Quesnel contended that the District Court lacked authority to impose a 15-year sentence because under the 2001 version of 46-18-201(3)(d)(i), all but the first 5 years of the sentence should be suspended. The state maintained that 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) should apply because Quesnel was a youth whose case was transferred to District Court, so the District Court was authorized to impose the longer sentence. Quesnel argued that because charges were filed directly in District Court, his case was never technically transferred. The Supreme Court examined the legislative history to reconcile the use of the term "transferred" and concluded that 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) applied not only to a youth whose case was transferred from Youth Court to District Court, but also to any youth who appears in District Court pursuant to 41-5-206. Quesnel appeared in District Court to answer charges of an offense enumerated in 41-5-206 and was found guilty, therefore the provisions of 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) applied, and the District Court was not required to suspend all but 5 years of Quesnel's sentence but in fact was authorized to impose the 15-year sentence. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Quesnel, 2009 MT 388, 353 M 317, 220 P3d 634 (2009).

Lack of Hearing to Determine Whether to Transfer Case to Youth Court — No Error: The state filed an information charging Quesnel with violations of a suspended sentence, but the District Court did not hold a hearing within 30 days to determine whether the case should be transferred back to Youth Court. Quesnel asserted that the court lacked authority to impose a sentence because Quesnel was improperly before the court absent the required hearing. The Supreme Court found the argument to be without merit. The reason the hearing was not held within 30 days was that both parties moved to continue the hearing multiple times. However, Quesnel at no time objected to the continuances and could not complain that the hearing was not timely. St. v. Quesnel, 2009 MT 388, 353 M 317, 220 P3d 634 (2009).

No Statutory Indication That Youth Received Illegal Sentence Following Transfer of Case to District Court: At the age of 17, Strong was charged with two counts of felony burglary, and the state moved to transfer the charges to District Court. The state also filed theft charges against Strong in Youth Court. Strong entered a guilty plea on the burglary charges in exchange for dismissal of the theft charges. The District Court sentenced Strong to the Department of Corrections for 8 years, with 2 years suspended on each count. While serving the prison term, Strong challenged the sentence as illegal because the District Court failed to suspend all but 5 years. The state countered that the 5-year limitation in 46-18-201(3)(d) did not apply to a youth who was transferred to District Court under 41-5-206. The District Court affirmed the original sentence and Strong appealed. Applying the criteria in St. v. Ellis, 2007 MT 210, 339 M 14, 167 P3d 896 (2007), the Supreme Court addressed the facial challenge to the exemption in 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) and affirmed. In order for an adult to receive the less onerous commitment to the Department of Corrections, the sentencing court must be willing to suspend all but 5 years of the commitment, but the statute imposes no similar impediment on a court's ability to commit to the Department a youth transferred to District Court under 41-5-206. This enhanced flexibility with regard to the treatment of youth offenders comports with the goals of the Youth Court Act to ensure rehabilitation of youth offenders rather than solely retribution. Therefore, nothing in 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) established that Strong received an illegal sentence. St. v. Strong, 2009 MT 65, 349 M 417, 203 P3d 848 (2009). See also In re C.H., 210 M 184, 683 P2d 931 (1984).

Revocation of Youth Court Probation and Imposition of Suspended Sentence Proper: When Hinkle was 17 years old, he pleaded true to the charge of negligent homicide. The case was tried in District Court, and Hinkle was committed to the Youth Court for suspended placement in a treatment facility until age 18, placed on formal juvenile probation until age 25, and given a stayed adult sentence of 20 years with the Department of Corrections, pursuant to 22 probation conditions, including requirements that Hinkle not violate the dispositional order, possess or consume alcohol, or commit a new offense. Twelve days after the sentencing hearing, Hinkle was cited for being a minor in possession of alcohol. The Youth Court revoked Hinkle's probation and transferred the case back to District Court for further proceedings. After considering numerous balancing factors, the District Court imposed the 20-year adult sentence that had been stayed, but suspended the sentence subject to 19 conditions, including prohibiting Hinkle from entering casinos and gambling. Hinkle appealed on grounds that his probation was improperly revoked, that the 20-year sentence was improperly imposed, and that the casino and gambling restriction was illegal. The Supreme Court affirmed on all issues. The District Court did not err in concluding that simply continuing Hinkle's youth probation for the probation violations would be no more than a slap on the wrist and would be inappropriate given the seriousness of the underlying homicide offense. Imposing a suspended adult sentence was in fact a further act of grace, in light of the fact that the court could have imposed a 20-year sentence of confinement, but Hinkle ignored the act of grace in asserting that the suspended sentence was unduly harsh. Additionally, Hinkle's personal characteristics made him particularly vulnerable to the pitfalls of irresponsible gambling, so the casino and gambling restriction was appropriate. Thus, the District Court's order was "neither arbitrary nor without conscientious judgment or exceeding the bounds of reason and was an appropriate exercise of discretion". St. v. Hinkle, 2008 MT 217, 344 M 236, 186 P3d 1279 (2008).

Youth Tried, Convicted, and Sentenced Under Transfer Statute Correctly Sentenced as Persistent Felony Offender: In 1999, when Mainwaring was a juvenile, he pleaded guilty to mitigated deliberate homicide and was convicted pursuant to this section and sentenced pursuant to 41-5-2503(1)(a). A part of that sentence was later suspended under 41-5-2510. Later, shortly after turning 21, Mainwaring assaulted a child. The state brought assault charges against Mainwaring and then sought to have the court designate Mainwaring as a persistent felony offender (PFO). The District Court approved the designation as a PFO, based on Mainwaring's 1999 felony conviction, and Mainwaring was convicted and sentenced to 20 years in prison. The Supreme Court held that a conviction under subsection (6) of this section was equivalent to any adult felony conviction and that there is nothing in the Montana Youth Court Act or the Criminally

Convicted Youth Act that precludes the application of the PFO statutes and designation to an individual previously convicted of a felony when the individual was a youth. Citing St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 M 276, 119 P3d 1194 (2005), the Supreme Court held that the District Court therefore had the authority to apply the PFO statutes and designation to Mainwaring. The Supreme Court also overruled Mainwaring's due process objections and affirmed his conviction. St. v. Mainwaring, 2007 MT 14, 335 M 322, 151 P3d 53 (2007).

Due Process Satisfied by Requiring Hearing After Information Filed — Butler Overruled: In St. v. Butler, 1999 MT 70, 294 M 17, 977 P2d 1000 (1999), the Supreme Court held that to satisfy due process, a youth must be afforded a hearing prior to the filing of an information in District Court to charge the youth as an adult. Subsequent amendment to this section established a transfer hearing requirement within 30 days after leave to file an information is granted. The amendment was held to satisfy due process, so to the extent that Butler required a hearing before filing in District Court, Butler was overruled. St. v. McKee, 2006 MT 5, 330 M 249, 127 P3d 445 (2006).

Claim of Illegal Sentence Based on Lack of Jurisdiction to Be Raised on Direct Appeal, Not Postconviction Petition — Pena Applied: Camarillo was a minor when he was convicted in 1999 of deliberate homicide, robbery, and aggravated burglary and sentenced as an adult offender to 70 years in the state prison. The case was filed directly in District Court rather than Youth Court, as allowed under this section. Camarillo filed a petition for postconviction relief in 2003, claiming that the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction. The state responded that the claims could have been raised on direct appeal, and the District Court agreed and dismissed the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the District Court properly exercised jurisdiction under Art. VII, sec. 4, Mont. Const., so Camarillo's jurisdiction argument failed. The court then applied Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004), and held that the issues that Camarillo attempted to raise in the petition for postconviction relief could have been but were not raised on direct appeal and, pursuant to 46-21-105, could not be brought in the petition for postconviction relief. In addition, under 46-21-102, petitions for postconviction relief must be filed within 1 year of final judgment. Camarillo's petition was not filed until more than 3 years after judgment and thus was untimely. The District Court was affirmed. Camarillo v. St., 2005 MT 29, 326 M 35, 107 P3d 1265 (2005).

Proper Consideration of Conflicting Evidence in Assigning Youth Deliberate Homicide Case to District Court: The District Court determined that it, rather than Youth Court, was the proper venue for prosecution of a deliberate homicide case against Whiteman, a juvenile. Whiteman appealed on grounds that the District Court contemplated only selective factual allegations proposed by the state and adopted verbatim. The Supreme Court disagreed. The District Court made comprehensive findings of fact that intimately detailed testimony offered at trial and were not subject to being overturned simply because the District Court relied on proposed findings and conclusions submitted by counsel. Whiteman's contention that the District Court erred in determining that the nature of the offense warranted prosecution in District Court also failed. Substantial credible evidence, even though conflicting, supported findings that probable cause existed for a deliberate homicide charge and prosecution in District Court. Despite testimony from three of Whiteman's teachers and a psychologist that Whiteman was intelligent, respectful, and just needed more structure, the District Court did not err in finding that a Youth Court proceeding and disposition would not serve the interests of the community or promote Whiteman's rehabilitation. Prosecution of the deliberate homicide in District Court was affirmed. St. v. Whiteman, 2005 MT 15, 325 M 358, 106 P3d 543 (2005). See also St. v. Smith, 261 M 419, 863 P2d 1000 (1993), and St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421 (1999).

Right to Appeal Error in Length of Sentence Lost by Failing to File Petition Within Statutory Time Limit: Pena, who was 17 years of age at the time, was sentenced as an adult to 45 years in prison for deliberate homicide and aggravated burglary. Pena did not challenge the legality of his sentence on direct appeal, but more than a year after entering a guilty plea and being sentenced, Pena filed a petition alleging that his sentence was illegal because the Montana Youth Court Act provided that a youth could not be sentenced to the custody of the Department of Corrections for more than 5 years and therefore the District Court did not have subject matter jurisdiction to impose a longer sentence. Pena argued that the lack of subject matter jurisdiction was not subject to any statutory postconviction time limits for filing appeals and could be raised at any time. The Supreme Court held that an error in sentencing does not divest a court of subject matter jurisdiction over the case before it. The Supreme Court further held that all postconviction claims, both jurisdictional and nonjurisdictional, must be brought within the 1-year time limit provided by statute and that the time limit was jurisdictional and was not waived by the state's failure to raise the issue in District Court. Pena v. St., 2004 MT 293, 323 M 347, 100 P3d 154 (2004), overruled in Davis v. St., 2008 MT 226, 344 M 300, 187 P3d 654 (2008), to the extent that Pena held that the Legislature limited District Courts' subject matter jurisdiction by codifying a 1-year time bar on postconviction relief pursuant to 46-21-102.

Statute Allowing Transfer of Jurisdiction of Juvenile to District Court Not Violative of Constitutional Separation of Powers Doctrine: Bedwell was 17 when he was charged with burglary, theft, and misdemeanor criminal mischief. The motion to charge him as an adult under this section was granted. Bedwell moved to dismiss on grounds that this section unconstitutionally violated the separation of powers doctrine, impermissibly vesting the court with prosecutorial powers to determine the manner in which to enforce laws with respect to specified juvenile offenders, by allowing the courts discretion to decide whether a juvenile should be treated as an adult. The District Court agreed, finding that courts were allowed to indirectly determine what charges should be filed against a juvenile by determining the legal forum in which a juvenile proceeding should be prosecuted, and remanded for filing in Youth Court. The state appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. In determining whether to accept jurisdiction, a District Court is not making a prosecutorial decision on how the law should be enforced or deciding whether a prosecution should go forward or what charges should be brought. The statute merely allows District Courts a proper judicial function to exercise discretion in determining whether to accept or reject jurisdiction over juvenile offenders under specified circumstances, which does not usurp or intrude into prosecutorial duties and powers of the County Attorney or intrude a court into Executive Branch powers. Thus, this section is not violative of the separation of powers doctrine. St. v. Bedwell, 1999 MT 206, 295 M 476, 985 P2d 150, 56 St. Rep. 805 (1999).

Findings and Conclusions in Transfer Order Not in Error — Transfer Affirmed: Spina was charged with killing her father. She raised numerous arguments that certain issues were not properly considered and that the findings of fact and conclusions of law in a Youth Court transfer order were erroneous and a simple verbatim adoption of the state's proposed findings. The Supreme Court considered each argument in turn and concluded that there was probable cause to believe that Spina committed the delinquent act alleged, that the seriousness of the offense and the protection of the community required treatment of Spina beyond that afforded by juvenile facilities, and that the alleged offense was committed in an aggressive, violent, or premeditated manner. The Youth Court's failure to specifically set forth findings regarding Spina's level of maturity was not reversible error, nor was it in error in finding that Spina was in need of long-term secure care beyond age 19. The Youth Court did not abuse its discretion in transferring Spina's case to District Court. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

No Error in Youth Court Conclusion That Incarceration Not Mandatory if Youth Convicted in District Court: In its transfer order, the Youth Court concluded that transferring Spina into the adult system neither mandated incarceration nor precluded rehabilitation and that although any commitment of the youth must necessarily be to the Department of Corrections, the Department was not necessarily bound to incarcerate Spina. The Supreme Court agreed. The sentencing guidelines in 46-18-201 provide a District Court with a number of sentencing options, including imposition of a deferred or suspended sentence. The Youth Court was correct in concluding that Spina's conviction would not mandate incarceration. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Transfer of Youth Court Case to District Court Not Violative of Equal Protection Rights: Spina argued that the statute allowing transfer of her Youth Court case to the District Court resulted in an equal protection violation because of discriminatory treatment on the basis of her gender, asserting that the transfer was primarily motivated by the lack of affordable placement options for girls in the juvenile system. However, the primary concern in Spina's case was not that placements were not available, but that the duration of placement in the juvenile system would not be long enough to rehabilitate her. Further, the quality of supervision required for a juvenile like Spina, who was charged with killing her father, was not available for male or female offenders, so the concern was not triggered by gender. State placement policy with regard to juvenile offenders convicted and sentenced as adults has no bearing on the constitutionality of the transfer statute. Hence, it is not the transfer statute that generates any alleged disparities in treatment but rather the state placement policies, and the policies were not at issue in this case. Spina's challenge of the transfer statute on equal protection grounds failed. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Transfer of Youth Court Case to District Court Not Violative of Minor's Constitutional Rights: Spina argued that the statute allowing transfer of her Youth Court case to the District Court resulted in violation of her rights under Art. II, sec. 15, Mont. Const., which guarantees to minors the same fundamental rights afforded to adults, and under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., which guarantees the right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court considered alleged violations of the right against self-incrimination, the right to effective assistance of counsel, the right to a fair trial, and the right to a presumption of innocence, finding that Spina's arguments were without merit. The transfer statute did not violate Spina's constitutional rights. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Direct Filing of Information in District Court Rather Than Filing in Youth Court Violative of Due Process — Probable Cause Hearing Required: Pursuant to this section, Butler, a youth, was charged in District Court with attempted deliberate homicide and attempted robbery. Butler moved to have the District Court declare this section unconstitutional on grounds that it violated his right to due process by allowing the prosecution to file an information directly in District Court rather than Youth Court without first affording him a hearing. The motion was denied, and Butler appealed. Although it is within the province of the prosecution to move the District Court for leave to file an information in that court if the youth has attained a certain age and is alleged to have committed certain unlawful conduct, the prosecution's discretion ends at that point. Absent a pure prosecutorial waiver system, the ultimate decision rests with the District Court, which must make specific findings that there is probable cause to believe the youth committed the offense and that, because of the seriousness of the offense, the case should be filed in District Court. In Butler's case, the District Court based its decision solely on the affidavit of the prosecution and Butler did not have the opportunity, with assistance of counsel, to challenge the specific findings of the court. Although declining to declare the entire statute unconstitutional, the Supreme Court cited Kent v. U.S., 383 US 541, 16 L Ed 2d 84, 86 S Ct 1045 (1966), in holding that because the decision in this regard is potentially critically important to the youth, under the 14th amendment to the United States Constitution, Butler's right to due process requires that the District Court hold a hearing when rendering a decision under subsection (3) of this section. St. v. Butler, 1999 MT 70, 294 M 17, 977 P2d 1000, 56 St. Rep. 291 (1999), followed and applied retroactively in St. v. O'Neill, 1999 MT 224, 296 M 71, 985 P2d 154, 56 St. Rep. 886 (1999). Butler was overruled, to the extent that it requires a hearing before filing in District Court, in St. v. McKee, 2006 MT 5, 330 M 249, 127 P3d 445 (2006).

Indian Defendant — Failure to Challenge Transfer to District Court and Failure to Reserve Right to Appeal Issues — District Court Jurisdiction Upheld: After the state filed an amended petition in Youth Court to have Spotted Blanket declared a delinquent youth and a serious juvenile offender, the state and Spotted Blanket stipulated to transferring the case to District Court. Later, Spotted Blanket objected to the jurisdiction of the District Court, arguing that the Youth Court abused its discretion in making the transfer because there was insufficient evidence that the juvenile facilities were inadequate, as required by subsection (1)(d)(ii) of this section (see 1997 amendment), and because the District Court failed to make a finding of probable cause concerning some of the counts against him, as required by the same statute. The Supreme Court declined to address those issues, noting that: (1) Spotted Blanket's notice of appeal was limited to the District Court order denying his motion to dismiss and did not include the order transferring the case to District Court; (2) Spotted Blanket never challenged the propriety of the transfer to District Court and, citing the requirements of 46-12-204, St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477 (1995), and St. v. Swoboda, 276 M 479, 918 P2d 296 (1996), holding that claims of error not properly preserved in the trial court are barred from appellate review; (3) Spotted Blanket stipulated to the transfer and that a probable cause hearing would not be necessary; and (4) Spotted Blanket pleaded guilty to the felony counts and noting that the plea acts as a waiver of nonjurisdictional defects under the Supreme Court's prior opinions in St. v. Butler, 272 M 286, 900 P2d 908 (1995), and Stilson v. St., 278 M 20, 924 P2d 238 (1996). St. v. Spotted Blanket, 1998 MT 59, 288 M 126, 955 P2d 1347, 55 St. Rep. 253 (1998).

Lack of Testimony Regarding Inadequacy of Juvenile Facilities — Transfer to District Court Inappropriate: A Youth Court order transferring charges of attempted deliberate homicide, attempted robbery, and felony theft to the District Court was an abuse of discretion absent testimony that juvenile facilities were inadequate to deal with the youth and in light of a lack of substantial credible evidence supporting the findings of the Youth Court. An assumption that juvenile facilities are inadequate based on the mere fact that a youth is charged with a serious offense ignores the rehabilitative purpose of the Montana Youth Court Act. In re J.K.C., 270 M 342, 891 P2d 1169, 52 St. Rep. 221 (1995), distinguishing In re K.M.H., 231 M 180, 752 P2d 162 (1988), In re T.N., 267 M 81, 881 P2d 1329, 51 St. Rep. 955 (1994), and In re J.D.W., 267 M 87, 881 P2d 1324, 51 St. Rep. 958 (1994).

Error to Assume Juvenile Facilities Inadequate Based Upon Seriousness of Youth's Crimes: The Youth Court took judicial notice of the length of time that a Youth Court may commit a juvenile and ordered J.D.W.'s case transferred to District Court. The Supreme Court held that there was no testimony given by Pine Hills staff or anyone else that the average length of stay in a juvenile facility would be inadequate for rehabilitation in J.D.W.'s case and that therefore it was error for the Youth Court to assume that a juvenile facility was inadequate based solely on the seriousness of the juvenile's crimes. In re J.D.W., 267 M 87, 881 P2d 1324, 51 St. Rep. 958 (1994).

Transfer Proper When Youth Poses Threat to Community and Juvenile Facilities Inadequate: T.N. was accused of shooting his father. The District Court decided to transfer the case to adult court on the basis that a Youth Court could not order his commitment to a treatment facility for a period as long as might be needed and on the basis that the juvenile facilities were not equipped to provide the type of treatment that T.N. might need. T.N. argued that the District Court erred in transferring him because he did not pose a threat to the community. The Supreme Court held that there was no error because the record did include medical testimony that although it was unlikely that there would be another violent occurrence, it could not be ruled out and because the record supported the finding that the juvenile facilities were inadequate for the potential needs of T.N.'s rehabilitation. In re T.N., 267 M 81, 881 P2d 1329, 51 St. Rep. 955 (1994).

Decision to Transfer Within Discretion of Youth Court: The decision whether to transfer a case from Youth Court to District Court, after the statutory criteria have been considered, is within the discretion of the Youth Court. In re J.A., 255 M 214, 841 P2d 1130, 49 St. Rep. 972 (1992), followed in In re T.N., 267 M 81, 881 P2d 1329, 51 St. Rep. 955 (1994), and in In re J.D.W., 267 M 87, 881 P2d 1324, 51 St. Rep. 958 (1994). In re T.N. was followed in St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Finding of Aggressive Behavior Sufficient to Warrant Transfer to District Court: Evidence of aggressive behavior by a youth that led to the shooting of another youth constituted sufficient probable cause under the statutory criteria of this section to warrant transfer of the case to District Court. In re J.A., 255 M 214, 841 P2d 1130, 49 St. Rep. 972 (1992).

Arrest for Felony Assault (now Assault With a Weapon) and Robbery — Transfer to District Court Proper: The jurisdiction over a 17 year old was properly transferred to District Court after the Youth Court considered testimony and evidence relating to the youth's arrest for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and robbery, prior criminal record, negative psychological evaluation, and sophistication and maturity; the seriousness of the offenses; the protection of society; and the inappropriateness of treatment in the juvenile program. In re B.J., 239 M 371, 780 P2d 1132, 46 St. Rep. 1756 (1989).

Mandatory Transfer of Prosecution of Older Youth to District Court — No Denial of Equal Protection Under U.S. or Montana Constitution: Plaintiff alleged that the automatic transfer provisions of subsection (3) of this section infringed upon a youth's rights to equal protection under the equal protection provisions of the U.S. Constitution and the Montana Constitution. The Supreme Court held that a classification based on age and gravity of the offense for automatic transfer of prosecution to District Court from Youth Court requires only a rational relationship to a legitimate state interest. The court found that interest in curbing homicides committed by teenagers and in protecting society from these violent offenders. Strict scrutiny analysis under federal equal protection is not required because procedural due process is not a fundamental right, nor is age a suspect class. Under Art. II, sec. 4, Mont. Const., the Supreme Court determined that no provision exists in the Montana Constitution that provides a youth with a fundamental right to special treatment, and thus the state's middle tier analysis is inapplicable and only a rational relationship to a legitimate state interest is required. In re Wood, 236 M 118, 768 P2d 1370, 46 St. Rep. 228 (1989).

Mandatory Transfer of Prosecution of Older Youth to District Court — Not Violation of Doctrine of Separation of Powers: The automatic transfer provisions of subsection (3) of this section, providing for the prosecution of older youth for certain offenses in District Court rather than Youth Court, are not a usurpation of the judiciary's power to hear and decide motions and is not in violation of the Montana Constitution's requirement for separation of powers. The transfer provision is within the Legislature's inherent power to create other courts under Art. VII, sec. 1, Mont. Const. The 1987 amendment providing for transfer without hearing on mitigating factors was merely a revision of protection afforded youth under earlier legislative action and not a violation of the separation of powers doctrine. In re Wood, 236 M 118, 768 P2d 1370, 46 St. Rep. 228 (1989).

Transfer of Youth to District Court for Homicide Prosecution — Age of Youth Determines Whether Hearing Necessary: For a youth between 12 years and 16 years of age charged with homicide, a hearing may be held to determine whether prosecution should be transferred to District Court. For youth 16 years old or older, no hearing is authorized, and the youth must be transferred to District Court upon a motion by the County Attorney. In re Wood, 236 M 118, 768 P2d 1370, 46 St. Rep. 228 (1989).

Youth Sixteen Years Old and Older — Mandatory Transfer of Homicide Prosecution to District Court — No Denial of Due Process: A youth does not have a constitutional due process right to a hearing to determine whether a homicide prosecution should be transferred to District Court. However, whatever criteria is set in state law for the transfer must be followed. The Supreme Court held that in a homicide prosecution, the requirement for a transfer hearing for youth between 12 years and 16 years of age and for a mandatory transfer for youth 16 years old or older is permissible. Since no irregularities in the transfer of an older youth for homicide prosecution in District Court were alleged, there was no violation of his federal due process rights. In re Wood, 236 M 118, 768 P2d 1370, 46 St. Rep. 228 (1989).

Transfer of Fifteen Year Old to District Court on Homicide Charge: Substantial credible evidence supported a Youth Court finding that a 15-year-old minor be transferred to District Court in light of the seriousness of the offense and the need to protect the community. In re K.M.H., 231 M 180, 752 P2d 162, 45 St. Rep. 526 (1988).

Termination of Youth Court Jurisdiction — No Bar to Jurisdiction of District Court: The defendant was under 18 years of age when the crime of which he was accused was committed. When the defendant was 20 years old he confessed, and the County Attorney filed a petition in the Youth Court, seeking a declaration that the defendant was a delinquent youth and requesting authority to incarcerate him. The defendant turned 21 before the motion was ruled on. He then was charged with deliberate homicide in District Court. The defendant contended that when the Youth Court lost jurisdiction over him under 41-5-205, the District Court did not have jurisdiction because once jurisdiction has attached under 41-5-203, the District Court can never assume jurisdiction over the offense underlying the Youth Court's proceeding absent transfer under 41-5-206, which did not occur here. The Supreme Court held that on termination of Youth Court jurisdiction, there was no bar to the exercise of jurisdiction by the District Court under Art. VII, sec. 4(1), Mont. Const., 3-5-302, and 46-2-201, over felony proceedings against the defendant. Exclusive original jurisdiction of the Youth Court does not divest a District Court of jurisdiction over crimes committed by a juvenile defendant. St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985).

Prosecution of Felonies in Youth Court Proper: In cases pending in the Youth Court, two youths, ages 14 and 15, were charged with numerous felony counts. The State sought to arrest the proceeding in the Youth Court to move that the youths be transferred to the jurisdiction of the District Court under this statute. The State contends that the requirement for transfer (that a youth charged with a felony must have been 16 years of age or older at the time of the alleged unlawful conduct before the charges may be transferred to District Court) effectively gives the Youth Court all jurisdiction over all felony criminal cases if the youth charged is less than 16 years old and that this provision conflicts with Art. VII, sec. 4(1), Mont. Const., which provides for District Court jurisdiction. The State further contends that this constitutional provision gives the District Court exclusive jurisdiction in all criminal cases amounting to a felony and that a youth under 16 years is legally capable of committing a felony. In denying the state's application, the Supreme Court held that: (1) the term "original jurisdiction", as used in that section of the constitution, does not mean exclusive jurisdiction; and (2) felonies may be prosecuted in the Youth Court because when it acts in jurisdiction it is acting as a District Court. In re T.L.G. & M.E.H., 214 M 164, 692 P2d 1227, 41 St. Rep. 2388 (1984).

Accountability: The youth was charged with criminal homicide under the accountability statute. The Supreme Court rejected the youth's argument that the Youth Court could not transfer the case to the adult court because he was not charged under the criminal homicide statute, 45-5-101 (now repealed). The Supreme Court stated that there is no separate offense of accountability, only the underlying offense which has been physically committed by another but for which the youth is equally responsible. (The case was reversed on other grounds.) In re B.D.C., 211 M 216, 687 P2d 655, 41 St. Rep. 1318 (1984).

Finding Not Supported by Evidence: A petition was filed alleging a youth to be a delinquent youth, based on an allegation that the youth was guilty of criminal homicide. The Youth Court ordered a 45-day evaluation at Pine Hills, which reported to the Youth Court that Pine Hills School (now Pine Hills Youth Correctional Facility) was an appropriate placement for the youth and that the staff could help him in dealing with the problems he was having. The Youth Court later sought to transfer the case to the District Court and in its findings found that the juvenile facilities were inadequate for the youth in light of the seriousness of the offense and the need to protect the community. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that there was no evidence to support the Youth Court's adequacy of placement finding and therefore the Youth Court had no jurisdiction to transfer the case to District Court. In re B.D.C., 211 M 216, 687 P2d 655, 41 St. Rep. 1318 (1984).

Youth Legally Capable of Committing Crime — Jurisdiction When Crime Disclosed After Majority: The District Court has jurisdiction to try an individual charged at age 22 for felonies allegedly committed at age 15, as provided in the court's constitutional grant of jurisdiction over all felonies. The Youth Court Act does not contain any direct statement or implication that the Legislature intended to set the minimum age of criminal responsibility at 16, making a 15-year-old incapable of committing a crime. The primary purposes of statutes defining a "delinquent youth" and providing for transfer to District Court are to clarify that delinquency proceedings are noncriminal and to prohibit prosecution of youths in District Court while they are youths. State ex rel. Elliot v. District Court, 211 M 1, 684 P2d 481, 41 St. Rep. 1184 (1984).

Illegal Pretrial Process and Procedure — State's Right to Charge and Try Case: Youth Court petition initiating proceedings did not state the facts constituting the offense youth was charged with in ordinary and concise language so as to enable a person of common understanding to know what was intended. The petition did not include a witness list. An arrest warrant was issued out of the Youth Court, although there is no provision in the Youth Court Act for issuance of an arrest warrant. Presumably the warrant was issued under 46-6-201, but there was no showing of probable cause supported by oath or affirmation reduced to writing. The youth had already been arrested in Oklahoma at the time the warrant was issued. By what process and authority he was arrested in Oklahoma was not shown, nor was it shown he was arrested by a law enforcement officer. He was subsequently transferred to the District Court for trial as an adult and convicted of two counts of deliberate homicide. The Youth Court proceedings from issuance of the warrant for arrest onward were patently defective. However, this did not preclude the state from having him transferred to the District Court, proceeding against him, and obtaining a conviction. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Transfer From Youth Court to District Court — Youth Court Hearing — Valid Initiation of District Court Action: At Youth Court hearing at which it was decided to transfer youth to District Court for trial as an adult, testimony established probable cause for filing of an information in the District Court. This procedure satisfied the state constitutional requirement that a criminal action in the District Court be initiated either by an information after examination and commitment by a magistrate or after leave granted by the District Court. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Transfer to District Court — Hearing on Youth Court Petition Against Youth Unnecessary: The provision in 41-5-516 (now repealed) that a petition alleging delinquency or need of supervision (now intervention) shall be dismissed with prejudice if a hearing on the petition is not begun within 15 days after service does not apply when the charges are subject to transfer to the District Court and a timely motion to transfer is made. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Substantial Credible Evidence to Support Youth Court's Determination: N.C.F., a minor, is accused of shooting a 16-year-old girl in the face with a sawed-off shotgun and killing her. The State filed a motion requesting the Youth Court to waive its jurisdiction and to transfer jurisdiction to the District Court. At a hearing on the State's motion, evidence was offered that N.C.F. occasionally dry-fired a gun while it was pointed at an individual. Testimony was also offered that there was no Youth Court facility available for treatment of N.C.F., because of his size, age, independent lifestyle, and level of maturity. Based on the evidence, the Youth Court issued an order granting the State's motion. N.C.F. appealed the order. The Supreme Court found that there was substantial credible evidence to support the Youth Court's determination. In re N.C.F., 197 M 390, 643 P2d 236, 39 St. Rep. 634 (1982).

Youth Court — Holding Youth Without Arraignment Until Transfer to District Court: Defendant, age 17, was arrested and charged with homicide. Defendant refused to be interviewed by a Youth Court probation officer or a psychologist. The State moved to transfer prosecution to the District Court. Because of lack of an interview, the probation officer could not recommend for or against transfer and so advised the court. The motion was granted and defendant was ordered to be tried as an adult. Defendant contends that the cause of the transfer was his refusal to be interviewed and that the court placed on him the burden to justify continuation in Youth Court. Placing the burden on him, defendant claims, would force him to waive his right against self-incrimination. That is not the case here; the record indicates that the Youth Court considered each factor in 41-5-206. Once the Youth Court was refused the interviews, the only source of information it could rely on was that coming other than from the defendant. In doing so the Youth Court considered each of the factors set out in 41-5-206. St. v. Rodriguez, 192 M 411, 628 P2d 280, 38 St. Rep. 578F (1981).

Insanity Defense — Discretion of Judge — Attempt: A transfer hearing is not an adjudicatory stage of the juvenile process. Appellant's constitutional right to assert the insanity defense was not denied when judge failed to allow entry of the plea at the transfer hearing. The Youth Court did not abuse its discretion in transferring the matter. Lastly, the court erred in transferring charge of attempted homicide because that charge is not specifically enumerated. In re Stapelkempr, 172 M 192, 562 P2d 825 (1977).

Factors Court Must Consider — Evidence to Be Preserved For Appeal: When juvenile was arrested and charged with attempted robbery, robbery, and aggravated assault, and State attempted to waive him to adult criminal court, evidence presented at transfer hearing was insufficient to waive jurisdiction because State failed to present evidence concerning requirements in this section and cause was remanded to Youth Court. The importance of a transfer hearing demands that the Youth Court carefully consider all factors set forth in this section, and evidence relevant to each factor should be preserved in the transcript in order to permit meaningful appellate review. In re Stevenson, 167 M 220, 538 P2d 5 (1975).

Constitutional Requirements: Conventional findings of fact or an express, formal statement of the reasons for ordering the waiver and transfer to the District Court are not required; if the reasons motivating the exercise of the juvenile court's discretion in ordering the waiver and transfer are sufficiently apparent in the record to allow meaningful appellate review, constitutional requirements are satisfied. Transfer of defendant to District Court on charge of second degree assault under former law was not an abuse of discretion when at the time of the commission of the crime the defendant was a juvenile by less than 1 month, the victim was brutally assaulted without provocation, the defendant was far removed from influences of family, home, or normal adult supervision, and trial court found that the probable cause was of such a nature that failure to bring the defendant to trial on the charge of second degree assault would have failed to preserve the best and necessary interest of the people of the State of Montana. Lujan v. District Court, 161 M 287, 505 P2d 896 (1973).

Criminal Information: District Court has no jurisdiction to authorize or order the filing of a criminal information against a juvenile child of less than 16 years of age or to try such child in the District Court. State ex rel. Dahl v. District Court, 134 M 395, 333 P2d 495 (1958). (Annotator's note: Chapter 60, sec. 3, L. 1985, amended 41-5-206 to permit the transfer to District Court of criminal proceedings against youths 12 years of age or older who are charged with one of several serious crimes listed in the statute.)

Attorney General's Opinions

Exemption of Juvenile Delinquents From Sexual Offender Registration: A juvenile who is adjudicated delinquent under the Montana Youth Court Act and whose case has not been transferred to District Court under this section is exempt from the registration requirements of the Sexual Offender Registration Act, 46-18-254 (now repealed); 46-18-255; and Title 46, ch. 23, part 5. 43 A.G. Op. 45 (1989).

Case Notes

Continuation of Unfulfilled Sexual Offender Treatment Program — Youth Court Did Not Err in Transferring Jurisdiction to District Court With Program as Condition — No Double Jeopardy: The Youth Court did not err in granting the state's motion to transfer the appellant's Youth Court proceeding to the District Court pursuant to 41-5-208 after he failed to complete his sexual offender treatment program (SOTP). The appellant contended that the Youth Court improperly considered evidence that should have been suppressed, but irrespective of how or why the appellant was removed from SOTP, he undisputedly did not complete that portion of his disposition while under the Youth Court's jurisdiction. The appellant was given the opportunity to comply with the SOTP under the jurisdiction of the District Court, and the Youth Court did not err in granting the state's motion to transfer to ensure continued compliance with the court's disposition. Additionally, the state's effort to ensure that the appellant completed the unfulfilled portion of the disposition did not constitute additional punishment and thus did not constitute double jeopardy. In re J.W., 2016 MT 330, 386 Mont. 1, 387 P.3d 195.

Additional Adult Conditions Added Without Hearing and Finding of Violation — Underlying Youth Court Disposition Condition Violated: After A.D.T., a youth adjudicated as a juvenile sexual offender, turned 18, he was transferred from the jurisdiction of the Youth Court to the District Court for compliance with outpatient treatment. Because A.D.T. agreed to a request to add 41 conditions of probation related to adult probationers convicted of sexual offenses, the court amended A.D.T.'s probation conditions. Two months later, the probation officer alleged that A.D.T. had violated 4 of the 41 conditions and sought revocation of his probation. Under 41-5-208, the 41 new adult probation conditions could not be imposed absent a hearing and a finding that A.D.T had violated his Youth Court disposition. However, the evidence at the revocation hearing substantiated a finding that A.D.T. had violated the terms of his Youth Court disposition when he was terminated from outpatient sex offender treatment. Although the District Court erred in denying A.D.T.'s motion to dismiss the revocation petition, it reached the correct result in finding that he had violated the terms of his disposition. In re A.D.T., 2015 MT 178, 379 Mont. 452, 351 P.3d 682.

Failure to Notify Parents of Hearing to Transfer Jurisdiction to District Court — Statutory Notice Requirement Not Jurisdictional — Youth Court Jurisdiction: E.G. was found to be a delinquent youth by the Youth Court. The commitment order stated that the Youth Court would retain jurisdiction until E.G. was 21 and would consider transfer of the case to District Court. Shortly after E.G. turned 18, the state filed a motion to transfer supervisory control to the District Court. E.G. was represented by his attorney and expressly consented to the transfer. The parties discussed the parental notification requirements in 41-5-208, but E.G. consented to continue the hearing, regardless of whether his parents received notice. The Youth Court entered an order granting the motion to transfer supervision of E.G. to District Court until he was age 25, with potential release from supervision for good behavior. However, after E.G. violated conditions of his probation, the District Court sentenced him to the Department of Corrections until age 25, with no time suspended. On appeal, E.G. claimed that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to revoke probation because his parents did not receive notice of the Youth Court transfer hearing under 41-5-208. The Supreme Court affirmed the sentence and held that the parental notice requirement does not withdraw, circumscribe, limit, or affect the Youth Court's jurisdiction over the issue of transferring supervision to District Court. In re E.G., 2014 MT 148, 375 Mont. 252, 326 P.3d 1092.

Modification to Transfer Order Regarding Parole Eligibility — District Court Affirmed: As a part of his sentence as a delinquent youth, the defendant was required to complete two phases of sex offender treatment in order to be eligible for parole. At the time of his transfer to the Montana State Prison at age 18, the defendant had not completed treatment. He subsequently filed a motion to modify his transfer order to remove the requirement of sex offender treatment and to terminate Department of Corrections supervision of him to allow him to be placed in an out-of-state treatment facility to address his developmental disabilities and mental illness. The District Court modified the transfer order to remove the treatment requirement but not to terminate the Department's supervision. The defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, which affirmed the District Court's modification of the transfer order, concluding that it was consistent with the Youth Court Act policy of ensuring an offender completes treatment. In re A.S.M., 2014 MT 133, 375 Mont. 147, 325 P.3d 1251.

Retention of Jurisdiction Proper: A youth appealed the Youth Court's denial of his motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction, arguing that the Youth Court lost jurisdiction when his probation ended when he turned 18 years old and therefore lacked jurisdiction to transfer the matter to District Court. The Supreme Court, distinguishing In re K.D.K., 2006 MT 187, 333 Mont. 100, 141 P.3d 1212, affirmed, concluding that the Youth Court retained jurisdiction because it had not terminated its jurisdiction pursuant to 41-5-205 and because 41-5-208 allows the Youth Court to transfer a matter to District Court at any time after the youth reaches the age of 18 but before the youth reaches the age of 21. In re T.M.L., 2012 MT 9, 363 Mont. 304, 268 P.3d 1255.

Appropriate Conditions on Probation of Delinquent and Serious Youth Sex Offender: As a youth, D.A.S. was convicted of sexual assault and placed in a youth correctional facility. When D.A.S. turned 18, jurisdiction and supervisory responsibility were transferred from Youth Court to District Court until age 25, and numerous supervisory conditions were attached, including prohibitions on the use of drugs and alcohol, a curfew, and a requirement that D.A.S. obtain a GED 1 year prior to expiration of the sentence. D.A.S. objected to these conditions on grounds that they were unrelated to the crime of sexual assault, but the Supreme Court affirmed, applying St. v. Ashby, 2008 MT 83, 342, M 187, 179 P3d 1164 (2008), which allows imposition of conditions that have a nexus either to the offense or to the offender. In this case, both alcohol and drug prohibitions were reasonably related to D.A.S.'s rehabilitation and placement in a sexual offender program. A curfew was reasonable to ensure development of a consistent and healthy routine and was reasonable given legislative intent to provide youth offenders with additional supervision. Completion of the high school equivalency test was not an abuse of discretion because it was consistent with legislative intent to rehabilitate youth offenders through competency development, especially given D.A.S.'s expressed desire to further his education. In re D.A.S., 2008 MT 168, 343 M 360, 184 P3d 349 (2008).

District Court Order Revoking Youth's Probation and Committing Him to Department Judged Reversible Error — No Authority of Department to Impose Standard Probationary Conditions: As a youth of 13, defendant committed sexual assault and was placed on probation with the condition that he complete an outpatient sexual offender treatment program. When the program had not been completed 2 years later, defendant's probation was revoked and he was placed at Pine Hills until age 18 and until completion of the Pine Hills sexual offender program, and if he failed to complete the program, he would be required to register as a sexual offender. When defendant turned 18, he was released from Pine Hills without completing the program. Defendant then stipulated to transfer supervisory control to District Court. The stipulation included a provision that defendant complete sexual offender treatment by age 25 and provided that defendant would have to register as a sexual offender if the treatment was not completed. Although the stipulation contained no other conditions or restrictions, defendant also signed a form that included the standard conditions of probation adopted by the Department of Corrections (DOC). Defendant subsequently violated some of the standard probation conditions, and the state petitioned to revoke probation. Defendant moved to dismiss the petition, but the District Court denied the motion and committed defendant to the DOC until age 25. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The stipulation placed only one condition on defendant, that being the requirement to complete sexual offender treatment by age 25. Defendant was not yet 25 years old, so that condition was not violated. The standard DOC probation conditions were imposed by the DOC, not by the court, and the DOC was not authorized to add conditions to those articulated by the court's judgment, nor did the court have authority to revoke defendant's probation for failure to abide by conditions added by the DOC after the sentence. Therefore, the District Court's judgment revoking defendant's probation and committing him to the DOC was reversible error. St. v. Andersen-Conway, 2007 MT 281, 339 M 439, 171 P3d 678 (2007).

State Breach of Plea Agreement — Remand for Resentencing in Conformity With Sentencing Stipulation: Pursuant to a plea bargain, a youth was placed on probation until age 18 with a sentencing stipulation that if the youth did not follow treatment plans or meet other requirements, the matter would be transferred to District Court and adult supervision. The youth subsequently violated probation and was sent to the Pine Hills correctional facility. The youth reoffended at Pine Hills, and the state moved to transfer the case to District Youth Court. Despite the sentencing stipulation, the state moved for a custodial sentence, and the Youth Court concurred with the state's recommendation and sentenced the youth to the Department of Corrections until age 25, with the last 3 years suspended. The youth appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Both parties were bound by the terms of the plea agreement, and although the case was transferred to District Court as per the agreement, the state failed to follow the terms of the agreement when it sought a custodial sentence rather than adult supervision for the youth. Upon resentencing following the subsequent revocation for violation of sentencing conditions, the youth was entitled to receive the sentence that was presented to and approved by the Youth Court, and the Youth Court abused its discretion by failing to hold the state to the terms of the sentencing stipulation and by ordering the custodial sentence. On remand, the Youth Court was ordered to resentence the youth in accordance with the terms of the sentencing stipulation. In re H.C.R., 2007 MT 64, 336 M 369, 155 P3d 1221 (2007), following St. v. Rardon, 1999 MT 220, 296 M 19, 986 P2d 424 (1999), and St. v. Rardon, 2002 MT 345, 313 M 321, 61 P3d 132 (2002).

Revocation of Juvenile Offender's Suspended Sentence and Commitment to Department Authorized: Following a dispositional hearing, the Youth Court entered an order declaring Lesmeister a delinquent youth and serious juvenile offender, transferred the 18 year old's case to District Court, and placed the youth on probation until age 25, with the entire commitment suspended upon certain conditions. One year later, on a petition filed by the Cascade County Attorney alleging numerous probation violations, the District Court revoked Lesmeister's suspended sentence and committed the youth to the Department of Corrections until age 25. On appeal, Lesmeister challenged the legality of the court's commitment to the Department, arguing that because he was not incarcerated in a youth facility when his case was transferred to the District Court, this section allowed the court to impose only the conditions prescribed under 46-18-201 through 46-18-203, which did not include a sentence to the Department of Corrections. In affirming the District Court decision, the Supreme Court ruled that state law authorizes a District Court to impose a sentence to commit an offender to the Department of Corrections when all but the first 5 years are suspended. St. v. Lesmeister, 2000 MT 318, 302 M 500, 15 P3d 392, 57 St. Rep. 1344 (2000).

Youth Court Transfer Provision Illegal Mechanism to Rectify Youth's Failure to Pay Restitution — Ex Post Facto: As a teenager, Young entered a consent decree to dispose of three felony property offenses. He was ordered to pay $3,788 in restitution while on probation, but paid only $125. Later, Young was adjudicated as delinquent and sentenced to the Department of Corrections until age 18, with conditions. Restitution was not required, but the prior restitution was reinstated. Young then committed new offenses and was institutionalized until age 19, but restitution was not made by the time that he was 19. Young's cases were then transferred to District Court pursuant to this section, and he was placed on probation until the restitution was paid. Young appealed the transfer of the case, contending that he had successfully completed a residential treatment program in Utah according to the court's disposition order and that applying this section violated state and federal constitutional ex post facto provisions because the law was not in effect when he committed any of the offenses and because applying the transfer provisions would increase the possible penalty for offenses that he previously admitted. The Supreme Court found that ex post facto application of the transfer provisions did not provide a lawful mechanism to rectify Young's failure to pay restitution. Applying the two-part test in St. v. Leistiko, 256 M 32, 844 P2d 97 (1992), the court held that the transfer provision was retrospective because it was not in effect when Young committed the offenses and that this section is more onerous than the prior law because it changed the legal consequences by allowing the Youth Court to extend probation for an additional 6 years through transfer to the District Court. Since Young had successfully completed the Utah residential treatment program and was age 20 at the time that the appeal was decided, the cases should be closed. Case Notes

Permissible Use of Records of Juvenile Crimes — Impeachment: Before his trial on charges of sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault, the defendant filed a motion to allow his counsel to inspect the Youth Court records of any complaining witnesses on the grounds that the records might have a bearing on the competency and veracity of those witnesses. The motion was denied, and the judge said he would examine the records to determine if any of the girls should be examined by a psychologist before testifying. The Supreme Court found that the judge's ruling denying the defendant's motion to inspect denied him the right to confront the witnesses against him. However, their review of the juvenile records convinced them that the error here was harmless. They declined to adopt a rule allowing evidence of prior juvenile convictions to be used as evidence to attack the general credibility of a witness. The permissible use of those juvenile records was confined to demonstrating, by cross-examination, a witness's bias, prejudice, or motive. It was within the discretion of the trial judge to determine competency, and his findings would not be overturned absent an abuse of discretion. St. v. Camitsch, 192 M 124, 626 P2d 1250, 38 St. Rep. 563 (1981).

Juvenile Court Records Not Criminal: Trial court was not in error in reading into the record in open court prior events of defendant's life as disclosed by his juvenile court record where the juvenile court record was not challenged by defendant or his counsel. (See sections 10-601 through 10-611, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed).) St. v. Manning, 149 M 517, 429 P2d 625 (1967).

Use of Prior Juvenile Record: The reading into the record in open court of defendant's prior juvenile record was proper where the events contained in the juvenile record were not criminal. The court after reading the written record asked if there was any legal excuse why judgment and sentence of court should not be pronounced, and no challenge to the recited juvenile record was made. (See sections 10-601 through 10-611, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed).) St. v. Manning, 149 M 517, 429 P2d 625 (1967).

Case Notes

No Youth Court Authority to Expunge DUI Offenses — Elements of Judicial Estoppel Not Met: Following Darrah's completion of a Youth Drug Court program in 2004, the Youth Court ordered that Darrah's prior criminal record be expunged, including a previous minor in possession offense and a 2002 DUI. Darrah was subsequently charged in 2005 with second offense DUI, based on the prior 2002 DUI, and in 2006 Darrah was charged with third offense DUI. Citing the principle of judicial estoppel, Darrah asserted that because the Youth Court record had been expunged, the 2002 DUI should not count against him. The District Court disagreed and Darrah appealed. The Supreme Court applied the elements of judicial estoppel set out in Vogel v. Intercontinental Truck Body, Inc., 2006 MT 131, 332 M 322, 137 P3d 573 (2006), and determined that Darrah had failed to demonstrate that each element was met, so judicial estoppel did not apply. Further, there is no authority under which the Youth Court could order expungement of Darrah's DUI offenses. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Darrah, 2009 MT 96, 350 M 70, 205 P3d 792 (2009), following St. v. Chesley, 2004 MT 165, 322 M 26, 92 P3d 1212 (2004).

Inclusion of Juvenile Record in Presentence Report: Section 41-3-205 does not support appellant's contention that it was improper to include his juvenile record in a presentence report since that section applies only to dependence and neglect situations and not to proceedings for delinquents under the Montana Youth Court Act. Section 41-5-604 (renumbered 41-5-216) does not support appellant's contention either, because the prevention of public dissemination of a juvenile record once that individual attains an age of majority is accomplished by sealing the presentence report. St. v. Radi, 185 M 38, 604 P2d 318 (1979).

Attorney General's Opinions

Certain Youth Court Records Not Subject to Sealing Requirements: A 1987 amendment to 41-5-601 (now repealed) deleted the bar against disseminating information concerning proceedings to find a youth delinquent; further, the intent of a 1987 amendment to subsection (5) of this section (formerly 41-5-604(5)) was to not seal the records related to delinquency proceedings. The overall effect of the 1987 amendments was that Youth Court records concerning a youth proceeded against as a delinquent youth or found to be a delinquent youth are not confidential and are not subject to sealing requirements of the Montana Youth Court Act. 43 A.G. Op. 7 (1989).

Youth Court Act — Applicability to Alcohol Possession Proceedings in Other Courts: The provisions of the Montana Youth Court Act that apply to a youth charged with a violation of 45-5-624, illegal possession of alcohol, in justice's, municipal, or city court proceedings are 41-5-303 through 41-5-307 (renumbered 41-5-322, 41-5-331, 41-5-341, 41-5-344 (now repealed), and 41-5-1206), 41-5-402 (renumbered 41-5-1303), 41-5-601 (now repealed), 41-5-602 (now repealed), and this section (formerly 41-5-604). A youth charged with a violation of 45-5-624 is further entitled to the following rights in addition to those normally accorded defendants in justice's, municipal, or city court criminal proceedings: (1) service of the criminal summons on both the youth and a custodial parent or guardian; (2) advisement of the right to retained or, if appropriate, appointed counsel; and (3) waiver of the right to counsel only by both the youth and a custodial parent or guardian. 40 A.G. Part 3
Custody and Detention

Part Case Notes

Holding Youth Without Appearance Until Transfer to District Court: Defendant claims he was not brought to a magistrate "without necessary delay". Defendant surrendered to the authorities and was placed in jail but was not taken before a magistrate until some 20 days later. Although defendant could show no prejudice due to this lapse of time, the Supreme Court strongly disapproved of any deliberate attempt by the State to avoid arraignment "without unnecessary delay" by first arresting and holding a juvenile under the Youth Court Act for a sustained period of time and then later attempting to prosecute the juvenile as an adult. The Supreme Court stated that if a defendant could show prejudice or a deliberate attempt by the prosecution to circumvent a speedy arraignment, they would not hesitate to fashion an appropriate remedy. St. v. Rodriguez, 192 M 411, 628 P2d 280, 38 St. Rep. 578F (1981).

2001 Amendment: Chapter 114 deleted former (1)(c) that read: "(c) by a law enforcement officer, agent of the department, county attorney, or a person or physician treating a youth when there is reason to believe the youth is a youth in need of care and that the residence of the youth or the custody by the person legally responsible for the youth presents an imminent danger to the life or health of the youth"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2001.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 326 inserted (1)(d) providing for taking a youth into custody for violation of condition of home arrest placement; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1999.

Case Notes

Truant Smelling of Alcohol — Particularized Suspicion for Arrest — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: A 14-year-old boy's mother called his school, reported that he had not returned home the previous night, and requested that he be picked up. The school resource officer notified police and asked that the boy be brought to school if found. An officer later found the boy on the street smelling of alcohol and took the boy to the police station where it was discovered that several town businesses had been burglarized during the night, including a bowling alley where money and liquor had been stolen. Money and liquor were found on the youth, and his shoes were taken as evidence to see if they matched prints found at the bowling alley. The youth moved that all evidence be suppressed, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Based on the fact that the officer smelled alcohol on the youth, the officer's particularized suspicion that the youth had been drinking developed into probable cause to believe that the youth committed the offense of consuming or possessing alcohol. Because the officer had probable cause to make an immediate arrest, including the fact that the boy had been reported missing from home and was truant from school, it was constitutionally permissible to take the boy into custody pursuant to this section and reasonable to conduct a search pursuant to that arrest for the youth's safety. In re Z.M., 2007 MT 122, 337 M 278, 160 P3d 490 (2007).

Illegal Pretrial Process and Procedure — State's Right to Charge and Try Case: Youth Court petition initiating proceedings did not state the facts constituting the offense youth was charged with in ordinary and concise language so as to enable a person of common understanding to know what was intended. The petition did not include a witness list. An arrest warrant was issued out of the Youth Court, although there is no provision in the Youth Court Act for issuance of an arrest warrant. Presumably the warrant was issued under 46-6-201, but there was no showing of probable cause supported by oath or affirmation reduced to writing. The youth had already been arrested in Oklahoma at the time the warrant was issued. By what process and authority he was arrested in Oklahoma was not shown, nor was it shown he was arrested by a law enforcement officer. He was subsequently transferred to the District Court for trial as an adult and convicted of two counts of deliberate homicide. The Youth Court proceedings from issuance of the warrant for arrest onward were patently defective. However, this did not preclude the state from having him transferred to the District Court, proceeding against him, and obtaining a conviction. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Chapter 37 at end of (2)(a) and (2)(b) inserted "subject to the provisions of 41-5-333(2)"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 286 deleted former (1)(b)(i) through (1)(b)(iii) that read: "(b) The youth may waive these rights under the following situations:

(i) when the youth is 16 years of age or older, the youth may make an effective waiver;

(ii) when the youth is under the age of 16 years and the youth and a parent or guardian agree, they may make an effective waiver; and

(iii) when the youth is under the age of 16 years and the youth and his parent or guardian do not agree, the youth may make an effective waiver only with advice of counsel"; inserted (2) establishing when youth may waive rights; deleted former (2) through (8) that read: "(2) Unless a youth has been released, a hearing must be held within 24 hours after the youth is taken into custody, excluding weekends and legal holidays, to determine whether there is probable cause to believe that the youth is a delinquent youth or a youth in need of supervision.

(3) The probable cause hearing required under subsection (2) may be held by the youth court, a justice of the peace, a municipal or city judge, or a magistrate having jurisdiction in the case as provided in 41-5-203. If the probable cause hearing is held by a justice of the peace, a municipal or city judge, or a magistrate, a record of the hearing must be made by a court reporter or by a tape recording of the hearing.

(4) At the probable cause hearing, the youth must be informed of his constitutional rights and his rights under this chapter.

(5) A parent, guardian, or legal custodian of the youth may be held in contempt of court for failing to be present at or to participate in the probable cause hearing unless he:

(a) cannot be located through diligent efforts of the investigating peace officer or peace officers; or

(b) is excused by the court for good cause.

(6) At the probable cause hearing, a guardian ad litem may be appointed as provided in 41-5-512.

(7) If it is determined that there is probable cause to believe the youth is a delinquent youth or is a youth in need of supervision, the court having jurisdiction in the case shall determine whether the youth should be retained in custody. If the court determines that continued custody of the youth is necessary and if the youth meets the criteria in 41-5-305, the youth may be placed in a detention facility or shelter care facility as provided in 41-5-306 but may not be placed in a jail or other facility used for the confinement of adults accused or convicted of criminal offenses.

(8) If probable cause is not found or if a probable cause hearing is not held within the time specified in subsection (2), the youth must be immediately released from custody"; and made minor changes in style.

The amendments to this section made by sec. 21, Ch. 550, L. 1997, were rendered void by sec. 49(3)(d), Ch. 286, L. 1997, a coordination section.

Saving Clause: Section 50, Ch. 286, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

Applicability: Section 51, Ch. 286, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] applies to proceedings commenced after [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 1997.

The change has been made in this section.

1991 Amendment: In (1) substituted "a delinquent youth or a youth in need of supervision" for "delinquent or in need of supervision"; in (2), at beginning, inserted "Unless a youth has been released" and deleted requirement that hearing be "held by the court, a justice of the peace, a municipal or city judge, or a magistrate"; in (3) inserted first sentence concerning holding of probable cause hearing; in (5), after "present at", inserted "or participate in"; in (7), after "delinquent", inserted "youth", after "supervision" inserted "the court having jurisdiction in the case shall determine whether the youth should be retained in custody. If the court determines that continued custody of the youth is necessary", and at end substituted "facility used for the confinement of adults accused or convicted of criminal offenses" for "facility for adults"; in (8), after "not found", inserted "or if a probable cause hearing is not held within the time specified in subsection (2)" and at end inserted "from custody"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1989.

1987 Amendments: Chapter 475 near beginning of (1) substituted "taken into custody" for "detained"; inserted (1)(c) requiring investigating officer, probation officer, or assigned person to immediately notify parents, guardian, or legal custodian when youth is taken into custody and reasons for such custody; inserted (2) through (6) regarding rights of youth taken into custody, probable cause hearing, possible parental contempt citation for failure to attend hearing, and detention upon finding of delinquent youth or youth in need of supervision; and in (6), at end of first sentence, inserted "but may not be placed in a jail or other facility for adults", effective July 1, 1989.

Chapter 515 in (1), before "questioning", deleted "investigation or" and after "alleging that the youth" deleted "being detained"; in (1)(a), after "shall be", deleted "immediately and effectively" and changed reference to constitutional rights and rights under this chapter to reference to rights against self-incrimination and counsel; in (1)(b)(i) changed age restriction from under age 12 to age 16 or older and deleted provision that parents may make a waiver; in (1)(b)(ii) changed age restriction from over age 12 to under age 16 and added provision that a guardian as well as a parent may make a waiver; and in (1)(b)(iii) changed age restriction from over age 12 to under age 16 and added provision that if a guardian or a parent does not agree to waiver, the youth may make waiver only with advice of counsel.

Case Notes

Waiver of Miranda Rights by 16-Year-Old Youth — Rights Adequately Explained: Following a report by a father that his 16-year-old son had been found in his sister's bedroom, a deputy took the boy to the Sheriff's office for an interview. The deputy conscientiously explained the Miranda warning to the boy, and the boy said that he understood the rights and waived those rights. The boy then confessed to sexual contact with his sister and was charged with felony sexual assault. The boy moved to suppress the confession but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court reviewed the interview and concluded that the boy met the age requirement for providing a valid waiver without his parents' consent or counsel present and that the deputy took appropriate care in explaining the Miranda warning and engaged in no impermissible tactics in seeking to extract a confession. Thus, the boy's waiver of Miranda rights was valid. The Youth Court's findings of facts were not clearly erroneous and the suppression motion was properly denied. In re S.M.S., 2010 MT 18, 355 Mont. 102, 225 P.3d 781.

Custodial Interrogation of Youth Without Consent — Miranda Warning Required — Suppression of Confession and Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Required: A 14-year-old boy's mother called his school, reported that he had not returned home the previous night, and requested that he be picked up. The school resource officer notified police and asked that the boy be brought to school if found. An officer later found the boy on the street smelling of alcohol and took the boy to the police station where it was discovered that several town businesses had been burglarized during the night, including a bowling alley where money and liquor had been stolen. Although there was no record that the youth was advised of his Miranda rights, during interrogation both prior to and after arrival of his parents, the youth confessed to robbing the bowling alley and subsequently pleaded guilty to felony burglary. The Youth Court summarily determined that the confessions were voluntary, denied a motion to suppress, found the youth was delinquent, and ordered 2 years' probation. On appeal, the Supreme Court addressed the voluntariness of the confessions and reversed. Given the absence of a tangible record that the officer read Miranda rights to the youth or that the youth or the parents consented in writing to a waiver of Miranda rights or agreed to the interview, the requirement in this section that a youth be advised of the right against self-incrimination and the right to counsel was violated. Thus, the confessions could not be considered voluntary and should have been suppressed by the Youth Court. The Supreme Court also ordered that on remand, the youth be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea In re Z.M., 2007 MT 122, 337 M 278, 160 P3d 490 (2007).

No Capacity or Actual Authority of Youth to Consent to Search of Parent's Home: While conducting a search for Lowe, officers learned that Lowe was staying at Schwarz's home and drove to Schwarz's residence to initiate an arrest. Schwarz was not home, but Schwarz's 13-year-old daughter answered the door and consented to a search of the residence. Without attempting to contact Schwarz, the officers entered the home without a warrant and discovered drugs. When Schwarz arrived home, she was arrested for possession of dangerous drugs. Following conviction, Schwarz appealed on grounds that the search was illegal because the minor daughter did not have authority to consent to a search of the home. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed, adopting a per se rule that a youth under the age of 16 years has neither the capacity nor the actual authority to relinquish a parent's privacy rights and consent to a search of the parent's home. St. v. Schwarz, 2006 MT 120, 332 M 243, 136 P3d 989 (2006). See also St. v. Melees, 2000 MT 6, 298 M 15, 994 P2d 683 (2000).

Youth's Right to Parental Notification — Suppression of Statements for Failure to Notify Parents: McKee, a youth charged with assault with a weapon, contended that police erred by failing to notify his parents prior to questioning or to inform him of the right to waive notification and that statements made prior to notification should have been suppressed. The trial court denied the suppression motion, reasoning that this section provided the parents, not the youth, with the right to notification, so it was not a right that McKee could waive. The Supreme Court disagreed. The right of parental notification belongs to the youth, not to the parents. McKee did not waive the right, so statements made prior to parental notification should have been suppressed, and failure to do so was reversible error. St. v. McKee, 2006 MT 5, 330 M 249, 127 P3d 445 (2006).

Use of Youth's Voluntary Confession of Drug Use in Subsequent Probation Violation Proceedings Not Error: A youth admitted that she had used methamphetamine, as part of an agreement with the County Attorney and in exchange for a recommendation that the youth be placed in a drug treatment program. When the youth violated the terms of her probation, the confession of prior drug use was admitted into evidence. The youth contended that the self-incriminating statement was inadmissible because the youth was not informed that the statement could later be used against her if she violated probation. The Supreme Court declined to reverse the Youth Court's disposition simply because the youth was not advised that the admission could be used later and instead noted that if the confession was voluntary and not coerced, it could properly be used at a later trial for drug possession. Further, under In re C.L., 2004 MT 71, 320 M 369, 87 P3d 462 (2004), the fact that an admission is voluntary is all that is required for a confession to be admissible in a Youth Court proceeding. In this case, the youth was not placed in a position in which she was coerced into waiving the right against self-incrimination by a threat of penalty, but rather voluntarily admitted drug use as a condition of sentencing to a drug treatment program in a manner similar to a plea bargain agreement. Thus, the Youth Court did not err in allowing the youth's admission into evidence and in taking judicial notice of the youth's waiver of the right against self-incrimination. In re R.L.H., 2005 MT 177, 327 M 520, 116 P3d 791 (2005).

Youth's Waiver of Rights When Parent and Youth in Separate Places — No Specific Topic of Questioning — Admissibility of Confession: After a fire in a clandestine methamphetamine laboratory, police sought to question a youth who was reported to be involved. With the youth's mother present, the officers informed them of the youth's various rights, gave them a written statement of rights, and allowed them to discuss waiver of the rights. In the youth's presence, the mother signed a consent to waive the youth's rights. The youth was then taken to the station without his mother, who declined to go, was informed of his rights again and signed a waiver of rights, and was questioned about the fire and the laboratory. The youth subsequently confessed to involvement in the drug operation, and the District Court declared him delinquent and entered a dispositional order. On appeal, the youth contended that the confession should have been suppressed because he and his mother did not agree together to waive his rights and because his mother was led to believe that the questioning was about the fire and not the laboratory, so she could not effectively waive his rights without accurate knowledge of the basis of the questioning, citing Evans v. District Court, 2000 MT 38, 298 M 279, 995 P2d 455 (2000). The Supreme Court disagreed. Nothing in Evans or in this section requires that a youth and parent agree as to the specific topic of questioning to which a waiver of rights applies in order to make the waiver effective, nor does this section require the agreement of the youth and parent in the same place at the same time. The youth also failed to show that the confession was involuntary through police deceit because he should have known that any interview regarding the fire could involve questions regarding the drug operation. In re C.L., 2004 MT 71, 320 M 369, 87 P3d 462 (2004).

Lack of Advisement of Right to Counsel and Right Against Self-Incrimination for Youth Taken Into Custody for Questioning Reversible Error — When Waiver of Rights Attaches: A youth was questioned at the Sheriff's office regarding a burglary and criminal mischief and was then taken home, where he agreed to relinquish articles of clothing that were not inconsistent with evidence found at the crime scene. The youth's parents were not notified of any of the Sheriff's actions, and no omnibus hearing was held. The youth's clothing was later introduced at trial over the youth's objection. Following conviction, the youth appealed, contending that the clothing was not legally obtained pursuant to a search warrant, that he was not advised of his rights, and that he did not give an informed waiver of his right to have his parents contacted prior to relinquishment of the clothing. The state maintained that the youth voluntarily consented to relinquish the clothing and thus waived his rights. The Supreme Court reversed. Under the Montana Youth Court Act, a youth taken into custody for questioning on a matter that could result in allegations that the youth is delinquent must be advised of the right to counsel and the right against self-incrimination, and the youth's parents must be immediately notified by the investigating officer. A youth who is 16 years of age or older may make an effective waiver of those rights. In determining whether waiver and consent by juveniles are voluntary, the Supreme Court applies the totality of circumstances test set out in Evans v. District Court, 2000 MT 38, 298 M 279, 995 P2d 455 (2000), which provides that a determination of voluntariness takes into account: (1) the defendant's age and level of education; (2) whether the defendant was advised of the defendant's rights; (3) the defendant's prior experience with the criminal justice system; (4) the defendant's background and experience; and (5) the defendant's demeanor, coherence, articulateness, and capacity to make full use of the defendant's faculties. Here, the District Court failed to take the Evans factors into account, and the requirements of this section regarding parental notification were not fulfilled. Failure to follow statutory requirements and to consider the totality of the circumstances was reversible error. In re C.T.P., 2004 MT 63, 320 M 279, 87 P3d 399 (2004).

Plain Error in Allowing Youth's Extrajudicial Statements When Youth Not Advised of Right to Counsel and Right Against Self-Incrimination: A youth asserted for the first time on appeal that the Youth Court improperly admitted extrajudicial statements that the youth made regarding the youth's whereabouts when a burglary and criminal mischief were committed. Despite the state's contention that the arguments should not be considered because they were not raised at trial, the Supreme Court nevertheless considered the argument under the plain error doctrine because the youth was not notified while in custody of the fundamental right to counsel and the right to avoid self-incrimination, nor were the youth's parents notified as required. The youth's rights under the Montana Youth Court Act and the constitution were simply ignored in this case, so in order to avoid a question of the fundamental fairness of the trial by admission of constitutionally infirm extrajudicial statements, the Supreme Court reversed the trial court's decision to admit the statements. In re C.T.P., 2004 MT 63, 320 M 279, 87 P3d 399 (2004).

Youth Considered in Custody — Supervisory Control Appropriate When Lower Court Proceeding Under Mistake of Law: Fourteen-year-old Evans was taken by his mother to the Flathead County Sheriff's office, upon request of the Deputy Sheriff, because he had been observed talking to a child on the day of her disappearance. Evans and his mother were separated upon arrival at the office, and Evans was taken to a 9-by-9-foot windowless interrogation room with a shut door where he was questioned for 2½ hours by two officers wearing badges and weapons. Evans waived his Miranda rights outside the presence and without the consent of his mother and without an opportunity to discuss his rights or the waiver with counsel. The officers did not tell Evans that he could leave the interrogation room or consult with his mother, and during the course of the interview, Evans' mother was denied contact with Evans. Although initially adamantly denying involvement, the officers repeatedly suggested that Evans had "more to tell them" and misled him into believing that the police had fingerprints from the girl's body that could be matched to his. Toward the end of the interrogation, Evans confessed that he drowned the child and was charged with her death, arrested, handcuffed, and escorted to juvenile detention without an opportunity to speak to his mother. Evans filed a motion to suppress the confession on grounds that his waiver of rights while in custody was invalid under this section. The District Court denied the motion, concluding that Evans was not in custody during the interview and that the confession was voluntary. Accepting supervisory control because the District Court was proceeding under a mistake of law, the Supreme Court, finding it difficult to imagine a more "custodial" setting, applied the factors in St. v. Staat, 251 M 1, 822 P2d 643, 48 St. Rep. 1041 (1991), and concluded that Evans was in custody during the interview, that his waiver of rights without the consent of a parent or advice of counsel was invalid under this section, and that the confession was not voluntary under the totality of the circumstances. Although the record on appeal was not sufficient to determine whether the state had other evidence sufficient to charge Evans, the case was nevertheless remanded for consideration of the evidence without the confession. Evans v. District Court, 2000 MT 38, 298 M 279, 995 P2d 455, 57 St. Rep. 175 (2000), followed, with regard to applicability of the totality of circumstances test for determining voluntariness of a juvenile's waiver and consent, in In re C.T.P., 2004 MT 63, 320 M 279, 87 P3d 399 (2004). See also State ex rel. D.M.B. v. District Court, 2004 MT 335, 324 M 190, 103 P3d 514 (2004).

Transfer of Youth Court Case to District Court Not Violative of Minor's Constitutional Rights: Spina argued that the statute allowing transfer of her Youth Court case to the District Court resulted in violation of her rights under Art. II, sec. 15, Mont. Const., which guarantees to minors the same fundamental rights afforded to adults, and under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., which guarantees the right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court considered alleged violations of the right against self-incrimination, the right to effective assistance of counsel, the right to a fair trial, and the right to a presumption of innocence, finding that Spina's arguments were without merit. The transfer statute did not violate Spina's constitutional rights. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Warrantless Entry and Arrest Valid — Subsequent Search Invalid — No Consent: While the officers' initial entry into the apartment and the subsequent arrest and seizure of marijuana on the table were valid, the so-called "consent" search of the rest of the apartment was unlawful. One renter's consent was fraudulently secured and otherwise invalid under this section (formerly 41-5-303). St. v. Allen, 188 M 135, 612 P2d 199 (1980).

The amendments to this section made by sec. 23, Ch. 550, L. 1997, were rendered void by sec. 49(3)(d), Ch. 286, L. 1997, a coordination section.

Code Commissioner Change: Section 49(3)(i), Ch. 286, L. 1997, instructed the Code Commissioner, in Ch. 286 or in legislation enacted by the 1997 Legislature, to change references to an aftercare agreement to references to a parole agreement. The change has been made in this section.

Saving Clause: Section 50, Ch. 286, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

Applicability: Section 51, Ch. 286, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] applies to proceedings commenced after [the effective date of this act]." Effective October 1, 1997.

1991 Amendment: In three places in (1), before "detention facility", inserted "secure" and at beginning deleted "After a probable cause hearing provided for in 41-5-303"; inserted (1)(b) concerning allegation of delinquent youth; deleted former (1)(e) that read: "(e) there is good reason to believe the youth will not appear for court proceedings as ordered"; inserted (1)(c) concerning awaiting final disposition of case; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 23, 1991.

1987 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 475 at beginning of (1) substituted "After a probable cause hearing provided for in 41-5-303, a youth may not be placed in a detention facility" for "A youth taken into custody may not be detained in a jail or other facility for detention purposes"; in (1)(a) substituted "one of the following acts" for "an act" and after "offense" deleted former (1)(a) that read: "(a) the alleged act is one of the following"; inserted (1)(d) and (1)(e) prohibiting placement of a youth in a detention facility unless his detention is required to protect persons or property or there is good reason to believe youth will not appear for court proceedings; at end of (1)(h) inserted "in the judicial district with jurisdiction over the youth"; and near beginning of (2), after "youth", deleted "taken into custody" and substituted "placed in a shelter care facility unless" for "sheltered prior to the hearing on the petition except when".

Chapter 515 at end of (1)(a) substituted "offense is one specified in 41-5-206" for "act is one of the following"; deleted former (1)(a)(i) through (1)(a)(x) that read: "(i) criminal homicide as defined in 45-5-101;
(ii) arson as defined in 45-6-103;
(iii) aggravated or felony assault as defined in 45-5-202;
(iv) robbery as defined in 45-5-401;
(v) burglary or aggravated burglary as defined in 45-6-204;

(vii) aggravated kidnapping as defined in 45-5-303;

(ix) criminal sale of dangerous drugs for profit as included in 45-9-101; or
(x) attempt as defined in 45-4-103 of any of the acts enumerated in subsections (1)(a)(i) through (1)(a)(ix)"; in (1)(b), after "correctional", inserted "or detention"; inserted (1)(d), (1)(f), and (1)(g) citing circumstances under which youth may be placed in detention facility; and in (1)(h), after "meets", inserted "additional" and after "court" inserted "in the judicial district that has current jurisdiction over him".

Chapter 610 in former (1)(a)(i) substituted "homicide as defined in 45-5-102 through 45-5-104" for "criminal homicide as defined in 45-5-101" (not codified as explained below).

In preparation of the composite of the Ch. 475, Ch. 515, and Ch. 610 amendments to this section, the Code Commissioner omitted from the composite the Ch. 475 amendment to subsection (1)(a) that referred to "one of the following acts" because the phrase referred to former (1)(a)(i) through (1)(a)(x), which were deleted by Ch. 515.

The Code Commissioner used the Ch. 515 amendment to subsection (1)(h) rather than the Ch. 475 amendment, which was similar, because the Ch. 515 amendment contained the additional qualifier of "current" jurisdiction. Any inconsistency between the official enrolled bills and the MCA is to be resolved in favor of the official enrolled bills (see 1-11-103).

1985 Amendment: In (1) substituted language relating to circumstances in which youth could be placed in a jail or detention facility for former (1) that read: "A youth taken into custody may not be detained prior to the hearing on the petition except when:

(a) his detention is required to protect the person or the property of others or of the youth;

(b) he has pending court or administrative action or is awaiting a transfer to another jurisdiction and may abscond or be removed from the jurisdiction of the court;

(c) there are not adequate assurances that the youth will appear for court when required; or

(d) an order for his detention has been made by the court".

Case Notes

Absence of Youth Court Procedure to Determine Competency of Youths Not Violative of Equal Protection: Attorneys for a 9-year-old youth charged with arson contended that the youth lacked the capacity to form the requisite mental intent to commit the crime and that the youth was too young to understand the process against him and to effectively assist in his defense. A motion was made to dismiss. The Youth Court determined that the youth understood the charges and his rights and sentenced the youth to 2 years' probation. On appeal, the youth asserted that the Youth Court Act violated the constitutional guarantee of equal protection by not providing a procedure to evaluate the competency of youths similar to the procedure for determining the competency of adults to stand trial. The Supreme Court disagreed. A youth alleging incompetency based on immaturity is not similarly situated to an adult criminal defendant alleging mental disease or defect. All youths experience a period of immaturity, which most youths outgrow, but the same cannot be said for a mental disease or defect. The court noted that the logical extension of the youth's argument would require that immature youths be placed in mental health facilities until they are mature enough to stand trial. Because immature youths are not similarly situated to adult criminal defendants alleging mental disease or defect, equal protection was not implicated. In this case, substantial evidence indicated that the youth could consult with his attorneys and understand the proceedings against him and that the youth could form the requisite criminal intent of purposely and knowingly starting a fire. The youth was fit to proceed and did not suffer from a mental disorder, and the youth's due process rights were protected by hearings at which the youth's competency to proceed was determined. The Youth Court was affirmed. In re G.T.M., 2009 MT 443, 354 M 197, 222 P3d 626 (2009). See also State ex rel. Elliot v. District Court, 211 M 1, 684 P2d 481 (1984), and In re S.M.K.-S.H., 2012 MT 281, 367 Mont. 176, 290 P.3d 718, in which the court determined the youth was not similarly situated to an adult because he faced a different disposition for assault with a weapon as a delinquent youth than an adult would face in District Court.

(6) (a) Except as provided in subsection (6)(b), contributions ordered under this section and each modification of an existing order are enforceable by immediate or delinquency income withholding, or both, under Title 40, chapter 5, part 4. (i) good cause not to require immediate income withholding; or

(ii) an alternative arrangement between the department and the person who is ordered to pay contributions.

(c) A finding of good cause not to require immediate income withholding must, at a minimum, be based upon:

(ii) proof of timely payment of previously ordered support in cases involving modification of contributions ordered under this section.

(d) An alternative arrangement must:

(i) provide sufficient security to ensure compliance with the arrangement;

(ii) be in writing and be signed by a representative of the department and the person required to make contributions; and

(iii) if approved by the court, be entered into the record of the proceeding.

(7) (a) If the court orders the payment of contributions under this section, the department shall apply to the department of public health and human services for support enforcement services pursuant to Title IV-D of the Social Security Act.

(b) The department of public health and human services may collect and enforce a contribution order under this section by any means available under law, including the remedies provided for in Title 40, chapter 5, parts 2 and 4"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Prosecutorial Immunity — Initiation of Delinquency Proceedings Not Equivalent to Functioning as Complaining Witness: A minor was charged with sexual intercourse without consent. It was later discovered that the allegations were greatly exaggerated and the charges were dismissed. The minor's parents pursued a malicious prosecution claim. They cited Kalina v. Fletcher, 522 US 118 (1997), in which the U.S. Supreme Court found that a prosecutor acted as a complaining witness and lost prosecutorial immunity by personally vouching for the truth of a set of facts in an affidavit. The Montana Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's finding that the County Attorney's signing a petition to initiate a delinquency proceeding was not analogous to the sort of personal vouching found in Kalina and that the County Attorney was not acting as a complaining witness and was entitled to prosecutorial immunity. Case Notes

Illegal Pretrial Process and Procedure — State's Right to Charge and Try Case: Youth Court petition initiating proceedings did not state the facts constituting the offense youth was charged with in ordinary and concise language so as to enable a person of common understanding to know what was intended. The petition did not include a witness list. An arrest warrant was issued out of the Youth Court, although there is no provision in the Youth Court Act for issuance of an arrest warrant. Presumably the warrant was issued under 46-6-201, but there was no showing of probable cause supported by oath or affirmation reduced to writing. The youth had already been arrested in Oklahoma at the time the warrant was issued. By what process and authority he was arrested in Oklahoma was not shown, nor was it shown he was arrested by a law enforcement officer. He was subsequently transferred to the District Court for trial as an adult and convicted of two counts of deliberate homicide. The Youth Court proceedings from issuance of the warrant for arrest onward were patently defective. However, this did not preclude the state from having him transferred to the District Court, proceeding against him, and obtaining a conviction. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Substance of Petition: The substance of the petition under section 10-605, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), must be the facts which bring the child within the provisions of section 10-602, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed). St. v. Johnson, 141 M 1, 374 P2d 504 (1962).

Insufficiency of Petition: The petition in a proceeding under Ch. 122, L. 1911 (now repealed), for the trial of an alleged juvenile delinquent, which failed to make the parents parties or allege that they were unfit guardians or that they had consented to the proceeding, was insufficient. In re Satterthwaite, 52 M 550, 160 P 346 (1916).

Delay of 391 Days Attributable to State — Speedy Trial Analysis Triggered — Remand for Determination of Whether State Can Prove Lack of Prejudice: A.G., a juvenile charged with felony vehicle theft, being a runaway, and curfew violation, moved to dismiss the charges for lack of a speedy trial 2 months before a scheduled hearing. The District Court subsequently attributed 229 of 392 days of delay to the state, concluded that the right to a speedy trial was not violated, and placed the burden on A.G. to show that the delay was prejudicial. Applying the criteria in Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), the Supreme Court found that the District Court incorrectly calculated the length of delay, which was actually 455 days. As established in Billings v. Bruce, any delay over 200 days triggers further speedy trial analysis. Because of a miscommunication between the juvenile probation office and the County Attorney, the state neglected to diligently move the case toward prosecution, and A.G. was under no obligation to ensure diligent prosecution of the case or to help the state avoid dismissal for failure to timely prosecute. Further, the District Court mistakenly placed the burden of proving prejudice on A.G., when in actuality, the burden was on the state to prove a lack of prejudice. The Supreme Court remanded for a hearing to determine whether A.G. was prejudiced by the 455-day delay. In re A.G., 2002 MT 111, 309 M 491, 47 P3d 831 (2002).

Personal Service: Service of the citation on an adult brother of the child's father at the father's home was not sufficient service on the father. In re Allamaras, 139 M 130, 361 P2d 340 (1961), explained in In re Gonzalez, 139 M 592, 366 P2d 718 (1961).

"Initial Appearance" for Purposes of Filing Motion to Substitute — Youth's First Appearance — Dismissal of Motion to Substitute Judge as Untimely Reversed: A youth who was charged as a delinquent youth filed a motion to substitute the District Court judge pursuant to 3-1-804, which requires a motion to substitute be filed within 10 days of the youth's "initial appearance". The District Court denied the motion to substitute, ruling that it had not been filed within 10 days of the youth's detention hearing and therefore was untimely. The District Court determined that a youth's detention hearing constitutes the youth's initial appearance. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed the District Court, concluding that a detention hearing is not a youth's initial appearance because the hearing is to establish whether the state may charge the youth as a delinquent in the first place. Rather, the Supreme Court concluded that a youth's "first appearance," which is referred to in the Montana Youth Court Act and is held after a detention hearing, serves as a youth's "initial appearance" for purposes of filing a motion to substitute the District Court judge. Minor's Prior DUI in City Court Properly Applied to Felony DUI Charge — No Violation of Constitutional Rights in City Court: Allen was arrested for a felony fourth DUI in 2004. Calculation of the number of DUIs included Allen's first arrest in 1997 as a minor, to which Allen pleaded guilty in City Court. Allen contended that it was improper to include the 1997 conviction in the total because that conviction was constitutionally infirm in that the City Court failed to advise him of his rights, including the right to counsel, and accepted his guilty plea without consent of a parent. Allen further contended that as a minor he was incapable of knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently waiving the right to counsel. The Supreme Court disagreed. City Court records provided direct evidence that Allen's 1997 conviction was not obtained in violation of Allen's constitutional rights, and Allen failed to rebut the presumption of regularity that attached to the 1997 conviction. With specific regard to the right to counsel argument, the court noted that because the Youth Court does not have concurrent jurisdiction with the City Court over traffic violations, including DUIs, Allen was incorrect in claiming that the right to counsel could only have been waived by Allen and a parent at the 1997 proceedings. Therefore, application of Allen's 1997 conviction in calculating a felony DUI was not error. St. v. Allen, 2009 MT 124, 350 M 204, 206 P3d 951 (2009).

Adjudication and Commitment Improper When Youth Not Represented by Counsel: When youth was not represented by legal counsel at all proceedings following the filing of a petition alleging the youth to be in need of supervision (now intervention) and the right to counsel was not waived, adjudication and commitment to Mountain View School was held improper. Attorney General's Opinions

County, Not State, Required to Fund Legal Expenses of Indigent Juvenile Under Youth Court Act: Youth Court defense expenses are not included in 3-5-901 as a specific expense that the state is required to fund; thus, the Legislature did not intend the state to be responsible for funding Youth Court expenses. Rather, pursuant to 41-5-104 (now repealed) and 41-5-111, the Board of County Commissioners is required to fund the legal defense expenses of an indigent youth against whom a petition has been filed in Youth Court. (See 2005 amendment.) 48 A.G. Op. 16 (2000).

Indigent Youth Entitled to Counsel — Reimbursement: When a petition is filed initiating proceedings under the Montana Youth Court Act, a youth is entitled to court-appointed counsel when the youth is indigent and the youth's parents have sufficient financial resources but refuse to employ counsel. A Youth Court may order reimbursement from nonindigent parents for expenses associated with court-appointed counsel. (See 2005 amendment.) 42 A.G. Op. 88 (1988).

Requirement of Counsel: This section (formerly 41-5-511) limits the requirement of counsel to those proceedings in which a youth is charged as a delinquent youth because commitment for more than 6 months is possible only as a result of such an adjudication. Because a youth alleged to be in need of supervision (now intervention) cannot be committed for more than 6 months, the requirement of counsel under this section (formerly 41-5-511) does not attach in that situation. (See 2005 amendment.) 40 A.G. Op. 74 (1984).

Custodial Interrogation of Youth Without Consent — Miranda Warning Required — Suppression of Confession and Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Required: A 14-year-old boy's mother called his school, reported that he had not returned home the previous night, and requested that he be picked up. The school resource officer notified police and asked that the boy be brought to school if found. An officer later found the boy on the street smelling of alcohol and took the boy to the police station where it was discovered that several town businesses had been burglarized during the night, including a bowling alley where money and liquor had been stolen. Although there was no record that the youth was advised of his Miranda rights, during interrogation both prior to and after arrival of his parents, the youth confessed to robbing the bowling alley and subsequently pleaded guilty to felony burglary. The Youth Court summarily determined that the confessions were voluntary, denied a motion to suppress, found the youth was delinquent, and ordered 2 years' probation. On appeal, the Supreme Court addressed the voluntariness of the confessions and reversed. Given the absence of a tangible record that the officer read Miranda rights to the youth or that the youth or the parents consented in writing to a waiver of Miranda rights or agreed to the interview, the requirement in 41-5-331 that a youth be advised of the right against self-incrimination and the right to counsel was violated. Thus, the confessions could not be considered voluntary and should have been suppressed by the Youth Court. The Supreme Court also ordered that on remand, the youth be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea In re Z.M., 2007 MT 122, 337 M 278, 160 P3d 490 (2007).

Youth's Waiver of Rights When Parent and Youth in Separate Places — No Specific Topic of Questioning — Admissibility of Confession: After a fire in a clandestine methamphetamine laboratory, police sought to question a youth who was reported to be involved. With the youth's mother present, the officers informed them of the youth's various rights, gave them a written statement of rights, and allowed them to discuss waiver of the rights. In the youth's presence, the mother signed a consent to waive the youth's rights. The youth was then taken to the station without his mother, who declined to go, was informed of his rights again and signed a waiver of rights, and was questioned about the fire and the laboratory. The youth subsequently confessed to involvement in the drug operation, and the District Court declared him delinquent and entered a dispositional order. On appeal, the youth contended that the confession should have been suppressed because he and his mother did not agree together to waive his rights and because his mother was led to believe that the questioning was about the fire and not the laboratory, so she could not effectively waive his rights without accurate knowledge of the basis of the questioning, citing Evans v. District Court, 2000 MT 38, 298 M 279, 995 P2d 455 (2000). The Supreme Court disagreed. Nothing in Evans or in 41-5-331 requires that a youth and parent agree as to the specific topic of questioning to which a waiver of rights applies in order to make the waiver effective, nor does 41-5-331 require the agreement of the youth and parent in the same place at the same time. The youth also failed to show that the confession was involuntary through police deceit because he should have known that any interview regarding the fire could involve questions regarding the drug operation. In re C.L., 2004 MT 71, 320 M 369, 87 P3d 462 (2004).

Lack of Advisement of Right to Counsel and Right Against Self-Incrimination for Youth Taken Into Custody for Questioning Reversible Error — When Waiver of Rights Attaches: A youth was questioned at the Sheriff's office regarding a burglary and criminal mischief and was then taken home, where he agreed to relinquish articles of clothing that were not inconsistent with evidence found at the crime scene. The youth's parents were not notified of any of the Sheriff's actions, and no omnibus hearing was held. The youth's clothing was later introduced at trial over the youth's objection. Following conviction, the youth appealed, contending that the clothing was not legally obtained pursuant to a search warrant, that he was not advised of his rights, and that he did not give an informed waiver of his right to have his parents contacted prior to relinquishment of the clothing. The state maintained that the youth voluntarily consented to relinquish the clothing and thus waived his rights. The Supreme Court reversed. Under the Montana Youth Court Act, a youth taken into custody for questioning on a matter that could result in allegations that the youth is delinquent must be advised of the right to counsel and the right against self-incrimination, and the youth's parents must be immediately notified by the investigating officer. A youth who is 16 years of age or older may make an effective waiver of those rights. In determining whether waiver and consent by juveniles are voluntary, the Supreme Court applies the totality of circumstances test set out in Evans v. District Court, 2000 MT 38, 298 M 279, 995 P2d 455 (2000), which provides that a determination of voluntariness takes into account: (1) the defendant's age and level of education; (2) whether the defendant was advised of the defendant's rights; (3) the defendant's prior experience with the criminal justice system; (4) the defendant's background and experience; and (5) the defendant's demeanor, coherence, articulateness, and capacity to make full use of the defendant's faculties. Here, the District Court failed to take the Evans factors into account, and the requirements of 41-5-331 regarding parental notification were not fulfilled. Failure to follow statutory requirements and to consider the totality of the circumstances was reversible error. In re C.T.P., 2004 MT 63, 320 M 279, 87 P3d 399 (2004).

Plain Error in Allowing Youth's Extrajudicial Statements When Youth Not Advised of Right to Counsel and Right Against Self-Incrimination: A youth asserted for the first time on appeal that the Youth Court improperly admitted extrajudicial statements that the youth made regarding the youth's whereabouts when a burglary and criminal mischief were committed. Despite the state's contention that the arguments should not be considered because they were not raised at trial, the Supreme Court nevertheless considered the argument under the plain error doctrine because the youth was not notified while in custody of the fundamental right to counsel and the right to avoid self-incrimination, nor were the youth's parents notified as required. The youth's rights under the Montana Youth Court Act and the constitution were simply ignored in this case, so in order to avoid a question of the fundamental fairness of the trial by admission of constitutionally infirm extrajudicial statements, the Supreme Court reversed the trial court's decision to admit the statements. No Authority of Youth Court to Order Youth to Pay Restitution Past Age of Majority: In 2000, a 12-year-old who admitted sexually assaulting an 8-year-old was adjudicated a delinquent youth by the Youth Court and placed on probation until age 18. Probation conditions included payment of restitution and the costs of the victim's therapy. In 2003, the Youth Court was notified by a restitution officer that a therapist had advised that counseling for the victim and the victim's mother was complete and that the restitution amount owed was $4,507.53; however, no restitution hearing was held. Nevertheless, the state and the youth's parents executed a restitution agreement specifying that the youth was liable for payment of restitution and identifying $4,507.53 as the total restitution due. The Youth Court signed the 2003 agreement, and $4,507.53 was subsequently paid in full. In 2005, the state requested a restitution hearing, noting that the victim's mother had submitted additional restitution claims of $4,352.93 for therapeutic sports activity for the victim and $8,309.25 for university schooling costs for the mother. At a hearing held 2 days before the end of the youth's probation, the Youth Court claimed jurisdiction over the youth for financial purposes until the youth turned 21 and ordered the youth to pay $12,662.18 in additional restitution to cover the mother's claims for sports and school-related costs. The youth appealed on grounds that the Youth Court had no authority to order additional restitution, and the Supreme Court reversed. The Youth Court limited its retention of jurisdiction beyond the youth's 18th birthday to enforcement of financial obligations set forth in the original disposition order and in the 2003 agreement establishing the total restitution to be paid by the youth. Therefore, the Youth Court did not have jurisdiction to impose additional restitution in a stand-alone order after the youth's probation, of which payment of restitution was a condition, expired, and the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to vacate the order for additional restitution. Youth Court Authority to Extend Probation Period at Probation Revocation Proceeding — No Violation of Equal Protection: At age 14, the appellant admitted to the charge of assault with a weapon and was placed on probation until his 18th birthday by the Youth Court. Two years later, the appellant admitted to possession of a handgun, in violation of his probation agreement. At the disposition hearing, the Youth Court revoked the appellant's probation, committed him to the Pine Hills Youth Correctional Facility until his 18th birthday, and extended his probation term until his 21st birthday to ensure he would be fully rehabilitated. The appellant appealed the Youth Court order on the grounds that the Youth Court had no authority to impose an additional probationary period beyond the period in the initial order. The appellant also asserted that he was denied equal protection of the law because he was similarly situated to an adult who committed assault with a weapon but was treated differently because the adult could not be subject to an additional probation period upon revocation. The Supreme Court upheld the order of the Youth Court because, under 41-5-1431, the court could have issued an order of commitment to the correctional facility and required the appellant to remain on probation until his 21st birthday at the original hearing. In addition, the Supreme Court determined that the appellant was not similarly situated to an adult who committed assault with a weapon because specific statutory provisions within the Youth Court Act ensure minors are treated differently from adults, including emphasizing rehabilitation, which was the Youth Court's justification for extending the appellant's probation. In re S.M.K.-S.H., 2012 MT 281, 367 Mont. 176, 290 P.3d 718.

Disposition for Probation Violation: A youth originally charged as and adjudicated a youth in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention) who violates probation cannot be committed to the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) for more than 6 months under this section (formerly 41-5-533) because such disposition was unavailable in the original adjudication. However, a youth originally charged as a delinquent youth who is placed on probation as a youth in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention) (as provided in 41-5-103(13)(d)) may be committed for more than 6 months if adjudged a delinquent youth after violating probation. 40 A.G. Op. 74 (1984).

Alternative to Revocation Proceeding: As an alternative to a revocation proceeding, a youth in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention) who violates probation could be charged by petition as a delinquent youth under the definition of a delinquent youth, 41-5-103(12)(b), and could then be committed for a period of more than 6 months. 40 A.G. Delinquent Youth Placed at Pine Hills Youth Correctional Facility by Youth Court Without Requisite Findings — Statutory Authority Exceeded. In re V.K.B., 2022 MT 94, 408 Mont. 392, 510 P.3d 66.

Prejudicial Delay: When petition to adjudicate J.F., a youth in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention), was filed August 13 and no further action was taken until October 29, the Youth Court erred either in not dismissing the petition with prejudice after 15 days from service of the petition or in not ordering a continuance. In re J.F., 219 M 140, 710 P2d 705, 42 St. Rep. 1904 (1985).

Hearing Mandate — Reasonable Attempt to Comply Required: A petition charging four youths with conspiracy to commit aggravated assault was filed on June 16, and a hearing date was set for June 27. On June 22, an order issued continuing the hearing date until July 6. While it is not apparent from the record whether the state or trial court requested the continuance, it is clear that the youths did not. On July 6, the court ordered the hearing date continued. On August 2, the state asked that a new hearing date be set. Prior to the hearing, the youths moved to dismiss the petition under this section. The trial court dismissed the petition with prejudice, and the state appealed. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, stating that the first continuance granted for unknown reasons did not meet the "interests of justice" and "due diligence" requirements of 41-5-516(2) (now repealed) and by itself was sufficient for dismissal. The court also stated that even assuming that the trial court had ordered the first two continuances sua sponte (on its own motion), the failure of the state to request a hearing for almost a month after the second order showed a lack of a reasonable attempt to comply with the hearing mandate of 41-5-516(1) (now repealed). In re L.R.T., R.A.C., T.P.V., & M.L.B., 209 M 421, 680 P2d 579, 41 St. Rep. 800 (1984).

Transfer to District Court — Hearing on Youth Court Petition Against Youth Unnecessary: The provision in 41-5-516 (now repealed) that a petition alleging delinquency or need of supervision (now intervention) shall be dismissed with prejudice if a hearing on the petition is not begun within 15 days after service does not apply when the charges are subject to transfer to the District Court and a timely motion to transfer is made. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Delinquent Youth Conviction Reversal — Inadmissible Hearsay Prejudice — Corroboration of Testimony of Others Responsible or Legally Accountable for Same Offense: After a minor was cited for running a red light and for driving without a license, the County Attorney charged he was a delinquent youth under the Youth Court Act, alleging the minor had taken the car he was found driving without the owner's consent. The minor appealed that the testimony of two police officers concerning the stolen property report was inadmissible hearsay and that his conviction declaring him a delinquent youth was improperly based on the testimony of other individuals who were legally accountable for the offense. The Montana Supreme Court found that the officers' testimony was inadmissible hearsay. The court also found that the corroborating evidence supplied by the officer who stopped the vehicle the minor was driving tended to connect the youth directly with the offense and therefore that the testimony of other minors responsible or legally accountable for the same offense was properly admitted. Despite the fact that the testimony of the other youths in the car, in conjunction with the independent corroborating evidence, could support a conviction in some cases, the reviewing court reversed the conviction. They found that the admission of the hearsay so affected the substantial rights of the accused as to require reversal. In re D.W.L., A Youth, 189 M 267, 615 P2d 887 (1980).

Due Process Required: Statutes regarding juvenile delinquency proceedings contemplate that the formalities of proceedings required by due process be granted and complied with before commitment to the State Industrial School (now Pine Hills Youth Correctional Facility). Proper service and a hearing with representation by counsel, if desired, were not granted in this case, so that commitment was improper. In re Allamaras, 139 M 130, 361 P2d 340 (1961).

Erroneous Conclusion by Youth Court That Consent Decree Admission of Guilt Constitutes or Requires Change of Answer — Court-Compelled "True" Answer at Change of Answer Hearing Not Valid Admission — Youth Did Not Waive Adjudicatory Hearing or Trial Rights in Subsequent Reinstatement of Underlying Delinquency Petition. In re D.A.T., 2022 MT 174, 410 Mont. 1, 517 P.3d 157.

Reinstatement of Petition Sole Remedy Available After Violation of Youth's Consent Decree — Consent Decree Distinguished From Consent Adjustment: A youth entered into a consent decree providing that the youth would be on probation for a year, and the petition against the youth for criminal felony mischief was suspended. The state later filed to revoke the youth's probation and asked that the youth be committed to a detention facility without moving to reinstate the original petition. Erroneously relying on In re Appeal of Cascade County District Court, 2009 MT 355, 353 Mont. 194, 219 P.3d 1255, concerning consent adjustments, a statutorily distinct procedure, the Youth Court entered two dispositional orders finding that the youth had violated the terms of his probation and committing him to a detention facility. The Youth Court erred when it denied the youth's motion to dismiss the state's petition to revoke the youth's probation, because reinstatement of the petition under 41-5-1501 is the sole disposition available when a youth violates the terms of a consent decree since an admission to a consent decree is not the same as a valid admission to charges in a formal petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and vacated the Youth Court's two dispositional orders, holding that the Youth Court did not have the statutory authority to issue them without an admission of guilt and adjudication of the merits of the youth's criminal mischief. Jury Instruction on Purpose of Youth Court Act Improper: The Youth Court's act of instructing a deadlocked jury on the legislative purpose of the Youth Court Act was prejudicial because it introduced the positive impact that a guilty verdict would have on the defendant youth and distracted the jurors from weighing only the elements of the criminal charges. St. v. E.M.R., 2013 MT 3, 368 Mont. 179, 292 P.3d 451.

"Delinquent Youth"— Felony Basis: The Youth Court's finding that the youth had committed a deliberate homicide, although based entirely on circumstantial evidence, was supported by substantial evidence in the record and therefore was sufficient to support a finding that he was a delinquent youth within the meaning of 41-5-103. St. v. Twoteeth, 219 M 101, 711 P2d 789, 42 St. Rep. 1873 (1985).

Burglary Admission — "Delinquent Youth": The Youth Court's finding that the youth had committed a burglary, a charge which the youth admitted and which was supported by the evidence, was sufficient to support a finding that he was a delinquent youth within the meaning of 41-5-103. Procedure to Be Adhered To: A preliminary hearing to determine whether a child is a juvenile delinquent may be conducted informally. A formal hearing, however, is required on a petition to commit a child as a juvenile delinquent. The procedures provided for civil trials must be adhered to, and there must be a stenographic record of evidence presented in juvenile court. In re Gonzalez, 139 M 592, 366 P2d 718 (1961).

When Judge May Determine Facts: Under section 10-603, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), dealing with delinquent children, only when there is no demand for a jury trial or when a jury trial has been waived may a judge determine the facts. Here, where the minor charged with being a delinquent child made a demand for a jury trial at the opening of trial as well as on the day preceding trial, the juvenile court was without jurisdiction to try him without a jury. Case Notes

Consideration of Juvenile's Prior Offenses Proper in Ordering Psychosexual Evaluation Under Youth Court Act: The Youth Court considered a juvenile's prior record in ordering a psychosexual evaluation prior to disposition. On appeal, the youth contended that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), consideration of the prior offenses was error because the prior charges were unrelated to the charges in question. The Supreme Court distinguished Ommundson, a criminal matter, from the present case that was brought under the Montana Youth Court Act and held that Ommundson did not bar the Youth Court from ordering a psychosexual evaluation of the youth that was essential to the youth's appropriate placement. State ex rel. D.M.B. v. District Court, 2004 MT 335, 324 M 190, 103 P3d 514 (2004).

Predispositional Psychosexual Evaluation Without Youth's Consent Authorized Only as Part of Court Disposition — Consideration of Prior Youth Court Offenses Allowed: The Youth Court, over a youth's objection, ordered a psychosexual evaluation for the youth. The specific language of this section controlled over the more general provisions of 41-5-1511. The Supreme Court held that under this section, youths must waive their constitutional rights in order to be subjected to a predispositional medical or psychological evaluation. Thus, the District Court erred in ordering a predispositional psychosexual evaluation over the youth's objection. However, the challenged evaluation was essential to the youth's appropriate placement and to the purposes of the Montana Youth Court Act, so the Supreme Court affirmed. State ex rel. D.M.B. v. Transfer of Youth From Treatment Facility to Department: Given the Youth Court's power under 41-5-523 (renumbered 41-5-1512) to place a youth in the custody of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) and in a youth care facility, the court's order that the youth be transferred automatically from a treatment center to the custody of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) was a proper disposition. The Youth Court held a dispositional hearing and issued an order directing that temporary custody of the youth be placed in the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Corrections) for treatment. The court is not required to hold another hearing before the youth is placed in the custody of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections). St. v. Dispositional Order to Be Supported by Findings: A youth admitted the commission of a burglary, and the evidence strongly supported his admission. The Youth Court ordered that the youth be committed to the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) but did not enter findings of fact supporting its order of commitment. The Supreme Court remanded to the Youth Court for entry of findings. In re V.R.B., 201 M 127, 653 P2d 133, 39 St. Rep. 2001 (1982).

Dispositional Stage — Fitness of Parents: At the dispositional stage the concern for the best interests of the youth and community is paramount. The court need not, therefore, make specific findings as to the fitness of the parents. In re Geary, 172 M 204, 562 P2d 821 (1977).

Due Process: Even though a hearing may be informal, the requirements of due process must be met; where there was no sworn testimony, no proof, no representation by counsel, no proper citation to the parent, and no hearing in fact, an order of commitment to the State Industrial School (now Pine Hills Youth Correctional Facility) was reversible. In re Allamaras, 139 M 130, 361 P2d 340 (1961), explained in In re Gonzalez, 139 M 592, 366 P2d 718 (1961).

An informal trial is improper when the hearing is upon a petition of County Attorney charging a minor child, 16 years of age, with being a delinquent child, which could result in commitment. In re Gonzalez, 139 M 592, 366 P2d 718 (1961).

Stenographic Record of Evidence: Proceeding upon a petition of County Attorney charging minor with being a delinquent child, resulting in commitment of child to the State Industrial School (now Pine Hills Youth Correctional Facility), was remanded to District Court where no stenographic record had been made of the evidence presented in the juvenile court. In re Gonzalez, 139 M 592, 366 P2d 718 (1961).

Application of Section: The prohibition in section 10-611, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), which prohibited the "disposition of a delinquent child or evidence given in the court" from being used as evidence in any other case or proceeding against the child, applies only where the child is a party in a later proceeding; where the child is a witness in a later case, evidence of contradictory statements made in the juvenile court may be used for the purpose of impeachment. (b) A youth may not be held in a state youth correctional facility for a period of time in excess of the maximum period of imprisonment that could be imposed on an adult convicted of the offense or offenses that brought the youth under the jurisdiction of the youth court. This section does not limit the power of the department to enter into an aftercare agreement with the youth pursuant to 52-5-126.

(c) A youth may not be placed in or transferred to a penal institution or other facility used for the execution of sentence of adults convicted of crimes.

(3) A youth placed in a state youth correctional facility or other facility or program operated by the department or who signs an aftercare agreement under 52-5-126 must be supervised by the department. A youth who is placed in any other placement by the department, the youth court, or the youth court's juvenile probation officer must be supervised by the probation officer of the youth court having jurisdiction over the youth under 41-5-205 whether or not the youth is committed to the department. The county determined by the court as the residence of the youth is responsible for the cost of the evaluation, except as provided in subsection (5). A county may contract with the department or other public or private agencies to obtain evaluation services ordered by the court.

(7) An evaluation of a youth may not be performed at the Montana state hospital unless the youth is transferred to the district court under 41-5-206, 41-5-208, or 41-5-1105.

(8) An order of the court may be modified at any time. In the case of a youth committed to the department, an order pertaining to the youth may be modified only upon notice to the department and subsequent hearing.

(9) Whenever the court commits a youth to the department, it shall transmit with the dispositional judgment copies of medical reports, social history material, education records, and any other clinical, predisposition, or other reports and information pertinent to the care and treatment of the youth.

(10) If a youth is committed to the department, the court shall examine the financial ability of the youth's parents or guardians to pay a contribution covering all or part of the costs for the care, commitment, and treatment of the youth, including the costs of necessary medical, dental, and other health care.

(11) If the court determines that the youth's parents or guardians are financially able to pay a contribution as provided in subsection (10), the court shall order the youth's parents or guardians to pay an amount based on the uniform child support guidelines adopted by the department of public health and human services pursuant to 40-5-209.

(12) (a) Except as provided in subsection (12)(b), contributions ordered under this section and each modification of an existing order are enforceable by immediate or delinquency income withholding, or both, under Title 40, chapter 5, part 4. An order for contribution that is inconsistent with this section is nevertheless subject to withholding for the payment of the contribution without need for an amendment of the support order or for any further action by the court.

(b) A court-ordered exception from contributions under this section must be in writing and be included in the order. An exception from the immediate income withholding requirement may be granted if the court finds there is:

(i) good cause not to require immediate income withholding; or

(ii) an alternative arrangement between the department and the person who is ordered to pay contributions.

(c) A finding of good cause not to require immediate income withholding must, at a minimum, be based upon:

(i) a written determination and explanation by the court of the reasons why the implementation of immediate income withholding is not in the best interests of the youth; and

(ii) proof of timely payment of previously ordered support in cases involving modification of contributions ordered under this section.

(d) An alternative arrangement must:

(i) provide sufficient security to ensure compliance with the arrangement;

(ii) be in writing and be signed by a representative of the department and the person required to make contributions; and

(iii) if approved by the court, be entered into the record of the proceeding.

(13) Upon a showing of a change in the financial ability of the youth's parents or guardians to pay, the court may modify its order for the payment of contributions required under subsection (11).

(14) (a) If the court orders the payment of contributions under this section, the department shall apply to the department of public health and human services for support enforcement services pursuant to Title IV-D of the Social Security Act.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 375, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, the Legislature finds that the danger of recidivism posed by sexual and violent offenders and the protection of the public from these offenders is of paramount concern to government and the people; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature further finds that law enforcement agencies' efforts to protect their communities, conduct investigations, and apprehend sexual and violent offenders is impaired by the lack of information about offenders who live within their jurisdictions; and

WHEREAS, the system of registering sexual and violent offenders provides law enforcement with information critical to preventing victimization and to resolving incidents of sexual or violent offenses promptly, including notification of the public when necessary to the continued protection of the community; and

WHEREAS, persons who have committed a sexual or violent offense have a reduced expectation of privacy because of the public's interest in safety; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature finds that releasing information about sexual or violent offenders to law enforcement agencies and, under certain circumstances, providing access to limited information about certain sexual offenders to the general public will further the primary governmental interest of protecting specific vulnerable groups and the public in general from potential harm.

THEREFORE, it is the policy of the State of Montana to assist local law enforcement agencies' efforts in protecting their communities by requiring that sexual or violent offenders register and to authorize the release of necessary and relevant information about sex offenders to the public."

Repealer: Section 15, Ch. 14, Sp. L. June 1986, also repealed sections 53-21-164, 53-21-501, 53-21-502, and 53-21-505, effective upon the sale.

1985 Amendments: Chapter 531 inserted (7) relating to placement in out-of-state treatment facility.

Chapter 612 in (2) near end, after "youths", deleted "except that if the evaluation is to be done at the Montana youth treatment center, the commitment provisions of 53-21-505 must be followed and no evaluation of a youth may be done at Montana state hospital"; inserted (3) through (6) relating to an evaluation to determine whether a youth is seriously mentally ill; and deleted former (6) that read: "Except as provided in 53-21-507, if the custody of a youth is transferred to the department of institutions under subsection (1), the youth may not be committed to the Montana youth treatment center unless the commitment provisions of 53-21-505 are followed."

1983 Amendments: Chapter 129, after (1)(e), inserted "or"; and in (4), inserted second sentence relating to modification of court order.

Chapter 233 deleted former (2)(b), which read: "in the case of a delinquent youth 16 years or older whom the court considers a suitable person for placement at a youth forest camp, notify the director of the department of institutions of the finding. The director of the department of institutions shall then designate to the court the facility to which the youth shall be delivered for evaluation. The court may then commit the youth to the department of institutions for a period not to exceed 45 days for the purpose of evaluation as to the youth's suitability for placement and order the youth delivered for evaluation to the youth facility designated by the director. If after the evaluation the department of institutions reports to the court that such child is suitable for placement in a youth forest camp and if there is space available at a camp, the court may then commit such child directly to the youth forest camp under the terms of commitment of this chapter. If the department of institutions reports and states the reasons to the court why the youth is not suitable for placement, the youth shall be returned to the court for such further disposition as the court may consider advisable under the provisions of this chapter. The costs of transporting the youth to the designated youth facility for evaluation and cost of returning the youth to the court shall be borne by the county of residence of the youth."; and at end of (3), deleted "except as provided by subsection (2)(b)".

Chapter 363, at end of (2), inserted exception clause and Ch. 361 substituted "Montana state hospital" for "Warm Springs state hospital" in that clause; Ch. 363 inserted (6).

Chapter 465 made the following changes: in (1)(b), substituted present language for "place in a licensed foster home or a home approved by the court"; at end of (1)(c), deleted "including but not limited to a district youth guidance home"; and at end of (1)(e), deleted "consistent with subsection (1)(d) of this section".

Case Notes

Reinstatement of Petition Sole Remedy Available After Violation of Youth's Consent Decree — Consent Decree Distinguished From Consent Adjustment: A youth entered into a consent decree providing that the youth would be on probation for a year, and the petition against the youth for criminal felony mischief was suspended. The state later filed to revoke the youth's probation and asked that the youth be committed to a detention facility without moving to reinstate the original petition. Erroneously relying on In re Appeal of Cascade County District Court, 2009 MT 355, 353 Mont. 194, 219 P.3d 1255, concerning consent adjustments, a statutorily distinct procedure, the Youth Court entered two dispositional orders finding that the youth had violated the terms of his probation and committing him to a detention facility. The Youth Court erred when it denied the youth's motion to dismiss the state's petition to revoke the youth's probation, because reinstatement of the petition under 41-5-1501 is the sole disposition available when a youth violates the terms of a consent decree since an admission to a consent decree is not the same as a valid admission to charges in a formal petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and vacated the Youth Court's two dispositional orders, holding that the Youth Court did not have the statutory authority to issue them without an admission of guilt and adjudication of the merits of the youth's criminal mischief. In re C.L., 2021 MT 294, 406 Mont. 258, 498 P.3d 758.

Revocation of Youth Commitment and Commitment to DOC Proper: The Youth Court revoked a youth's commitment to Youth Court for private, out-of-home placement and committed him to the Department of Corrections for placement at a state youth correctional facility. The youth claimed the revocation was illegal because he was not on probation. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the revocation. The court acknowledged that the youth was not technically on probation; however, he was subject to mandatory supervision. The court also noted that the youth was not amenable to supervision even though the Youth Court had provided him with every reasonable opportunity to succeed under his originally imposed court placement and therefore the commitment to the Department of Corrections was warranted. In re K.J.R., 2017 MT 45, 386 Mont. 381, 391 P.3d 71.

District Court's Continued Imposition of House Arrest Upheld After Youth Court Transfer Upheld: The Youth Court and the District Court did not err in imposing house arrest with restrictive conditions on the appellant pending a final disposition of his case. Pursuant to the Youth Court's order, the appellant was no longer under Department of Corrections supervision once he turned 18 years old. However, pursuant to 41-5-203, the Youth Court had jurisdiction over the appellant until he turned 21 or until it transferred jurisdiction to the District Court. Once the appellant's case was transferred to it, the District Court had the authority to impose conditions consistent with the underlying Youth Court disposition, and continuation of the appellant's house arrest in keeping with the Youth Court's order was consistent with the underlying Youth Court disposition order. In re J.W., 2016 MT 330, 386 Mont. 1, 387 P.3d 195.

Youth Offender Jointly and Severally Liable for Restitution Award — Failure to Consider Youth's Ability to Pay — Plain Error Warranting New Restitution Hearing: At his plea hearing, the youth defendant admitted to having committed criminal mischief as part of a common scheme, in violation of 45-6-101 and 45-2-101. The youth admitted his participation in 2 nights of vandalism, causing $16,020.63 in damages, out of 11 total nights of vandalism, worth total damages of $78,702.09. At the restitution hearing, the Youth Court held the youth jointly and severally liable for the entire $78,702.09 without inquiring into the extent of the youth's assets or prospects for future earnings. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that it was plain error for the Youth Court to fail to consider the youth's ability to pay the restitution. The Supreme Court took up the issue sua sponte because the error implicated the youth's fundamental constitutional rights under Article II, sec. 15, Mont. Const., as a youth in the Youth Court system faces a different disposition and therefore is not similarly situated to an adult who commits the same offense. Additionally, the criminal mischief statute at 45-6-101(2) expressly requires the court to impose restitution only after fully considering the convicted person's ability to pay. The Supreme Court held that the Youth Court's failure to consider the youth's ability to pay raised questions of the fundamental fairness of the proceedings against him and remanded for a new restitution hearing to consider the youth's ability to pay the full amount of restitution. In re K.E.G., 2013 MT 82, 369 Mont. 375, 298 P.3d 1151.

Statute Reasonably Related to Purposes of Youth Court Act — Constitutionality Affirmed: A consent adjustment without petition is an informal tool used by a probation officer when a youth is alleged to have violated the law but the officer does not believe it would be in the best interests of the youth, the family, and the public to file a formal petition. In this case, a youth contended that the provision of 41-5-1512 that allows a consent adjustment without petition violated due process by allowing the state and the Youth Court to proceed from an informal consent adjustment to formal revocation and disposition without requiring the filing of formal charges and without assurances that the youth's admission of violation was voluntary, knowing, and intelligent. The Supreme Court disagreed. Permitting the Youth Court to enforce the violation of informal consent adjustments without requiring a petition or finding that the youth is delinquent or in need of intervention has a reasonable and rational relationship to the express purposes of the Youth Court Act. The Act is designed to promote the welfare of the youth, and the disposition of a youth without going through formal proceedings is designed as a consistent, enforceable, and avoidable consequence of the youth's failure to comply with the terms of the agreement, rather than as a punitive measure. The youth failed to prove that 41-5-1512 was unconstitutional beyond a reasonable doubt, and the Supreme Court affirmed the statute's constitutionality. In re Cause No. CDJ 08-0133(A), 2009 MT 355, 353 M 194, 219 P3d 1255 (2009).

Failure to Preserve Question of Constitutionality of Youth Court Procedure — Appeal Dismissed: Two youths who entered an informal consent adjustment without petition later violated the consent adjustments and the state petitioned to revoke the consent adjustments. Following a hearing at which the youths admitted the violations, the Youth Court revoked the consent adjustments and proceeded to formal disposition under 41-5-1512. The youths appealed on grounds that 41-5-1512 was unconstitutional on its face and as applied because it allowed formal revocation and disposition based on admissions made through informal involuntary means and that without a formal charging petition, the informal admissions were effectively equated as formal admissions or as findings that the youths were in need of intervention, which relieved the state of its burden of proof. The Supreme Court declined to reach the constitutionality question because the argument was not properly preserved for appeal through a sufficiently specific objection. In re B.I. & N.G., 2009 MT 350, 353 M 183, 218 P3d 1235 (2009). See also St. v. Benson, 1999 MT 324, 297 M 321, 992 P2d 831 (1999).

Restitution Owing Under Youth Court Act — Market Value Versus Replacement Cost — Deduction of Salvage Value From Restitution Amount: T.M.R., a youth, stole a vehicle from his friend's parents' garage and went for a joyride. The vehicle was destroyed, and the youth was placed on probation and ordered to pay restitution. The parties disagreed on the amount of restitution owed. The Supreme Court noted that prior to the 2003 amendments to adult sentencing statutes, restitution was consistently based on market value if it could be ascertained. Unlike the adult sentencing statutes, the Montana Youth Court Act was not amended in 2003 to include replacement cost as a way to determine restitution. Thus, the court concluded that the more equitable and consistent approach to determine restitution under the Act was to measure damages based on market value. The court noted that the victims received $500 in salvage value for the vehicle and also held that the restitution amount should be reduced by the amount of salvage received. In re T.M.R., 2006 MT 246, 334 M 64, 144 P3d 809 (2006).

No Authority of Youth Court to Order Youth to Pay Restitution Past Age of Majority: In 2000, a 12-year-old who admitted sexually assaulting an 8-year-old was adjudicated a delinquent youth by the Youth Court and placed on probation until age 18. Probation conditions included payment of restitution and the costs of the victim's therapy. In 2003, the Youth Court was notified by a restitution officer that a therapist had advised that counseling for the victim and the victim's mother was complete and that the restitution amount owed was $4,507.53; however, no restitution hearing was held. Nevertheless, the state and the youth's parents executed a restitution agreement specifying that the youth was liable for payment of restitution and identifying $4,507.53 as the total restitution due. The Youth Court signed the 2003 agreement, and $4,507.53 was subsequently paid in full. In 2005, the state requested a restitution hearing, noting that the victim's mother had submitted additional restitution claims of $4,352.93 for therapeutic sports activity for the victim and $8,309.25 for university schooling costs for the mother. At a hearing held 2 days before the end of the youth's probation, the Youth Court claimed jurisdiction over the youth for financial purposes until the youth turned 21 and ordered the youth to pay $12,662.18 in additional restitution to cover the mother's claims for sports and school-related costs. The youth appealed on grounds that the Youth Court had no authority to order additional restitution, and the Supreme Court reversed. The Youth Court limited its retention of jurisdiction beyond the youth's 18th birthday to enforcement of financial obligations set forth in the original disposition order and in the 2003 agreement establishing the total restitution to be paid by the youth. Therefore, the Youth Court did not have jurisdiction to impose additional restitution in a stand-alone order after the youth's probation, of which payment of restitution was a condition, expired, and the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to vacate the order for additional restitution. (See 2023 amendment to 41-5-205.) In re K.D.K., 2006 MT 187, 333 M 100, 141 P3d 1212 (2006), distinguished in In re T.M.L., 2012 MT 9, 363 Mont. 304, 268 P.3d 1255, and in In re S.M.K.-S.H., 2012 MT 281, 367 Mont. 176, 290 P.3d 718, in which the Supreme Court upheld a Youth Court order extending the youth's probation period at a revocation hearing when the original probation had not terminated.

Consideration of Juvenile's Prior Offenses Proper in Ordering Psychosexual Evaluation Under Youth Court Act: The Youth Court considered a juvenile's prior record in ordering a psychosexual evaluation prior to disposition. On appeal, the youth contended that under St. v. Ommundson, 1999 MT 16, 293 M 133, 974 P2d 620 (1999), consideration of the prior offenses was error because the prior charges were unrelated to the charges in question. The Supreme Court distinguished Ommundson, a criminal matter, from the present case that was brought under the Montana Youth Court Act and held that Ommundson did not bar the Youth Court from ordering a psychosexual evaluation of the youth that was essential to the youth's appropriate placement. State ex rel. D.M.B. v. District Court, 2004 MT 335, 324 M 190, 103 P3d 514 (2004).

Predispositional Psychosexual Evaluation Without Youth's Consent Authorized Only as Part of Court Disposition — Consideration of Prior Youth Court Offenses Allowed: The Youth Court, over a youth's objection, ordered a psychosexual evaluation for the youth. The specific language of 41-5-1503 controlled over the more general provisions of 41-5-1511. The Supreme Court held that under 41-5-1503, youths must waive their constitutional rights in order to be subjected to a predispositional medical or psychological evaluation. Thus, the District Court erred in ordering a predispositional psychosexual evaluation over the youth's objection. However, the challenged evaluation was essential to the youth's appropriate placement and to the purposes of the Montana Youth Court Act, so the Supreme Court affirmed. State ex rel. D.M.B. v. District Court, 2004 MT 335, 324 M 190, 103 P3d 514 (2004).

Transfer of Youth Court Case to District Court Not Violative of Minor's Constitutional Rights: Spina argued that the statute allowing transfer of her Youth Court case to the District Court resulted in violation of her rights under Art. II, sec. 15, Mont. Const., which guarantees to minors the same fundamental rights afforded to adults, and under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., which guarantees the right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court considered alleged violations of the right against self-incrimination, the right to effective assistance of counsel, the right to a fair trial, and the right to a presumption of innocence, finding that Spina's arguments were without merit. The transfer statute did not violate Spina's constitutional rights. St. v. Spina, 1999 MT 113, 294 M 367, 982 P2d 421, 56 St. Rep. 467 (1999).

Placement of Youth With Noncustodial Parent as Condition of Probation Reversed: A.Z.Y. was found by the Youth Court to be a delinquent youth, was placed on probation under the supervision of the Youth Court Probation Department, and, as a condition of probation under this section (formerly 41-5-523), was released to the custody of his father with the condition that he live with his father in Seattle, Washington. The Supreme Court held that A.Z.Y.'s father's home was not A.Z.Y.'s home within the meaning of this section (formerly 41-5-523) and that as a result of 1987 amendments to the Montana Youth Court Act, the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) was to control the placement of a delinquent youth placed other than in the youth's home. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that the Youth Court exceeded its authority in placing A.Z.Y. in his father's home as a condition of probation. In re A.Z.G., 273 M 525, 905 P2d 1098, 52 St. Rep. 1108 (1995).

Statute Not Vague or Unconstitutionally Broad: This section (formerly 41-5-523) is not unconstitutionally broad on its face in giving the power to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) to make placements of youth committed to its custody and care by a Youth Court. Further, this section (formerly 41-5-523) clearly outlines the options and limitations in disposition available to a Youth Court and clearly places limits on the Department in its placement and rehabilitation of youth committed to its custody and care; therefore, the statute is not vague. In re T.A.S., 244 M 259, 797 P2d 217, 47 St. Rep. 1590 (1990).

Youth Properly Adjudicated Delinquent Improperly Committed to Correctional Facility: H.F. violated the terms of her probation by violating curfew and using alcohol. She was adjudged a delinquent youth and placed in the custody of the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) until age 19. H.F. was also placed in a youth correctional facility on the basis of being a serious juvenile offender. The Supreme Court held that the youth had properly been designated a delinquent youth and placed in the Department's custody. However, the acts that constituted a violation of her probation were not the serious acts set out in the statutory definition of a serious juvenile offender. Therefore, the Youth Court was without authority to place her in a correctional facility. In re H.F., 242 M 381, 791 P2d 53, 47 St. Rep. 826 (1990).

Youth Incorrectly Placed in Correctional Facility: H.F.'s mother filed a complaint charging the youth with ungovernable behavior. H.F. entered into a consent agreement that established 13 rules of probation. The youth subsequently violated several of the rules, was adjudicated a delinquent youth, was committed to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) until the age of 19, and was ordered placed in a secure correctional facility. The Supreme Court ruled that although the youth was correctly designated delinquent, her only offenses were status offenses. Under this section (formerly 41-5-523), because she could not be imprisoned for the violations, she could not be placed in a correctional facility. In re H.F., 242 M 381, 791 P2d 53, 47 St. Rep. 757 (1990).

Commitment to Pine Hills Remanded — Lack of Alcohol Dependency Treatment Program: Based on curfew violations, the District Court ordered a youth committed to Pine Hills School (now Pine Hills Youth Correctional Facility) for the protection of the public and its property. However, the record showed the youth needed alcohol dependency treatment, which was unavailable at Pine Hills. The Supreme Court reversed the commitment and remanded for consideration of a less restrictive alternative that would allow for treatment. In re J.F., 241 M 434, 787 P2d 364, 47 St. Rep. 420 (1990).

No Absolute Right to Counsel at Placement Hearing — Due Process: A delinquent youth was not denied due process when, pursuant to this section (formerly 41-5-523), he was placed in a youth incarceration facility without an adversarial hearing to decide his placement. Beyond commitment of the youth by the Youth Court, the delinquent youth has no absolute right to counsel at the placement hearing. However, the youth is not without due process rights at the hearing stage. A youth placement committee created by 41-5-525 (renumbered 41-5-121) makes a recommendation to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections), which can accept or reject the recommendation under 41-5-527 (renumbered 41-5-123, now repealed). In addition, the Youth Court can modify that decision if placement is not in the best interests of the child. In re Peterson, 235 M 313, 767 P2d 319, 46 St. Rep. 13 (1989).

Separation of Powers — Commitment by Youth Court: Pursuant to this section (formerly 41-5-523), the Youth Court committed a delinquent youth to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) for placement in an appropriate facility. The youth appealed the placement, contending that the judiciary is the proper decisionmaking body for the placement of delinquent youths. In response to the youth's allegation that it is a violation of the separation of powers clause of the state constitution for the Department to make the placement decision, the Supreme Court held that there is no violation because the statute provides authority to the Youth Court to decide the commitment of delinquent youths and youths in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention) and that authority is not diminished through granting the Department placement power. The court has the authority to review the placement decision to determine if it is in the best interests of the minor. In re Peterson, 235 M 313, 767 P2d 319, 46 St. Rep. 13 (1989).

Transfer of Youth From Treatment Facility to Department: Given the Youth Court's power under 41-5-523 (renumbered 41-5-1512) to place a youth in the custody of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) and in a youth care facility, the court's order that the youth be transferred automatically from a treatment center to the custody of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections) was a proper disposition. The Youth Court held a dispositional hearing and issued an order directing that temporary custody of the youth be placed in the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Corrections) for treatment. The court is not required to hold another hearing before the youth is placed in the custody of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Corrections). St. v. Twoteeth, 219 M 101, 711 P2d 789, 42 St. Rep. 1873 (1985).

Youth Not Denied Equal Protection by Sentencing System More Severe Than System Imposed on Adults: A youth has not been denied her right to equal protection of the law by imposition of a term of commitment upon her that is longer than the criminal sentence an adult would receive for the same act. Adults and minors are not similarly situated with respect to state sentencing laws because: (1) the purpose of their detention is not the same, that of the adult offender being both retributional and rehabilitational; and (2) the physical liberty interests of minors and adults are qualitatively different. In re C.S., 210 M 144, 687 P2d 57, 41 St. Rep. 970 (1984), followed in In re T.A.S., 244 M 259, 797 P2d 217, 47 St. Rep. 1590 (1990), and In re S.M.K.-S.H., 2012 MT 281, 367 Mont. 176, 290 P.3d 718.

Attorney General's Opinions

Indigent Youth Entitled to Counsel — Reimbursement: When a petition is filed initiating proceedings under the Montana Youth Court Act, a youth is entitled to court-appointed counsel when the youth is indigent and the youth's parents have sufficient financial resources but refuse to employ counsel. A Youth Court may order reimbursement from nonindigent parents for expenses associated with court-appointed counsel. 42 A.G. Op. 88 (1988).

Commitment Procedures to Be Followed in Committing Mentally Ill Youth — Private Mental Health Facilities Not Precluded: This section (formerly 41-5-523) does not authorize the Youth Court or the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) to commit a mentally ill or seriously mentally ill youth to a mental health treatment facility without following the commitment procedures set out in Title 53, ch. 21, part 1. There is, however, no statutory preclusion of commitment of a youth to private mental health facilities. 42 A.G. Op. 59 (1988).

2001 Amendment: Chapter 587 in (1)(b) near beginning of first sentence substituted "41-5-1512(1)(o)(i)" for "41-5-1512(15)(a)" and inserted third sentence providing that provisions of 41-5-355 relating to alternative placements apply to placements under subsection (1)(b); inserted (3) prohibiting court from ordering local government entity to pay for care, treatment, intervention, or placement, but allowing order for local government entity to pay for evaluation and in-state transportation of youth; and inserted (4) prohibiting court from ordering state government entity from paying for care, treatment, intervention, placement, or evaluation that results in account deficit for district without cost containment review panel approval. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

Severability: Section 24, Ch. 587, L. 2001, was a severability clause.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 532 in (1)(b) at beginning of first sentence inserted "subject to 41-5-1504, 41-5-1512(15)(a), and 41-5-1522" and at end substituted "and recommend to the department that the youth not be released until the youth reaches 18 years of age" for "or in a correctional facility or a program operated by the department" and inserted second sentence concerning placement of youth adjudicated delinquent; deleted former (1)(c) that read: "(c) subject to 41-5-1504, 41-5-1512(15)(a), and 41-5-1522, sentence a youth to one of the state youth correctional facilities established under 52-5-101 and, as part of the sentence, deny the youth eligibility for release without the express approval of the sentencing judge until the youth reaches

18 years of age. A youth may not be sentenced to a state youth correctional facility unless the department informs the judge that space is available for the youth at that facility. Except as provided in subsection (2), the sentencing judge may not place limitations on the release unless recommended by the youth placement committee. The court may not place a youth adjudicated delinquent in a state youth correctional facility for an offense that would be a misdemeanor if committed by an adult, unless the court finds that the youth presents a danger to public safety and that the placement is recommended by a mental health professional after evaluation of the youth"; near end of first clause of (1)(c) substituted "sexual or violent offender" for "sex offender"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Intervention in Delinquency Pilot Program: Section 73, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was not codified in the MCA because of its temporary nature. Under this section, the Department of Corrections is to gather information regarding the placement of youthful offenders and present a proposal to the 56th Legislature.

Saving Clause: Section 79, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

Severability: Section 80, Ch. 550, L. 1997, was a severability clause.

Effective Date: Section 81, Ch. 550, L. 1997, provided that this section is effective July 1, 1997.

Revocation of Youth Commitment and Commitment to DOC Proper: The Youth Court revoked a youth's commitment to Youth Court for private, out-of-home placement and committed him to the Department of Corrections for placement at a state youth correctional facility. The youth claimed the revocation was illegal because he was not on probation. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the revocation. The court acknowledged that the youth was not technically on probation; however, he was subject to mandatory supervision. The court also noted that the youth was not amenable to supervision even though the Youth Court had provided him with every reasonable opportunity to succeed under his originally imposed court placement and therefore the commitment to the Department of Corrections was warranted. In re K.J.R., 2017 MT 45, 386 Mont. 381, 391 P.3d 71.

Youth Offender Jointly and Severally Liable for Restitution Award — Failure to Consider Youth's Ability to Pay — Plain Error Warranting New Restitution Hearing: At his plea hearing, the youth defendant admitted to having committed criminal mischief as part of a common scheme, in violation of 45-6-101 and 45-2-101. The youth admitted his participation in 2 nights of vandalism, causing $16,020.63 in damages, out of 11 total nights of vandalism, worth total damages of $78,702.09. At the restitution hearing, the Youth Court held the youth jointly and severally liable for the entire $78,702.09 without inquiring into the extent of the youth's assets or prospects for future earnings. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that it was plain error for the Youth Court to fail to consider the youth's ability to pay the restitution. The Supreme Court took up the issue sua sponte because the error implicated the youth's fundamental constitutional rights under Article II, sec. 15, Mont. Const., as a youth in the Youth Court system faces a different disposition and therefore is not similarly situated to an adult who commits the same offense. Additionally, the criminal mischief statute at 45-6-101(2) expressly requires the court to impose restitution only after fully considering the convicted person's ability to pay. The Supreme Court held that the Youth Court's failure to consider the youth's ability to pay raised questions of the fundamental fairness of the proceedings against him and remanded for a new restitution hearing to consider the youth's ability to pay the full amount of restitution. Youth Court Authority to Place Youth in Facility Following Fourth and Fifth Misdemeanors Within Twelve Months: K.M.G. appeared before the Youth Court on fourth and fifth misdemeanor charges after violating his conditions of probation. The Youth Court found K.M.G. to be a delinquent youth and sentenced him to placement at a youth correctional facility. K.M.G. contended on appeal that the placement was in error because none of the statutory placement criteria in 41-5-1513 was met. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that: K.M.G. committed four or more misdemeanors during the prior 12 months; he waived his objection as to the appropriateness of the mental health professional who performed his evaluation; and the Youth Court's order was supported by sufficient evidence adequately demonstrating K.M.G.'s dangerousness to the public, including K.M.G.'s history of noncompliance with parental, school, law enforcement, and probationary rules and authority, as well as criminal and violent behaviors. In re K.M.G., 2010 MT 81, 356 Mont. 91, 229 P.3d 1227.

Registration of Youth Sex Offender in Public Interest: Following a youth's adjudication as a sex offender, the probation officer notified the youth that he was required to register as an offender pursuant to this section. The youth registered but then moved the District Court to delete the registration requirement. The court held two hearings on the issue, allowing the youth to present evidence and witnesses to support the claim, but held that the youth was required to register. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The youth failed to demonstrate sufficient mitigating factors to establish that the registration requirement imposed by the court would not be in the public's best interest. In re C.D.H., 2009 MT 8, 349 M 1, 201 P3d 126 (2009).

Youth Court Adjudication Not Considered Conviction — No Authority to Require Adjudicated Youth to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender Under Pre-2007 Law: In 1998, 16-year-old Hastings was adjudicated a delinquent youth in Youth Court, admitting one offense of sexual intercourse without consent, and was committed to the Department of Corrections (DOC). When Hastings turned 18 in 2000, his case was transferred to District Court until age 25 based on the parties' stipulation that Hastings had not completed sex offender treatment or paid restitution and was at high risk to reoffend. The District Court then determined that Hastings had violated the conditions of the Youth Court order and committed Hastings to the DOC and also required that Hastings register as a level 2 sex offender. Hastings initially registered as a sex offender, but failed to update registration after moving and was subsequently charged with failure to maintain registration. Hastings moved to dismiss the charge, asserting that he had not been convicted of a sexual offense and that neither the commitment order nor statutes required him to register after discharging his sentence. The motion was denied, and Hastings appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Although the Youth Court had the authority to require sex offender registration pursuant to this section, no requirement was made in this case. Because the Youth Court adjudication did not constitute a conviction, the District Court could not impose registration requirements under 46-18-201. (Note that the 2007 Legislature amended 46-23-502 to include an adjudicated youth in the definition of a sexual or violent offender.) The District Court's opinion that this section suggests a wholesale incorporation of sexual offender registry into the Montana Youth Court Act was erroneous, and absent statutory authority, a court may not impose a registration requirement. Failure to grant Hastings' motion to dismiss was error, and the case was remanded for dismissal. St. v. Hastings, 2007 MT 294, 340 M 1, 171 P3d 726 (2007), distinguishing St. v. Mount, 2003 MT 275, 317 M 481, 78 P3d 829 (2003), and St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

Restitution Owing Under Youth Court Act — Market Value Versus Replacement Cost — Deduction of Salvage Value From Restitution Amount: T.M.R., a youth, stole a vehicle from his friend's parents' garage and went for a joyride. The vehicle was destroyed, and the youth was placed on probation and ordered to pay restitution. The parties disagreed on the amount of restitution owed. The Supreme Court noted that prior to the 2003 amendments to adult sentencing statutes, restitution was consistently based on market value if it could be ascertained. Unlike the adult sentencing statutes, the Montana Youth Court Act was not amended in 2003 to include replacement cost as a way to determine restitution. Thus, the court concluded that the more equitable and consistent approach to determine restitution under the Act was to measure damages based on market value. The court noted that the victims received $500 in salvage value for the vehicle and also held that the restitution amount should be reduced by the amount of salvage received. In re T.M.R., 2006 MT 246, 334 M 64, 144 P3d 809 (2006).

Washington Youth Sexual Offender Required to Register as Sexual or Violent Offender if Residing in Montana: At age 15, Villanueva was adjudicated guilty of first degree rape in Washington state and was later required to register for life in that state as a sexual offender. Villanueva subsequently moved to Montana where he resided for 6 weeks. After being arrested for a domestic disturbance, it was discovered that Villanueva had not registered as a sexual or violent offender in Montana, and he was charged with failure to register. Villanueva contended that Montana law did not apply to his Washington registration requirement because he did not meet the definition of sexual or violent offender under 46-23-502 and because a 1989 Attorney General's opinion held that juveniles adjudicated delinquent under the Montana Youth Court Act whose cases have not been transferred to District Court are not required to register. Villanueva moved to dismiss the charge, but the District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the Washington definition of sexual offender may not have been identical to the Montana definition, Villanueva was nevertheless a sexual offender under Washington law and was therefore required to register in Montana under 46-23-504. Further, Villanueva could not rely on the Attorney General's opinion because he was not adjudicated under the Montana Youth Court Act. The Supreme Court noted that the Washington sexual offender registration law also required Villanueva to register in another state if he changed state residency, so under both Washington and Montana law, Villanueva was required to register as a sexual offender. Villanueva's motion to dismiss was properly denied. St. v. Villanueva, 2005 MT 192, 328 M 135, 118 P3d 179 (2005).

Calculation of Restitution — No Joint and Several Liability for Restitution for 11-Day Vandalism Spree When Youth Participated Only 2 Days: A youth pleaded guilty to participating in 2 nights of an 11-day vandalism spree. The judge ordered that he was jointly and severally liable for the amount of damage caused throughout the entire spree, which exceeded $70,000. The youth argued he should be ordered to pay restitution for only the damages caused during the 2 days instead because the state did not establish his accountability for the vandalism that occurred during the other 9 days of the spree. The state argued it did not have to establish his accountability under the criminal mischief statutes for each day of the spree. The youth appealed to the Supreme Court, which agreed with the youth that the state was required to prove his accountability for the acts of others. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court's order of restitution and remanded for a recalculation of restitution for the 2 days on which the youth participated in the acts of vandalism. Revocation of Youth Commitment and Commitment to DOC Proper: The Youth Court revoked a youth's commitment to Youth Court for private, out-of-home placement and committed him to the Department of Corrections for placement at a state youth correctional facility. The youth claimed the revocation was illegal because he was not on probation. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the revocation. The court acknowledged that the youth was not technically on probation; however, he was subject to mandatory supervision. No Error in Failure to Specify Length of Youth Commitment: The Youth Court committed K.M.G. to the custody of the Department of Corrections until K.M.G. reached age 18 or was released sooner by the Department. K.M.G. contended that the commitment order was invalid because it failed to limit the maximum time of commitment. The Supreme Court held that the commitment order was valid. Pursuant to 41-5-1522, K.M.G. could be committed only for the maximum period that could be imposed on an adult convicted of the same offenses. Thus, there was nothing illegal in leaving the specific determination of the length of his placement to the Department. In re K.M.G., 2010 MT 81, 356 Mont. 91, 229 P.3d 1227.

Youth Pleading True to Trespass — Motion to Dismiss for Lack of Probable Cause Properly Denied: K.J. received several citations for trespassing on housing authority property after receiving notice that he was not allowed on the property. K.J. argued in Youth Court that the notice should be voided because it was insufficient to alert K.J. of the potentially criminal nature of his conduct and that there was thus insufficient probable cause for conviction of the trespass charges. K.J. subsequently pleaded true to the charges and appealed. The Supreme Court initially declined to address K.J.'s constitutional due process argument because the issue was not raised in the Youth Court. The court then noted that K.J. read and signed the notice and later admitted through a plea agreement that he had trespassed and knew that he was barred from entering the property. The Youth Court correctly determined that probable cause existed to present a question of fact for the jury as to whether K.J. knowingly entered the property at a time when he could be arrested for unlawful entry, and because K.J. chose to plead true to the charges rather than present evidence to a jury, the Youth Court properly denied K.J.'s motion to dismiss for lack of probable cause. Part Case Notes

Unconstitutionality of Act Requires Striking of Adult and Juvenile Dispositions: W.G. pleaded guilty to several felony charges. The District Court adjudicated W.G., a delinquent youth under 45-5-103, and found on its own motion that 41-5-1102, et seq. (renumbered Title 41, ch. 5, part 16), the Extended Jurisdiction Prosecution Act (EJPA), applied to the case of W.G. Accordingly, the District Court sentenced W.G. as a minor to the custody of the Department of Corrections until his 21st birthday under supervised probation, required that he attend a chemical dependency program, and required that he pay one-half the total restitution and that W.G.'s mother pay the other one-half of the restitution. The District Court then sentenced W.G. as an adult to 5 concurrent years on each of two counts and stayed the execution of those sentences on condition of no new offenses. Because the Supreme Court held in In re S.L.M., 287 M 23, 951 P2d 1365 (1997), that the EJPA was unconstitutional, the state argued that both minor and adult adjudications must be vacated and the case remanded for resentencing, while W.G.'s counsel argued that the adult adjudication only must be struck and that the juvenile adjudication must be implemented. The Supreme Court held that, in as much as the juvenile adjudication was made in conjunction with and in contemplation of the adult adjudication, both adjudications must be stricken and that W.G. must be resentenced. In re W.G., 1999 MT 2, 293 M 16, 973 P2d 217, 56 St. Rep. 9 (1999).

Imposition of Both Juvenile and Adult Sentences — Level of Constitutional Scrutiny: Imposition of both juvenile and adult sentences under the Extended Jurisdiction Prosecution Act infringed upon the juvenile's physical liberty. Physical liberty is a fundamental right under the Montana Constitution. Therefore, the court must apply strict scrutiny analysis to the claim that the Act violates the Montana Constitution's equal protection and rights of minors clauses by subjecting the juvenile to a longer period of incarceration than an adult committing the same offense, and there must be a compelling state interest sufficient to justify the Act. In re S.L.M., 287 M 23, 951 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1480 (1997).

Unconstitutional to Impose Both a Juvenile and an Adult Sentence Upon Youth: The 1995 amendments to the purpose section of the Montana Youth Court Act made the Act espouse much more preventative, if not punitive, goals because the Act was amended to seek to prevent delinquency through imposition of enforceable and immediate consequences upon juveniles and to establish programs of detention and community protection. Obviously, it is no longer accurate to reason, as the Supreme Court did in In re C.H., 210 M 184, 683 P2d 931 (1984), that the Act's infringements upon juveniles' physical liberty are legitimate means of enhancing their protections within the meaning of Art. II, sec. 15, Mont. Const., providing that minors have all the fundamental rights of Art. II unless specifically precluded by laws that enhance the protection of minors. Moreover, it is no longer accurate to state, as the court did in In re C.S., 210 M 144, 687 P2d 57 (1984), that a Youth Court disposition is strictly for rehabilitation, not retribution. Indeed, the Extended Jurisdiction Prosecution Act (EJPA), by requiring the Youth Court to impose an adult sentence in addition to a juvenile sentence, with the adult portion stayed pending successful completion of the juvenile portion, goes beyond mere rehabilitation of a juvenile and injects the specter of retribution. Thus, the EJPA, on its face, violates the equal protection clause of Art. II, sec. 4, Mont. Const., by treating juveniles more harshly than adults. The EJPA also violates Art. II, sec. 15, by reducing, rather than enhancing, juveniles' rights as compared to adults' rights. The state has no compelling state interest in treating a juvenile as an adult and restricting the juvenile's physical liberty beyond the restrictions that are imposed upon an adult who commits the same offense as the juvenile. Furthermore, the paternalistic rationale of parens patriae does not apply to distinguish between the treatment of a juvenile and an adult when a juvenile is no longer sentenced solely as a juvenile, but as an adult as well. Although the EJPA is subject to a severability clause, the sentencing portion of the EJPA is necessary to its integrity; thus, the remaining provisions of the EJPA cannot be saved by the severability clause. In re S.L.M., 287 M 23, 951 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1480 (1997), distinguished in In re S.M.K.-S.H., 2012 MT 281, 367 Mont. 176, 290 P.3d 718. Youth's Standing to Challenge Imposition of Both Juvenile and Adult Sentence: Youth given both juvenile and adult sentences under the Extended Jurisdiction Prosecution Act, with the adult portion stayed pending successful completion of the juvenile portion, who were not the subject of a proceeding to revoke the stay, had standing to challenge the Act on the ground that the Act subjected them to a longer period of incarceration than that permitted for an adult who committed the same offense. There was a threatened injury to the youth's civil rights, and they suffered a legitimate and realistic fear that the adult sentence would be carried out if they violated the juvenile sentence. Case Notes

Revocation of Youth Court Probation and Imposition of Suspended Sentence Proper: When Hinkle was 17 years old, he pleaded true to the charge of negligent homicide. The case was tried in District Court, and Hinkle was committed to the Youth Court for suspended placement in a treatment facility until age 18, placed on formal juvenile probation until age 25, and given a stayed adult sentence of 20 years with the Department of Corrections, pursuant to 22 probation conditions, including requirements that Hinkle not violate the dispositional order, possess or consume alcohol, or commit a new offense. Twelve days after the sentencing hearing, Hinkle was cited for being a minor in possession of alcohol. The Youth Court revoked Hinkle's probation and transferred the case back to District Court for further proceedings. After considering numerous balancing factors, the District Court imposed the 20-year adult sentence that had been stayed, but suspended the sentence subject to 19 conditions, including prohibiting Hinkle from entering casinos and gambling. Hinkle appealed on grounds that his probation was improperly revoked, that the 20-year sentence was improperly imposed, and that the casino and gambling restriction was illegal. The Supreme Court affirmed on all issues. The District Court did not err in concluding that simply continuing Hinkle's youth probation for the probation violations would be no more than a slap on the wrist and would be inappropriate given the seriousness of the underlying homicide offense. Imposing a suspended adult sentence was in fact a further act of grace, in light of the fact that the court could have imposed a 20-year sentence of confinement, but Hinkle ignored the act of grace in asserting that the suspended sentence was unduly harsh. Additionally, Hinkle's personal characteristics made him particularly vulnerable to the pitfalls of irresponsible gambling, so the casino and gambling restriction was appropriate. Thus, the District Court's order was "neither arbitrary nor without conscientious judgment or exceeding the bounds of reason and was an appropriate exercise of discretion". St. v. Hinkle, 2008 MT 217, 344 M 236, 186 P3d 1279 (2008).

Youth Court Jurisdiction Improperly Extended for Youth Charged With Crime Punishable by Life in Prison: In the case of a youth charged with felony sexual intercourse without consent, the Youth Court was without legal basis to extend its jurisdiction beyond the youth's 21st birthday because the youth was charged with a crime punishable by life imprisonment. Case Notes

No Automatic Transfer of Youth Court Jurisdiction to District Court Without Express Court Order: A 16-year-old defendant was found to be a serious juvenile offender and delinquent youth under 41-5-103 and received a juvenile sentence of formal probation until age 23 and an adult sentence. The execution of the adult sentence was to be stayed on the condition that the minor satisfied all the provisions of his juvenile sentence. Over the following years, the state filed numerous petitions months apart to revoke the defendant's probation, resulting in the defendant spending some time in the custody of the Department of Corrections and extended time on formal probation. When the defendant was 27 years old and serving the suspended portion of his sentence, the state filed a petition to revoke probation due to several violations. The defendant argued that there was no jurisdiction over his case because the Youth Court had lost jurisdiction when he turned 25 years old and the case had never been formally transferred to District Court.

The District Court found that the case had transferred automatically when the Youth Court imposed the adult sentence in modified form at the conclusion of the defendant's juvenile sentence when he was 23 years old. The District Court then ruled to revoke the suspended portions of the defendant's most recent sentence. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, finding that the statutory transfer requirement was not satisfied because no express transfer had ever occurred. Therefore, neither the Youth Court nor the District Court had jurisdiction over the case, and the subsequent sentence was illegal. In re S.G.-H.M., 2021 MT 176, 404 Mont. 531, 490 P.3d 1248.

County Reimbursement by Board of Crime Control for Indian Youth Placed in Regional Detention Facility by Tribal Court: Title 18, ch. 11, the State-Tribal Cooperative Agreements Act, includes broad authority for counties to enter into agreements with tribes for the delivery of services to their citizens. Although tribes have jurisdiction over tribal member youth, those youth remain citizens of Montana as well as citizens of the tribes, and if the tribes do not provide services, such as youth detention facilities, those tribal youth are nevertheless entitled to be offered state services in the same manner as any other Montana youth. The fact that a tribal court adjudicates the youth does not necessarily disqualify the youth from the receipt of state services. In the present case, Blaine County entered into an agreement with the Fort Belknap Tribe to allow detention in the Blaine County youth detention facility of youth determined by the tribal court to be in need of detention, and Blaine County included the tribal youth population in its survey of youth to be served. The youth detention services were appropriately covered in the county’s grant application. Thus, when the county applies for reimbursement for each youth served, regardless of whether the youth is a tribal member or not, the Montana Board of Crime Control is required to reimburse the county for detention costs for the youth, including tribal youth served in a regional detention facility pursuant to an order of a tribal court. 49 A.G. 1999 Amendment: Chapter 536 at end inserted "including the requirement that a youth detention facility provide an educational program for youth in need of that service". Amendment effective April 29, 1999.

1991 Amendment: Deleted (2) that read: "(2) procedures for distributing funds for detention facilities and services as provided in 41-5-315 and 41-5-316"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

1989 Amendment: In introductory clause substituted "The department shall adopt rules" for "The department of family services shall make rules"; and inserted (2) relating to procedures for distributing funds for detention facilities and services.

1989 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 434, L. 1989, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because [sections 12 and 13] [41-5-315 and 41-5-316, both repealed] require the department of family services [now department of corrections] to adopt rules governing procedures for distributing funds to counties for juvenile detention facilities and services. The rules must require a county applying for funds to provide necessary information to enable the department to determine the financial and administrative feasibility of establishing or acquiring the desired detention facility or services. In addition, the rules must require a county to submit information regarding the safety and habitability of the facility and its compliance with state and federal requirements, such as availability of medical and educational services and physical recreation."

1987 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 475, L. 1987, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because section 5 [41-5-809, renumbered 41-5-1802] allows the department of institutions [now department of corrections] to adopt rules for the licensing of detention facilities.

Currently, Montana statutes make no provision for the licensing of juvenile detention facilities. There are presently two counties in the process of establishing detention facilities who need assurance that their facilities will meet minimum established standards on program operations and environmental conditions.

It is anticipated that the rules developed under this act will establish minimum standards for juvenile detention facilities. These standards should govern such matters as the capacity of the facility, its location, design, construction, equipment and operation, fire and safety precautions, medical services, qualifications and number of personnel, and the quality of services provided to the juveniles.

The rules should contain a procedure for notifying the appropriate officials of compliance or deficiencies. If the facility is found deficient, a procedure for remedying those deficiencies should be included with specific time limitations.

It is anticipated the state will conduct annual inspections of each facility and may require written reports containing such information as the agency may need to set and enforce its standards."

Coordination Instruction: Section 15, Ch. 475, L. 1987, transferred rulemaking authority under this section from the Department of Institutions to the Department of Family Services (now Department of Corrections) if House Bill No. 325 was passed and approved. House Bill No. 325 passed and was approved as Ch. 609, L. 1987, April 24, 1987.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 799, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because [section 14] [41-5-1008, renumbered 41-5-1908] grants the board of crime control authority to adopt rules necessary to implement provisions of this bill.

It is the intent of the legislature, in enacting this bill, to provide alternatives to the detention of youth in adult jails in order to meet the requirements of Senate Bill No. 38, which prohibits the detention of youth in adult jails.

In order to ensure that alternatives to jail are established, the legislature intends that each county have the primary responsibility to provide youth detention services, as required by [section 2] [41-5-810, renumbered 41-5-1803]. In addition, in order to stimulate the development of needed services, the legislature intends to provide state grants authorized in [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902], using state and federal funds, to assist counties in providing a spectrum of services for the detention and care of youth. These services are intended to include but are not limited to youth detention facilities, short-term detention centers, holdovers, attendant care, home detention, and programs for the transportation of youth to regional detention facilities.

The legislature intends that counties receiving state grants should share in the costs of services in order to prevent excessive utilization of services and to give counties a financial incentive to hold down program costs. For this reason, [section 10] [41-5-1004, renumbered 41-5-1904] requires that state grants be provided on a matching basis or, if in a block grant, based on a percentage of the approved cost of services.

In order to discourage the use of secure detention and to promote the use of less costly, nonsecure community-based programs, the legislature intends to provide state grants to counties at a higher rate of payment for such services, including holdovers, attendant care, and other alternatives to secure detention.

The legislature further intends that, as a condition of receiving state grants under [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902], each county shall develop a written plan for providing youth detention services, including alternatives to secure detention. The development of county plans is required to ensure that formal planning does, in fact, occur and to make certain that state grants are not provided for services that are not well planned in advance.

As a further condition of receiving state grants under [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902], each county shall, within a reasonable period of time, demonstrate compliance or substantial compliance with state law and policies contained in the Montana Youth Court Act relating to the detention and placement of youth. The legislature intends that the board of crime control review and monitor counties receiving grants under [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902] to assure compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act.

Finally, the legislature intends that the board of crime control adopt rules as authorized in [section 14] [41-5-1008, renumbered 41-5-1908]. In adopting rules, the board may:

(1) establish requirements for approved holdovers consistent with the definition of holdovers provided in 41-5-103(13);

(2) designate geographical areas of the state that are eligible for creation of a youth detention region under [section 4] [41-5-812, renumbered 41-5-1805]. In designating these areas, the board shall use available state data showing the number of youth held in detention in each county of the state.

(3) adopt procedures governing the distribution and allocation of funds in accordance with [sections 10 and 11] [41-5-1004 and 41-5-1005, renumbered 41-5-1904 and 41-5-1905];

(4) provide a system to review and monitor counties under [section 9] [41-5-1003, renumbered 41-5-1903] to assure that counties receiving grants are in compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act;

(5) provide standards for determining compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act pursuant to [section 9] [41-5-1003, renumbered 41-5-1903]. These standards should be based upon comparable standards for compliance with sections 223(a)(12) and 223(a)(14) of the federal Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974.

(6) establish a process for providing notice and fair hearings required under [section 9] [41-5-1003, renumbered 41-5-1903] in order to terminate state grants to counties that fail to attain compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act."

1999 Amendment: Chapter 536 in middle of (1) inserted exception clause; inserted (2) concerning educational program for youth in lawful custody at a detention facility; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 29, 1999.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 799, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because [section 14] [41-5-1008, renumbered 41-5-1908] grants the board of crime control authority to adopt rules necessary to implement provisions of this bill.

It is the intent of the legislature, in enacting this bill, to provide alternatives to the detention of youth in adult jails in order to meet the requirements of Senate Bill No. 38, which prohibits the detention of youth in adult jails.

In order to ensure that alternatives to jail are established, the legislature intends that each county have the primary responsibility to provide youth detention services, as required by [section 2] [41-5-810, renumbered 41-5-1803]. In addition, in order to stimulate the development of needed services, the legislature intends to provide state grants authorized in [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902], using state and federal funds, to assist counties in providing a spectrum of services for the detention and care of youth. These services are intended to include but are not limited to youth detention facilities, short-term detention centers, holdovers, attendant care, home detention, and programs for the transportation of youth to regional detention facilities.

The legislature intends that counties receiving state grants should share in the costs of services in order to prevent excessive utilization of services and to give counties a financial incentive to hold down program costs. For this reason, [section 10] [41-5-1004, renumbered 41-5-1904] requires that state grants be provided on a matching basis or, if in a block grant, based on a percentage of the approved cost of services.

In order to discourage the use of secure detention and to promote the use of less costly, nonsecure community-based programs, the legislature intends to provide state grants to counties at a higher rate of payment for such services, including holdovers, attendant care, and other alternatives to secure detention.

The legislature further intends that, as a condition of receiving state grants under [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902], each county shall develop a written plan for providing youth detention services, including alternatives to secure detention. The development of county plans is required to ensure that formal planning does, in fact, occur and to make certain that state grants are not provided for services that are not well planned in advance.

As a further condition of receiving state grants under [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902], each county shall, within a reasonable period of time, demonstrate compliance or substantial compliance with state law and policies contained in the Montana Youth Court Act relating to the detention and placement of youth. The legislature intends that the board of crime control review and monitor counties receiving grants under [section 8] [41-5-1002, renumbered 41-5-1902] to assure compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act.

Finally, the legislature intends that the board of crime control adopt rules as authorized in [section 14] [41-5-1008, renumbered 41-5-1908]. In adopting rules, the board may:

(1) establish requirements for approved holdovers consistent with the definition of holdovers provided in 41-5-103(13);

(2) designate geographical areas of the state that are eligible for creation of a youth detention region under [section 4] [41-5-812, renumbered 41-5-1805]. In designating these areas, the board shall use available state data showing the number of youth held in detention in each county of the state.

(3) adopt procedures governing the distribution and allocation of funds in accordance with [sections 10 and 11] [41-5-1004 and 41-5-1005, renumbered 41-5-1904 and 41-5-1905];

(4) provide a system to review and monitor counties under [section 9] [41-5-1003, renumbered 41-5-1903] to assure that counties receiving grants are in compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act;

(5) provide standards for determining compliance or substantial compliance with the Montana Youth Court Act pursuant to [section 9] [41-5-1003, renumbered 41-5-1903]. These standards should be based upon comparable standards for compliance with sections 223(a)(12) and 223(a)(14) of the federal Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974.

Part Attorney General's Opinions

County Reimbursement by Board of Crime Control for Indian Youth Placed in Regional Detention Facility by Tribal Court: Title 18, ch. 11, the State-Tribal Cooperative Agreements Act, includes broad authority for counties to enter into agreements with tribes for the delivery of services to their citizens. Although tribes have jurisdiction over tribal member youth, those youth remain citizens of Montana as well as citizens of the tribes, and if the tribes do not provide services, such as youth detention facilities, those tribal youth are nevertheless entitled to be offered state services in the same manner as any other Montana youth. The fact that a tribal court adjudicates the youth does not necessarily disqualify the youth from the receipt of state services. In the present case, Blaine County entered into an agreement with the Fort Belknap Tribe to allow detention in the Blaine County youth detention facility of youth determined by the tribal court to be in need of detention, and Blaine County included the tribal youth population in its survey of youth to be served. The youth detention services were appropriately covered in the county's grant application. Thus, when the county applies for reimbursement for each youth served, regardless of whether the youth is a tribal member or not, the Montana Board of Crime Control is required to reimburse the county for detention costs for the youth, including tribal youth served in a regional detention facility pursuant to an order of a tribal court. 49 A.G. Part 25
Criminally Convicted Youth Act

Part Compiler's Comments

Effective Date: This part is effective October 1, 1999.

Part Case Notes

Youth Tried, Convicted, and Sentenced Under Transfer Statute Correctly Sentenced as Persistent Felony Offender: In 1999, when Mainwaring was a juvenile, he pleaded guilty to mitigated deliberate homicide and was convicted pursuant to 41-5-206 and sentenced pursuant to 41-5-2503(1)(a). A part of that sentence was later suspended under 41-5-2510. Later, shortly after turning 21, Mainwaring assaulted a child. The state brought assault charges against Mainwaring and then sought to have the court designate Mainwaring as a persistent felony offender (PFO). The District Court approved the designation as a PFO, based on Mainwaring's 1999 felony conviction, and Mainwaring was convicted and sentenced to 20 years in prison. The Supreme Court held that a conviction under 41-5-206(6) was equivalent to any adult felony conviction and that there is nothing in the Montana Youth Court Act or the Criminally Convicted Youth Act that precludes the application of the PFO statutes and designation to an individual previously convicted of a felony when the individual was a youth. Citing St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 M 276, 119 P3d 1194 (2005), the Supreme Court held that the District Court therefore had the authority to apply the PFO statutes and designation to Mainwaring. The Supreme Court also overruled Mainwaring's due process objections and affirmed his conviction. St. v. Mainwaring, 2007 MT 14, 335 M 322, 151 P3d 53 (2007).

41-5-2503. Disposition of criminally convicted youth.

Case Notes

Seventeen-Year-Old Defendant Charged in District Court — Denial of Transfer to Youth Court Proper: A 17-year-old defendant was charged directly in District Court with two consolidated counts of sexual intercourse without consent concerning two separate incidents. The District Court subsequently denied the defendant's motions to have the charges moved to Youth Court, concluding that the defendant's age, home environment, conduct while on release, minimization of his alleged conduct, and need for more structured supervision made the District Court a more appropriate forum. The defendant agreed to a nonbinding plea agreement for one of the charges and was sentenced to 50 years in prison with 10 years suspended. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the District Court correctly denied the motions for transfer to Youth Court. However, the Supreme Court found that the District Court erred by not including the requirements of 41-5-2503 and remanded to modify the judgment. St. v. Talksabout, 2017 MT 79, 387 Mont. 166, 392 P.3d 574, distinguished in St. v. Johnson, 2023 MT 167, 413 Mont. 202, 534 P.3d 676.

No Statutory Indication That Youth Received Illegal Sentence Following Transfer of Case to District Court: At the age of 17, Strong was charged with two counts of felony burglary, and the state moved to transfer the charges to District Court. The state also filed theft charges against Strong in Youth Court. Strong entered a guilty plea on the burglary charges in exchange for dismissal of the theft charges. The District Court sentenced Strong to the Department of Corrections for 8 years, with 2 years suspended on each count. While serving the prison term, Strong challenged the sentence as illegal because the District Court failed to suspend all but 5 years. The state countered that the 5-year limitation in 46-18-201(3)(d) did not apply to a youth who was transferred to District Court under 41-5-206. The District Court affirmed the original sentence and Strong appealed. Applying the criteria in St. v. Ellis, 2007 MT 210, 339 M 14, 167 P3d 896 (2007), the Supreme Court addressed the facial challenge to the exemption in 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) and affirmed. In order for an adult to receive the less onerous commitment to the Department of Corrections, the sentencing court must be willing to suspend all but 5 years of the commitment, but the statute imposes no similar impediment on a court's ability to commit to the Department a youth transferred to District Court under 41-5-206. This enhanced flexibility with regard to the treatment of youth offenders comports with the goals of the Youth Court Act to ensure rehabilitation of youth offenders rather than solely retribution. Therefore, nothing in 46-18-201(3)(d)(ii) established that Strong received an illegal sentence. St. v. Strong, 2009 MT 65, 349 M 417, 203 P3d 848 (2009). 41-6-101. Enactment — provisions.

Contingent Effective Date: Section 3, Ch. 194, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] is effective upon receipt of written notification by the secretary of state from the director of the department of corrections that the compact has been legislatively enacted into law by the 35th compacting state." The contingency occurred on December 16, 2008, when the Interstate Compact for Juveniles Commission met and the Compact was ratified by the required 35 states.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 194 substituted new Interstate Compact on Juveniles for former Interstate Compact on Juveniles (see 2003 Session Law for former text); and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective on occurrence of contingency.

1989 Amendment: Inserted Article XVI concerning rendition.

Attorney General's Opinions

Nondelinquent Youth Charged With Crime in Another State: Because Montana has not adopted Art. XVIII of the Interstate Compact on Juveniles, which provides that the Compact applies to juveniles charged with being delinquent by reason of violation of any criminal law, a youth who has not run away, escaped, or been adjudged delinquent is outside the scope of the Interstate Compact on Juveniles in Montana. A juvenile residing in Montana, and charged with a crime in another state, may be extradited under the Uniform Criminal Extradition Act, Title 46, ch. 30. The soundest policy is to extradite any juvenile charged with a crime in another state, regardless of whether a juvenile court or an adult court has final jurisdiction. 41 A.G. Op. 24 (1985).

41-6-105. Responsibilities of courts, state departments, agencies, and officers.

Case Notes

Jurisdiction Over Runaway Juvenile: The broad language of 41-6-105 granting the courts of Montana the authority to "do all things appropriate" to carry out the purposes of the Interstate Compact on Juveniles should include the power to place a runaway youth in a private home on determining that the juvenile should not be returned to the requisitioning state. Here, the juvenile properly filed a petition for protection of the court, as a youth in need of care, and later changed it to request placement with her grandparents, so that the District Court properly had jurisdiction. Family Policy Act

Part Compiler's Comments

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 98, L. 1993, provided: "WHEREAS, the family is the basic institution in society through which our children's sense of well-being and self-esteem are developed and nurtured; and

WHEREAS, because our entire society benefits when families function well, it is in society's best interest to ensure that public policies and programs support and strengthen family life; and

WHEREAS, in fiscal year 1992, 3,310 Montana children and youth were removed from their families and placed in foster homes, group homes, and residential treatment facilities at a cost to the state of more than $16 million; and

WHEREAS, because of the high level of expenditures required to provide out-of-home placement, many experts now question whether public revenue spent for room, board, and related costs might be more wisely spent providing services specifically needed to enable a family to continue functioning as a family; and

WHEREAS, mounting evidence demonstrates that efforts that are made to support and strengthen vulnerable families before a crisis occurs can substantially contribute to family health and stability and prevent future long-term governmental costs; and

WHEREAS, because even with a reformed service system for families, some parents will not be available or able to protect or care adequately for their children, a range of out-of-home services should be available for these children and their families; and

WHEREAS, state and local policymakers increasingly are examining entire state systems for serving troubled children and families and are developing a more comprehensive approach to the multifaceted problems they face; and

WHEREAS, just as families nurture and sustain their members, healthy communities do the same for their member children and families; and

WHEREAS, because family services should be rooted in local communities and reflect local needs, characteristics, and resources, services should be provided as close as possible to the home community of the child or family and families should be fully involved in the planning and delivery of those services; and

WHEREAS, promoting family well-being and assuring children's safety must be the concern of all community sectors."

Legislative Oversight Committee: Chapter 301, L. 1993, created a joint legislative oversight committee on children and families.

TITLE 42
ADOPTION

Title Compiler's Comments

Source: Some of the sections in chapters 1 through 7 of this title are based upon the Uniform Adoption Act, adopted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws in 1994 and found in 9 U.L.A. 1 (pocket part). The 1994 version of the Uniform Adoption Act has been enacted only in Vermont. In Montana, fewer than two dozen of the 115 sections of the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act have been enacted in whole or in part in this title. For that reason, the Commissioners' prefatory note to the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act has not been included because most of that note is inapplicable to the few 1994 Uniform Adoption Act sections included in this title. For the sections in this title in which all or a large part of the sections of the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act is like the Montana enactment and the comments of the Commissioners, if any, are therefore helpful, the Commissioners' comments accompanying the sections of the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act enacted in Montana are included under the catchline "1994 Commissioners' Comment", the section of the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act from which the Montana language is derived is cited under the heading "Compiler's Comments" as the "Source", and any differences between the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act and the version of the particular section of the 1994 Uniform Act enacted in Montana are explained under the heading "Compiler's Comments" and the catchline "Changes From 1994 Uniform Act". Even for many of those sections of the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act enacted in Montana, the Montana sections contain variations, omissions, and additional matter. For those sections that resemble the 1994 Uniform Adoption Act only in some minor way and for which the comments of the Commissioners, if any, are therefore unhelpful, the 1994 Commissioners' comments to the Uniform Act have not been included and the 1994 Uniform Act is not cited as the source, but similarities between the language of the 1994 Uniform Act and the statutory section are noted under the compiler's comments catchline "Similarities With 1994 Uniform Act".

Some sections of this title are also based upon former Title 40, ch. 8, repealed by Ch. 480, L. 1997. Title 40, ch. 8, enacted part of the 1953 Uniform Adoption Act. Montana never enacted the 1969 Revised Uniform Adoption Act. In those instances in which all or a major part of a section of the 1953 Uniform Adoption Act was enacted in Montana, the appropriate section of the 1953 Uniform Act is cited as the source, with or without changes, and any Commissioners' comments published with the 1953 Uniform Adoption Act have been retained under the catchline "1953 Commissioners' Comment", even though changes to the 1953 Act, as previously adopted in Montana, may have been made by Ch. 480, L. 1997. If no Commissioners' comment, source note, or comparison to the 1994 Uniform Act is provided, the compiler has made the judgment that any resemblance of the Montana statute to either the 1953 Uniform Act or the 1994 Uniform Act is so small that the inclusion of any comparison or source note would not be helpful to the reader and in fact may be misleading.

Some of the sections in this title are also based upon former sections of Title 40, ch. 6, the Montana version of the Uniform Parentage Act, 9B U.L.A. 287, which have been repealed or amended by Ch. 480, L. 1997. When meaningful parts of Title 40, ch. 6, have been retained, although amended, applicable portions of the Commissioners' comments to the Uniform Parentage Act that were originally published for the repealed sections have also been retained under the catchline "Commissioners' Comment" and the appropriate section of the Uniform Parentage Act is cited as the source.

Chapter 8 of this title concerning licensing of adoption agencies succeeded Title 52, ch. 2, part 4, repealed by sec. 171, Ch. 480, L. 1997. When appropriate, annotations formerly published for Title 52, ch. 2, part 4, have been transferred to chapter 8 of this title.

Chapter 10 of this title concerning subsidized adoptions was transferred from Title 52, ch. 2, part 5, by the Code Commissioner pursuant to sec. 174, Ch. 480, L. 1997. Because the MCA sections were transferred as a whole to this title, all annotations previously published for Title 52, ch. 2, part 5, were also transferred as a whole to this title.

1997 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 480, L. 1997, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because the bill gives the department of public health and human services authority to adopt administrative rules. The rules must provide procedures for the putative father registry, including methods of notification, filing, and accessing information. The department shall adopt rules for licensing child-placing agencies. To the extent feasible, the rules should incorporate existing procedures. The needs of the child in the adoption proceeding must be the primary focus of the rules."

Applicability: Section 173, Ch. 480, L. 1997 provided: "(1) [Sections 1 through 156] [Title 42, chapters 1 through 7, and Title 52, chapter 8, part 1] apply to proceedings commenced on or after October 1, 1997.

(2) A petition for adoption filed prior to October 1, 1997, is governed by the law in effect at the time the petition was filed.

(3) The putative father registry requirements apply to children born on or after October 1, 1997."

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Postadoption Visitation Agreement — District Court Responsibilities: The District Court did not err when it modified sua sponte the parties' postadoption visitation agreement to provide weekend visitation and weekly telephone contact with the birth mother because the modification was determined to be in the best interests of the child. The finding was supported by substantial evidence, and the court did not misapprehend the effect of the evidence. Adoptive parents do not have sole discretion in deciding whether a postadoption visitation agreement should be enforced. Rather, the adoptive parents' wishes are but one factor among many to be considered in determining the child's best interests under 40-4-212. Groves v. Clark, 1999 MT 117, 294 M 417, 982 P2d 446, 56 St. Rep. 490 (1999).

Sua Sponte Modification of Postadoption Visitation Agreement Within Discretion of District Court: The rule that in the context of separation agreements made between spouses, parties cannot make binding agreements concerning the support, custody, or visitation of children applies equally to postadoption agreements made between an adopted child's birth parents and adoptive parents. The best interests of the child are paramount, and sua sponte modification of an original visitation agreement in this case was within the discretion of the District Court after determining the best interests of the adopted child. DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Postadoption Visitation Agreement Between Natural Mother and Adoptive Parents — Responsibilities of District Court: Groves consented to the adoption of her child by the Clarks on the condition that the Clarks sign a visitation agreement allowing Groves to have specified contact with her daughter. After the document was signed and the adoption completed, the Clarks tried to terminate Groves' contact with her daughter. Groves brought an action for specific performance of the visitation agreement, but the District Court held that the agreement was void from its inception under 40-8-125 (now repealed). The Supreme Court reversed, holding that In re C.P., 221 M 180, 717 P2d 1093 (1986), was distinguishable and that the Legislature would not have enacted 40-8-136 (now repealed) if 40-8-125 (now repealed) terminated the interests of the natural parent altogether. The Supreme Court also noted that 40-8-136 (now repealed) also places a burden upon the adoptive parents and, in this case, upon the adoption agency that acted as Groves' agent, to make sure that the visitation agreement was filed in accordance with that statute. The Supreme Court also concluded that under 40-8-114 (now repealed), the District Court has a responsibility to make sure that the enforcement is in the best interests of the child. Groves v. Clark, 277 M 179, 920 P2d 981, 53 St. Rep. 703 (1996).

Procedures to Be Rigorously Followed: While there is some overlap in the various statutory schemes governing the termination of parental rights and the custody of children as to general subject matter, each is used for a distinct purpose and sets forth specific procedures which must be rigorously followed before a valid judgment or order may be issued, to insure that the minors involved receive the full protection of these laws. In re Guardianship of Aschenbrenner, 182 M 540, 597 P2d 1156 (1979).

Case Notes

Criteria for Intervention in Adoption Proceeding — Unfounded and Untimely Motion to Intervene Properly Denied: Couple A adopted a child through a judicial decree in the District Court of the Twenty-First Judicial District. Couple B also wanted to adopt the child and filed a motion, in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District where they lived, to intervene and set aside the final decree of adoption, despite the fact that some 6 months had passed since the final adoption decree was issued. Initially, neither District Court was aware of the competing adoption petitions. The Department of Public Health and Human Services had been reviewing both couples as potential adoptive resources at the same time and ultimately determined that because the child had formed a strong bond during placement with couple A for nearly 2 years, it would be in the child's best interests to be adopted by couple A. Couple B contended that the child was a member of their extended family and that the Department should have given them priority as adoptive parents. The Twenty-First District Court held that couple B had no standing to intervene as a matter of right pursuant to former Rule 24(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), and that permissive intervention under former Rule 24(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), was untimely and would undermine the purpose of adoption to the detriment of the child. Couple B's motion to set aside the final decree pursuant to former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), was also denied on grounds that as nonparties to couple A's adoption petition, couple B had no standing to make the motion and that, in any case, it was untimely because it was made more than 180 days after the final decree. Couple B appealed the denial of both motions, arguing first that they had a legal interest by virtue of the family placement preference in the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) and legislative and Departmental policies favoring adoptive placement with extended family members. The Supreme Court noted that a mere claim of interest is insufficient to support intervention as a matter of right and that a party seeking intervention must make a prima facie showing of a direct, substantial, legally protectable interest in the proceedings. No such showing was made here because the child was not Indian and therefore not subject to the ICWA, nor did the relationship of second cousins meet the definition of extended family member. Couple B next argued that they should have been allowed to intervene under the permissive standard of former Rule 24(b), M.R.Civ.P., because the competing adoption petitions had common issues of law and fact. Couple B contended that their delay should be excused by their reliance on misrepresentations made by the Department. The Supreme Court agreed that the Department could have taken a more forthright approach and saved all the parties considerable time and expense, but couple B bore the responsibility for ensuring the timely filing of the motion to intervene. The Supreme Court noted that timeliness is a threshold issue when intervention is sought and that, although none of the factors are dispositive, most courts look to four factors in considering whether a motion to intervene is timely filed: (1) the length of time that the intervenor knew or should have known of its interest in the case before moving to intervene; (2) prejudice to the original parties, if intervention is granted, resulting from the intervenor's delay; (3) prejudice to the intervenor if the motion is denied; and (4) any unusual circumstances mitigating for or against a determination that the application is timely. The Supreme Court considered each factor in detail. Although the third factor weighed in favor of couple B, because denial of the motion to intervene effectively precluded any hope of their adoption of the child, the other factors weighed strongly against them. The District Court made a reasoned analysis when it determined that the motion to intervene was untimely and did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion. Last, because couple B did not address the threshold issues of former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P., on appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that denial of the motion to set aside the final adoption decree on grounds of standing and timeliness was proper. In re Adoption of C.C.L.B., 2001 MT 66, 305 M 22, 22 P3d 646 (2001).

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Lack of "Venue Jurisdiction" — Petition Dismissed in Error: Shortly after her child was born in Montana, a mother signed an affidavit relinquishing her parental rights and signed a power of attorney allowing the petitioners to make parenting decisions in her stead. The petitioners moved with the child out of state and subsequently filed a consolidated and uncontested petition to terminate the mother's parental rights and to adopt the child in a Montana court. The District Court dismissed the petition because, it concluded, the court lacked "venue jurisdiction" because the child lived out of state. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded, holding that the District Court had jurisdiction and that, moreover, 42-4-110 implies that a petition to terminate parental rights and a petition to adopt should be filed in the same District Court. In re Adoption of C.J.L., 2017 MT 19, 386 Mont. 218, 388 P.3d 951.

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Jurisdiction Based on Presence of Child in Montana: In a case in which the natural parents were residents of Wyoming but the child was born in Montana and present in Montana, the District Court had jurisdiction in an action to terminate parental rights under the abuse and neglect statutes, based on the presence of the child in Montana. In re Parental Rights of Baby Girl W., 249 M 206, 814 P2d 976, 48 St. Rep. 643 (1991).

No Requirement That Jurisdiction of Dissolution Proceedings Also Be Adoption Venue: A petition for adoption was filed in the same judicial district as the parents' dissolution of marriage but did not come before the same judge. The father argued that only the court having jurisdiction over the dissolution proceedings should be able to consider a petition to terminate his parental rights. The Supreme Court found no such jurisdictional requirement under 40-8-107 (now repealed). In re Adoption of S.E., 232 M 31, 755 P2d 27, 45 St. Rep. 843 (1988).

Venue Determined by Filing of Adoption Petition: Where adoption petition was filed in District Court of Lincoln County, State Welfare Department (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) was ordered to investigate petitioners' home and to file a report, and the Department did file such report to the court after which it filed petition in District Court of Missoula County to have the child, who had been taken from Lincoln County and placed in a foster home in Missoula County, declared dependent and neglected and to award permanent custody to the Department, jurisdiction was in the District Court in Lincoln County, and District Court in Missoula County did not have jurisdiction and would be required to dismiss the petition before it. State ex rel. Habeck v. District Court, 157 M 231, 484 P2d 272 (1971).

Jurisdiction: Section 40-8-107 (now repealed) relates to venue and not jurisdiction; even though only one of joint petitioners in an adoption proceeding was resident of county in which proceeding was held, that was sufficient to confer jurisdiction. In re Adoption of Curtis, 143 M 330, 390 P2d 209 (1964).

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Stepparent's Petition to Terminate Biological Parent's Parental Rights Granted Given Evidence of Abandonment: A custodial stepparent has standing to petition for termination of a noncustodial parent's parental rights. In this case, the custodial stepmother petitioned for and was granted termination of the noncustodial mother's rights in order to allow for adoption of the child by the stepmother. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court concluded that the mother abandoned the child and thus was an unfit parent. As evidence of abandonment, the court did not err in considering: (1) the mother's time in prison and residential drug treatment, during which she had no contact with the child; (2) during the mother's periods of absence, the mother's struggle with an abusive relationship, use of illegal drugs, and associations with known criminals; (3) the mother's failure to follow through on commitments to care for and visit the child; and (4) a lack of intent on the mother's part to resume care of the child in the future, regardless of any understanding that an initial parenting plan was temporary. Evidence of abandonment was substantial, and the District Court did not err in granting the petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Grandfather Considered "Stepparent" in Adoption Proceeding: Following an adoption proceeding in which the District Court granted a mother's and maternal grandfather's joint petition to terminate the father's parental rights and allow the grandfather to adopt the children, the father appealed, arguing that the grandfather was not a stepparent who may bring a petition for termination of parental rights in conjunction with a petition for adoption. Although the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case back to the District Court on the basis that the father was not properly served by publication, the Supreme Court instructed the District Court that the petition could proceed if the District Court determines that there is good cause for the grandfather to be treated as a stepparent under 42-4-302 and that he meets the qualifications set forth in 42-1-106. DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Rights and Obligations of Stepfather — Equitable Adoption Not Recognized: Pierce sought custody of his spouse's child in connection with a dissolution of marriage. Pierce never formally adopted the child, but argued that an equitable adoption existed giving him standing to seek custody. The court reaffirmed the law that equitable adoption is not recognized in Montana. To adopt a child, the correct statutory procedures must be followed, and followed rigorously. Pierce had no standing to contest the custody of the child, nor had he any obligation to that child. Pierce v. Pierce, 198 M 255, 645 P2d 1353, 39 St. Rep. 914 (1982).

Res Judicata: Where mother of child born out of wedlock joined in and agreed to petition allowing natural father and his wife to adopt the child, the proceedings and resulting decree were res judicata, and mother could not later attack decree on grounds that father did not fit specifically any of the categories provided by 40-8-106 (now repealed). DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Mistake of Law — Aunt and Uncle Lack Standing to Petition for Termination of Parental Rights: In a case involving termination of parental rights, the Supreme Court assumed supervisory control to determine whether G.R. and P.R., the child's aunt and uncle, had standing to bring the amended petition to terminate parental rights and for adoption. A child's aunt and uncle are not parties authorized by 42-1-107 to place a child for adoption. A child may not be placed for adoption until the parental rights of the birth parents have been terminated by a court as provided in Title 41, chapter 3, or Title 42. G.R. and P.R. did not have standing to file a petition for termination of parental rights under 42-2-603(2). Under Title 41, chapter 3, a petition for the termination of parental right based upon abuse or neglect of a child may only be brought by the County Attorney, the Attorney General, or an attorney hired by the county. Section 40-6-233 refers to the abuse of parental authority for making decisions regarding the support and education of a child and is not the basis for terminating parental rights. Therefore, G.R. and P.R. do not have standing to petition for the termination of parental rights based upon abuse or neglect. J.C. v. Eleventh Judicial District Court, 2008 MT 358, 346 M 357, 197 P3d 907 (2008).

No Standing by Former Parent to Object to Child's Placement or Assert Child's Rights: Once the parent-child relationship is terminated by the District Court, a former parent has no standing to object to the court's subsequent placement of the child with the Department or by adoption. Similarly, a former parent has no standing to assert a violation of the child's rights as guardian ad litem because the former parent no longer represents the child. In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999).

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Absence of Department Adoption Placement and Written Consent by Department Head — Adoption Order Improper: Under 40-8-108 (now repealed), a court is not included in the list of entities that may place a child for adoption. Therefore, it was improper for a District Court to order a child's placement in the absence of a placement for adoption by the appropriate state agency and the written consent to adoption executed by the executive head of the Department. In re F.H., 272 M 342, 901 P2d 96, 52 St. Rep. 791 (1995). See also In re Adoption of Hall, 173 M 142, 566 P2d 401 (1977).

Award of Permanent Legal Custody — Authority of Court to Award Custody — Best Interests of Child Standard: The Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) filed a petition requesting the court to terminate parental rights of Mary Ann G. and to grant the Department permanent legal custody of J.J.G., with the right to consent to adoption. Former foster parents of J.J.G. filed a petition seeking permanent custody of the child. The court dismissed the foster parents' petition on grounds that the court could only review the placement actions of the Department but could not make the permanent placement itself. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the lower court erred when it concluded that the foster parents were without legal authority to seek custody of the child and that the lower court had no option other than to grant custody to the Department. The District Court has discretionary authority to transfer legal custody to any qualified individual, including nonrelatives, in order to protect the welfare of the child. In re J.J.G., 266 M 274, 880 P2d 808, 51 St. Rep. 793 (1994), followed in In re E.A.T. & T.A.T., 1999 MT 281, 296 M 535, 989 P2d 860, 56 St. Rep. 1133 (1999).

Attorney General's Opinions

Placement for Adoption: No person, including a physician or an attorney, may assist in procuring or selecting an adoptive home for a minor child, even if requested by the child's natural parents, unless licensed as a child-placing agency under 53-4-402 (renumbered 52-2-402, now repealed). 42 A.G. Op. 9 (1987).

42-1-108. Rights and responsibilities of parties in adoption proceedings.

Case Notes

Adoption Void When Parental Rights of Minor Without Legal Representation Relinquished: A mother was 17 years old when she sought to have her child adopted, but misrepresented herself as being 18 years old. After the adoption was completed, the mother sought to set it aside. The District Court held that because the mother was a minor when she relinquished her parental rights and was not represented by counsel as required by 42-2-405, the adoption was void. The adoptive parents appealed on various grounds, including a contention that it was in the child's best interests to be returned to them because the child had a right to permanence and stability in the adoptive placement. The Supreme Court affirmed. Section 42-2-405 exists to protect minor parents from making legally binding direct parental placement adoptions without counsel's advice and representation, and the District Court correctly concluded that it had no authority to order relinquishment of the mother's parental rights when she had no legal representation. The adoptive parents' argument that the child should be returned based on the child's best interests also failed because the child had been returned to the mother more than 1 year earlier. In re Adoption of A.L.O., 2006 MT 59, 331 M 334, 132 P3d 543 (2006).

CHAPTER 2
ADOPTION OF CHILD

Chapter Official Comments

It is the theory of this act that the adoption proceedings should be based on consent. Only then can the adoption court devote its entire attention to the inquiry whether the adoptive home will serve the best interests of the child and whether the child is properly placed in the adoptive home.

Under this theory controversies respecting the termination of parental rights should be settled in other proceedings in a court with jurisdiction of the parties before the adoption proceedings are brought. Once the parental rights are terminated the adoption court in the adoption proceedings has no other function in this respect except to recognize that the parental rights have been legally terminated by consent or by the order of a court of competent jurisdiction, followed by consent of a person, agency or court having authority to consent.

It has been suggested that a procedure should be provided in the adoption act to terminate parental rights where the consent cannot be obtained. Aside from the jurisdictional and procedural difficulties this would entail, it is subject to a basic policy objection. The issues to be tried in a controversy over the termination of parental rights, i e., the degree of unfitness of a parent, are quite different than the inquiry properly before an adoption court. The two should not be mixed. The trial of controversial issues over parental rights should not cast an influence in the adoption proceedings where the sole inquiry should be the future best interests of the child.

Consequently, the determination of parental rights is left to be settled under the laws of the various states, and until terminated, by consent or by a court order in a court having jurisdiction of the parties under laws providing therefor, there can be no adoption proceedings.

The formalities, other than writing, which should be required in respect to the execution of consents in the instances covered by paragraphs (1) and (2) [42-2-301(1) and (2), 42-2-302, and 42-2-608(1)] are subjects on which opinions differ widely and it does not seem that uniformity is essential. Accordingly, the bracketing in the last paragraph of the section has been used to indicate that the matter is left open and to suggest, without limitation, certain options that may commend themselves to legislative authority.

1997 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 480, L. 1997, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because the bill gives the department of public health and human services authority to adopt administrative rules. The rules must provide procedures for the putative father registry, including methods of notification, filing, and accessing information. The department shall adopt rules for licensing child-placing agencies. To the extent feasible, the rules should incorporate existing procedures. The needs of the child in the adoption proceeding must be the primary focus of the rules."

Official Comments

1994 Commissioners' Comment: The provisions of the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA), including the provisions that determine whether a tribal or a state court has exclusive or concurrent jurisdiction, preempt this Act whenever an adoptive placement, a consent or relinquishment, a proceeding to terminate parental rights, or an adoption proceeding pertains to an "Indian child." The ICWA defines "Indian child" as an unmarried individual under 18 who is either a member of an Indian tribe or eligible for membership by virtue of being the biological child of a tribal member; 25 U.S.C. § 1903(3). A parent or guardian executing a consent or relinquishment under this Act must state that the minor adoptee is not within ICWA's definition of Indian child, Section 2-406(d)(5) [not enacted in Montana], and the court, when granting an adoption, has to indicate if ICWA is applicable to the proceeding, and if so, that its requirements were met. See Section 3-703(a)(8) [not enacted in Montana].

Case Notes

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Termination of Parental Rights Reversed and Remanded for Final Determination of Children's Tribal Membership: The District Court terminated the mother's parental rights without a final determination of whether the children were subject to the federal Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA). On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the District Court abused its discretion by terminating her rights without a determination of the children's tribal membership status. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case to allow the tribe to make a determination and, if applicable, to conduct anew the termination proceedings subject to ICWA. In re M.T., 2020 MT 262, 401 Mont. 518, 474 P.3d 820.

Failure to Apply ICWA Standards at Outset of Proceedings — Cured by Subsequent ICWA-Compliant Adjudication — Termination Proper: After a father's parental rights were terminated by the District Court, he appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that the District Court's failure to apply the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA) for the first year of proceedings created a ripple effect that led to the improper termination of his rights. While the Supreme Court agreed that the District Court had erred in not applying the ICWA from the beginning of the proceedings, it found that the subsequent ICWA-compliant adjudication hearing cured the prior violations and affirmed the termination of rights. In re S.B., 2019 MT 279, 398 Mont. 27, 459 P.3d 214.

Filing Certificate of Service of Notice to Tribe — Notice Sufficient Under ICWA: After a father's parental rights were terminated by the District Court, he appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that the Department of Public Health and Human Services failed to provide proper notice of the proceedings to the tribal entity as required under the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA). The Supreme Court affirmed, finding that the Department had filed a certificate of service attesting it had provided the petition for termination to the tribe through registered mail, which was sufficient notice under the ICWA. In re S.B., 2019 MT 279, 398 Mont. 27, 459 P.3d 214.

Mother Lacked Standing to Challenge Placement of Indian Child After Parental Rights Terminated: The District Court issued an order terminating the parental rights of the appellant mother and ordering the placement of two children, C.B.D. and P.M.P., in separate placements. On appeal, the mother challenged the placement of P.M.P. only and did not challenge the termination itself. The Supreme Court held that the mother lacked standing to appeal P.M.P.'s placement. Because her appeal came after the District Court terminated her parental rights, she no longer had any legal status relative to P.M.P. and therefore she was alleging an injury to a civil right that she no longer had and made no effort to regain. The appeal of P.M.P.'s placement did not stay the termination of her parental rights, and therefore she lacked standing to maintain her appeal. In re C.B.D. & P.M.P., 2017 MT 108, 387 Mont. 347, 394 P.3d 202.

Termination of Parental Rights Not in Compliance with Requirements of ICWA and Parallel State Law: The District Court terminated the appellant Indian mother's parental rights to her two children. In reversing for a new termination hearing, the Supreme Court found that the termination proceedings did not comply with the mandates of the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) because the mother and the tribe should have received notice of the petition for termination at least 10 days in advance of the termination hearing. At the termination hearing the ICWA expert, pursuant to the ICWA and 41-3-609, was required to testify as to whether the mother's continued custody was likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the children, but the ICWA expert failed to provide the required testimony. The termination proceeding record did not establish that the state satisfied ICWA requirements that active efforts be made to provide remedial services and rehabilitation programs that were designed to prevent the breakup of the Indian family. In Re K.B. and T.B., 2013 MT 133, 370 Mont. 254, 301 P.3d 836. However, see In re M.S., 2014 MT 265, 376 Mont. 394, 336 P.3d 930, in which the Supreme Court held that even though the Department of Public Health and Human Services did not provide appropriate proof that the father's tribe had received proper notice of the termination hearing, the Department made "active efforts" as required under the ICWA, and that the error in this case was harmless.

Failure of District Court to Determine Indian Status of Children Prior to Termination of Parental Rights Warranting Reversal: Absent a conclusive determination from the affected tribes, it was reversible error for the District Court to terminate a mother's parental rights without definitely resolving the threshold question of whether the children were Indian children within the meaning of the Indian Child Welfare Act. In this case, the District Court was presented with insufficient evidence regarding the children's status because of the mother's failure to present crucial evidence regarding the children's possible tribal affiliation and the tribe's delay in intervening. However, the tribe's right to intervene was not impaired by the delay, and the court should not have proceeded absent a conclusive determination that the children were not tribal members. In re A.G., W.G., T.A., & J.A., 2005 MT 81, 326 M 403, 109 P3d 756 (2005). See also In re L.D., 2018 MT 60, 391 Mont. 33, 414 P.3d 768, holding that a parent cannot waive application of the Indian Child Welfare Act by stipulation or acquiescence.

Standards Applicable to Termination of Indian Parental Rights — Active Department Efforts to Provide Services Required: The District Court terminated the parental rights of an Indian father after the children were removed from the father's custody a fourth time because of the father's abuse and neglect. The father appealed on grounds that: (1) the state did not make active efforts to provide remedial services; (2) the District Court relied on expert testimony based on the Department file rather than personal interviews; and (3) it was error not to grant the father's request for an extension of temporary legal custody. The Supreme Court affirmed on all issues. The father left no phone number or address with the social worker and moved multiple times. Without any involvement, the father prevented the Department from making active efforts at providing more intensive services. Second, the federal Indian Child Welfare Act requires testimony from a qualified expert witness, but does not require a specific form of that testimonial evidence or personal interviews, and a District Court need not conform its decision to a particular piece of evidence or a particular expert's report or testimony as long as a reasonable person could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that continued custody by an Indian parent or custodian is likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the child. Last, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to extend temporary custody because the Department had already provided active efforts and did not need more time to assist the father in attaining his goals. The District Court had an accurate perspective on the father's parenting abilities, and refusal to extend the temporary placement did not make the court's decision any less reasonable. In re A.N. & M.N., 2005 MT 19, 325 M 379, 106 P3d 556 (2005). See also In re Marriage of McKenna, 2000 MT 58, 299 M 13, 996 P2d 386 (2000), In re D.S.B., 2013 MT 112, 370 Mont. 37, 300 P.3d 702, and In re S.B., 2019 MT 279, 398 Mont. 27, 459 P.3d 214, holding that the Department made active efforts beyond a reasonable doubt.

Sufficient Evidence That ICWA Standards Met in Terminating Parental Rights — Termination Affirmed Absent Abuse of Discretion: An Indian father contended that the state did not present sufficient evidence under the federal Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA) to warrant termination of his parental rights. The Supreme Court determined that: (1) there was sufficient evidence that continued custody of the children was likely to result in serious emotional or physical damage to the children; (2) the evidence was supported by testimony from qualified experts; (3) active but unsuccessful efforts had been made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs to prevent the breakup of the Indian family; and (4) the children had lived in foster care a sufficient time to create the presumption under 41-3-604 that the children's best interests would be served by terminating parental rights. The ICWA requirements having been followed, parental rights were properly terminated. In re S.R., R.R., & G.R. Jr., 2004 MT 227, 322 M 424, 97 P3d 559 (2004). See also In re S.B., 2019 MT 279, 398 Mont. 27, 459 P.3d 214.

Beyond a Reasonable Doubt Standard Not Cited but Applied in ICWA Parental Rights Termination Case — No Error: In a case subject to the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA), the mother contended that the District Court improperly applied a standard of what was likely rather than the beyond a reasonable doubt standard of proof. The Supreme Court disagreed. In making the determination that the mother would likely cause serious emotional or physical damage if the child was returned to her, the District Court was mirroring the language in 25 U.S.C. 1912(f). Further, the federal statute does not require that a state court specifically cite the beyond a reasonable doubt standard of proof, but only that the court's determination be supported by evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, and the court did apply the correct standard of proof in this case. In re M.R.G., 2004 MT 172, 322 M 60, 97 P3d 1085 (2004), following In re M.D.M., 2002 MT 305, 313 M 51, 59 P3d 1142 (2002). But see In re H.T., 2015 MT 41, 378 Mont. 206, 343 P.3d 159, in which the Supreme Court vacated the termination of parental rights to an Indian child because the District Court had applied a "clear and convincing evidence" standard instead of a "beyond a reasonable doubt standard" and remanded the matter to the District Court.

Unsuccessful Treatment Plan, Remedial Services, and Rehabilitative Program — Indian Parental Rights Properly Terminated: The District Court terminated the parental rights of an Indian mother. On appeal, the mother contended that the court's determination that the child would suffer serious emotional or physical damage if the child was returned to her was not proved beyond a reasonable doubt. The Supreme Court noted that state law requires successful completion of a parenting plan and that the federal Indian Child Welfare Act requires that active efforts be made to provide remedial services and rehabilitative programs to prevent the breakup of an Indian family, but that in this case, both the state and federal measures proved unsuccessful. The District Court received substantial testimony from qualified cultural and other experts upon which it could conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that the prospect of the mother providing primary care was likely to subject the child to serious harm, so the mother's parental rights were properly terminated. In re M.R.G., 2004 MT 172, 322 M 60, 97 P3d 1085 (2004).

Insufficient Good Cause to Allow Deviation From Adoption Placement Standards of Indian Child Welfare Act: When the Indian child in this matter was 12 weeks old, she was admitted to the hospital with 16 fractured ribs in various stages of healing and several bruises. The attending physician determined that the injuries were a result of abuse, and the child was placed in foster care with a non-Indian family. The District Court held that the child's extraordinary physical and emotional needs constituted good cause to deviate from the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA) placement provisions regarding adoptive placement with tribal extended family members. The District Court decided that the federal statutory factors were merely examples rather than an exhaustive list of circumstances of good cause and instead applied the Montana best interests of the child standard, concluding that nine extraordinary physical and emotional needs existed, including the child's strong emotional bond with the non-Indian foster family, that warranted deviation from the ICWA. The Supreme Court reversed, finding that the District Court's conclusion was an incorrect application of the law. The ICWA guidelines in 25 U.S.C. 1915(a) provide that a determination of good cause to avoid the placement preferences must be based on one or more of three stated factors, which are the only circumstances constituting good cause. The ICWA guidelines will be strictly applied and liberally construed in favor of a result that is consistent with the preferences in that Act. The emotional attachment between a non-Indian custodian and an Indian child does not necessarily outweigh the interests of the tribe and the child in having the child raised in an Indian community, nor does the child's emotional attachment to foster parents constitute an extraordinary emotional need sufficient to establish good cause to avoid the ICWA placement preferences. In re C.H., 2000 MT 64, 299 M 62, 997 P2d 776, 57 St. Rep. 300 (2000). See also In re Custody of S.E.G., 521 NW 2d 357 (Minn. 1994).

Waiver of Indian Child Welfare Act by Failure of Tribe to Intervene Prior to Termination of Proceeding: In an action by the state to terminate the parental rights of an Indian parent and to place the child, eligible for tribal enrollment, in foster care, the tribe was notified from the outset of the proposed action and did not intervene for a transfer of jurisdiction until after the proceeding had been completed in the state court. The Supreme Court held that although the state proceeding was required by federal law to be transferred to tribal court upon intervention of the tribe, the tribe, when it had notice of the proceeding, had to intervene while there was still a proceeding pending, otherwise the tribe would be considered to have declined transfer of jurisdiction. In re A.P., 1998 MT 176, 289 M 521, 962 P2d 1186, 55 St. Rep. 715 (1998).

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

No Waiver of Indian Child Welfare Act by Failure of Tribe to Promptly Intervene in Adoption — "Indian Child" Determinable by Tribal Action Following BIA Determination: The Department of Family Services (now the Department of Public Health and Human Services) notified the Turtle Mountain Band of Chippewa (the tribe) several times that the Department sought to terminate the parental rights to Jessica, a minor of one-eighth Indian blood. However, the tribe took no action. The parental rights were subsequently terminated, and the Department commenced adoption proceedings. Just prior to the District Court's determination of Jessica's custody, the tribe sought to intervene, but the District Court determined that the tribe had waived its right to intervention by the nearly 2-year period of inaction following notice by the state to the tribe. The Supreme Court held that there was no requirement in the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 that the tribe intervene promptly and that for this reason, the tribe should be allowed to intervene. The Supreme Court also held that the District Court was incorrect in concluding that it would make no difference what the tribe's position was on the issue of whether Jessica was an "Indian child" because the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) decision could be impeached by action of the tribe either before or after the BIA determination. In re Adoption of Riffle, 273 M 237, 902 P2d 542, 52 St. Rep. 954 (1995). On remand, the District Court concluded that the tribe's determination that Jessica was an Indian child and a member of the tribe was conclusive and that the ICWA applied to Jessica's adoption. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the tribe is the ultimate authority on eligibility for tribal membership and that enrollment of the child in the tribe was not required as long as the tribe recognized Jessica as a member. Enrollment is a common but not exclusive evidentiary means of determining membership in a tribe, but enrollment and membership are not synonymous. Given the tribe's determination that Jessica was an Indian child, the District Court properly concluded that the tribe's determination was conclusive and that the adoptive placement preferences found at 25 U.S.C. 1915 of the ICWA applied, including the placement preference with Jessica's uncle who met the definition of "extended family member". Jessica's best interests were served by placement with her uncle, and her constitutional rights were not violated through the application of the ICWA. In re Adoption of Riffle, 277 M 388, 922 P2d 510, 53 St. Rep. 723 (1996).

Applicability of Indian Child Welfare Act to Adoption Anonymity Considerations — Conformity With Act Required: Baby Girl Jane Doe was born at the Northern Montana Hospital in Havre. She was of Indian descent and eligible for membership in the Chippewa Cree Tribe on the Rocky Boy's Reservation. After the child's birth, her mother refused to sign the birth certificate, indicated her intent to relinquish the child to the Hill County Department of Family Services, and left the hospital. The Department filed for an order terminating parental rights and giving the Department the right to consent to the child's adoption. The tribe intervened and moved for disclosure of the mother's identity in order to ensure that any child placement conformed to the preferences provided in the federal Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA). The District Court denied the motion based on the mother's stated preference for anonymity. On appeal, the tribe asserted that its right to intervene and advocate enforcement of the ICWA was meaningless when the first preference under the ICWA is for placement with the child's extended family, yet the court would not reveal the identity of the natural parent. The Supreme Court cited Miss. Band of Choctaw Indians v. Holyfield, 490 US 30, 104 L Ed 2d 29, 109 S Ct 1597 (1989), in holding that, absent good cause to the contrary, the ICWA mandates that adoptive placements be made preferentially with: (1) members of the child's extended family; (2) other members of the same tribe; or (3) other Indian families. Permitting individual tribal members to avoid tribal exclusive jurisdiction by the simple expedient of giving birth off the reservation would to a large extent nullify the purpose of the ICWA. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court and ordered that the tribe be informed of the identity of the mother and her extended family, respecting her right to privacy to the extent possible without interfering with the tribe's rights under the ICWA. In re Baby Girl Jane Doe, 262 M 380, 865 P2d 1090, 50 St. Rep. 1555 (1993).

Exclusive Jurisdiction Over Indian Child Under Indian Child Welfare Act: Provisions of the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq.) concerning jurisdiction over Indian child custody proceedings place exclusive jurisdiction in the Indian tribe if an Indian child is a ward of the tribal court, regardless of the residence or domicile of the child. In this adoption proceeding, it was error on the part of the District Court to determine that Montana had concurrent jurisdiction over the child at issue because the tribal court previously had found her a ward of the tribal court. In re M.R.D.B., 241 M 455, 787 P2d 1219, 47 St. Rep. 303 (1990).

Right to Intervene in Adoption of Indian Child — State Commitment to Indian Child Welfare Act: Prior to birth, Nellie Silk, paternal aunt of M.E.M., expressed an interest in caring for the child because she was aware of the parents' problems with parenting; however, after the child was born he was placed in foster care by the Hill County Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (SRS). Upon learning of the placement, Silk wrote to SRS requesting custody. SRS responded that placement with Silk would be inappropriate because of SRS efforts to reintegrate the family, but that Silk would be considered if adoption were to occur. After parental rights were terminated (see In re M.E.M., 209 M 192, 679 P2d 1241, 41 St. Rep. 636 (1984)), Silk was not informed of the proceedings, of M.E.M.'s availability for adoption, or of M.E.M.'s preadoptive placement with a non-Indian family. Silk's subsequent petition for adoption and motion to intervene were denied by the District Court. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that Silk had an interest in adoption stemming from the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA), 25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq., and that the state had a strong and independent commitment to the principles embodied in the ICWA. Silk also had a right to intervene under former Rule 24(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), and although the District Court had ruled that her motion was not timely, the Supreme Court held that the motion must be granted in light of the fact that she was kept in ignorance and could not have been more diligent or earlier in her petition or motion. In re M.E.M., 223 M 234, 725 P2d 212, 43 St. Rep. 1684 (1986), followed in In re Adoption of Riffle, 273 M 237, 902 P2d 542, 52 St. Rep. 954 (1995). Jurisdiction: When the adoptive parents, adopted child, and natural parent were enrolled members of the Northern Cheyenne Tribe and resided on its Reservation, the District Court had jurisdiction notwithstanding ordinance granting tribal court jurisdiction. State ex rel. Firecrow v. District Court, 167 M 139, 536 P2d 190 (1975), reversed in Fisher v. District Court, 424 US 382, 96 S Ct 943, 47 L Ed 2d 106 (1976), wherein it was held that the tribal court has exclusive subject matter jurisdiction over petition for adoption of minor Indian child by two Indian adults living on reservation.

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Stepgrandmother With Established Parental Interest — Standing to Object to Adoption Petition: The consent of a child's stepgrandmother with a parental interest in the child was not obtained prior to the child's stepmother's adoption petition. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court in holding that the plain language of statute requires consent of all parties whose parental rights were established by a court before adoption can take place. Since the stepgrandmother's parental interest was established by a court, her consent to the adoption was required. In re N.P.M., 2020 MT 33, 399 Mont. 1, 457 P.3d 962.

Adoption of Children of Parent Whose Parental Rights Terminated Affirmed: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights for nonsupport and granted the stepfather's petition to adopt the children without the father's written permission. The father appealed. Although a child generally may not be adopted without the written consent of both birth parents, written consent is not required of a parent whose parental rights have been terminated, so the Supreme Court addressed whether the termination of parental rights was proper. In this case, the father was able to provide support for his children during an aggregate 1-year period prior to the filing of the adoption petition but failed to do so, rendering him an unfit parent pursuant to 42-2-608. Thus, the District Court did not err in terminating the father's parental rights. In re Adoption of C.W.D. & C.D.D. v. P.K.D., 2005 MT 145, 327 M 301, 114 P3d 214 (2005).

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Absence of Department Adoption Placement and Written Consent by Department Head — Adoption Order Improper: Under 40-8-108 (now repealed), a court is not included in the list of entities that may place a child for adoption. Therefore, it was improper for a District Court to order a child's placement in the absence of a placement for adoption by the appropriate state agency and the written consent to adoption executed by the executive head of the Department. In re F.H., 272 M 342, 901 P2d 96, 52 St. Rep. 791 (1995). See also In re Adoption of Hall, 173 M 142, 566 P2d 401 (1977).

Natural Father's Consent to Adoption Not Required When Evidence Clear He Abandoned Child: The father had only visited with his daughter twice and called her on the telephone twice in 8 years and during that time never paid support. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's finding that the record contained clear and convincing evidence that the natural father had willfully abandoned his daughter, and therefore his consent to the child's adoption by her grandparents was not required. Adoption of C.R.D., 240 M 106, 782 P2d 1280, 46 St. Rep. 1979 (1989).

Best Interest of Child:

If the statutory requirements for consent to adoption are met, the best interests of the child become the paramount consideration. In re Adoption of S.T.V., 226 M 18, 733 P2d 841, 44 St. Rep. 425 (1987).

In adoption cases the initial threshold requirement is statutory compliance with consent requirements because of the harshness of terminating parental rights. In re Adoption of Smigaj, 171 M 531, 560 P2d 141 (1977).

Part 4
Voluntary Relinquishment and Consent to Adopt

Part Official Comments

Subsection (a) [40-6-128, now repealed] provides that a father whose identity is presumed under Section 4 [40-6-105] or whose paternity has been formally ascertained, must be given notice of an adoption proceeding relating to his child.

Subsection (b) [40-6-128, now repealed] deals with the case in which the father has not been formally ascertained and the mother seeks to surrender the child for adoption. In the light of the U.S. Supreme Court's decisions in Stanley v. Illinois, 92 S.Ct. 1208 (1972); Rothstein v. Lutheran Social Services of Wisconsin and Upper Michigan, 92 S.Ct. 1488 (1972) and Vanderlaan v. Vanderlaan, 92 S.Ct. 1488 (1972) and related state court decisions, it is considered essential that the unknown or unascertained father's potential rights be terminated formally in order to safeguard the subsequent adoption.

Subsections (c) through (f) [40-6-126 through 40-6-129, now repealed] provide a procedure by which the court may ascertain the identity of the father and permit speedy termination of his potential rights if he shows no interest in the child. If, on the other hand, the natural father or a man representing himself to be the natural father claims custodial rights, the court is given authority to determine custodial rights. It is contemplated that there may be cases in which the man alleging himself to be the father is so clearly unfit to take custody of the child that the court would proceed to terminate his potential parental rights without deciding whether the man actually is the father of the child. If, on the other hand, the man alleging himself to be the father and claiming custody is prima facie fit to have custody of the child, an action to ascertain paternity is indicated, unless a voluntary acknowledgment can be obtained in accordance with Section 4(a) (5) [40-6-105(1) (e)] of this Act.

Subsection (e) [40-6-128, now repealed] raises serious constitutional questions in that it attempts to cut off after a given period any claim seeking to reopen a judgment terminating parental rights. While of questionable constitutionality, such a provision is not without precedent. A similar provision is contained in Section 15(b) of the revised Uniform Adoption Act, approved by the Commissioners on Uniform State Laws in 1969, and other similar provisions are contained in the adoption acts of a number of states. Moreover, it must be considered that the case of adoption differs from other situations. The parent's claim to his child can hardly be compared to a person's claim to property. The Supreme Court itself recognized that the interest of the child is heavily involved in these cases when remanding the Rothstein case to the Wisconsin Supreme Court, requiring that the court give "due consideration [to] the completion of the adoption proceedings and the fact that the child has apparently lived with the adoptive family for the intervening period of time." Cf. Armstrong v. Manzo, 380 U.S. 545 (1965).

Subsection (f) seeks to conform to the following footnote in Stanley v. Illinois:

"We note in passing that the incremental cost of offering unwed fathers an opportunity for individualized hearings on fitness appears to be minimal. If unwed fathers, in the main, do not care about the disposition of their children, they will not appear to demand hearings. If they do care, under the scheme here held invalid, Illinois would admittedly at some later time have to afford them a properly focused hearing in a custody or adopting proceeding.

Extending opportunity for hearing to unwed fathers who desire and claim competence to care for their children creates no constitutional or procedural obstacle to foreclosing those unwed fathers who are not so inclined. The Illinois law governing procedure in juvenile cases . . . provides for personal service, notice by certified mail or for notice by publication when personal or certified mail service cannot be had or when notice is directed to unknown respondents under the style of 'all whom it may concern.' Unwed fathers who do not promptly respond cannot complain if their children are declared wards of the State. Those who do respond retain the burden of proving their fatherhood."

This footnote might be interpreted to require publication in all cases in which a child with unascertained paternity is surrendered for adoption. The Committee considered, however, that there will be many such cases in which it will be highly probable that publication will not lead to the identification of the father. In view of that and the fact that in nearly all cases publication will lead to substantial embarrassment for the mother, the Committee thought it appropriate to allow the court to determine whether, in the particular circumstances of each case, publication would be likely to lead to the identification of the father. One serious consequence that might result from an indiscriminate publication requirement is that some mothers may be caused to withhold their children from adoption even where adoption would be in the child's best interest.

Motion to Set Aside Relinquishment and Consent to Adoption Properly Denied: The guardians of adopted children moved to set aside their relinquishment and consent to the adoption on the basis that the adoptive parents had provided a fraudulent preplacement evaluation that did not comply with the Montana Adoption Act. The District Court denied the motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that because the guardians failed to establish fraud by clear and convincing evidence, no basis existed under 42-2-417 to set aside the relinquishment and consent to adoption. In re Adoption of S. R. T., 2011 MT 219, 362 Mont. 39, 260 P.3d 177.

42-2-402. Voluntary relinquishment — validity.

Case Notes

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Preservation and Reunification Efforts Not Required in Involuntary Termination of Parental Rights: If a court involuntarily terminates a parent's rights under 41-3-609, the state may forego reasonable efforts to provide preservation or reunification services to that parent with regard to any future children placed with the state, pursuant to 41-3-423. Voluntary relinquishment is only one of several criteria that a court may consider when ordering termination of parental rights. In this case, the District Court properly terminated a mother's parental rights based in part on adjudication of the child as a youth in need of care. With the exception of minor immaterial misstatements, the court's decision was based on facts supported by substantial testimonial evidence from professionals, so termination of parental rights was not an abuse of discretion, and the decision was affirmed. In re P.S., 2006 MT 4, 330 M 239, 127 P3d 451 (2006).

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Inapplicability to Dissolution Proceedings: Former section 40-6-135 (now repealed) related to relinquishment of parental rights in adoption situations and did not apply to marriage dissolution proceedings. In re Marriage of McKinnon, 251 M 347, 825 P2d 551, 49 St. Rep. 69 (1992), overruled in part on other grounds by Green v. Gerber, 2013 MT 35, 369 Mont. 20, 303 P.3d 729.

Constitutionality — Contest of Voluntariness of Release: The natural mother argued that 40-6-124 (now repealed) required her to obtain the consent of the prospective adoptive parents before filing an action to set aside her parental release for involuntariness. This, she argued, effectively precluded her from contesting the validity of the parental release, thereby depriving her of due process of law. The court did not read 40-6-124 as prohibiting an action to contest the voluntariness of the release unless the consent of the person to whom the child has been released was first obtained. The procedure contained in subsection (7) was required only when there was no issue of voluntariness of the parental release. In re Adoption of B.G.B., 183 M 347, 599 P2d 375 (1979).

42-2-404. Who may relinquish — to whom.

Official Comments

1994 Commissioners' Comment: This section helps clarify the distinction between consents and relinquishments and between direct and agency placements. A parent or guardian who makes a direct placement of a minor for adoption must execute a consent for the adoption to go forward. If the parent or guardian prefers, instead, to have an agency place the minor and consent to the minor's adoption, the parent or guardian has to relinquish all rights with respect to the minor to the agency. From then on, the agency acts in lieu of the parent or guardian: it acquires custody of the minor and the authority to place the child for adoption pursuant to the procedures in Sections 2-103 and 2-104 [neither enacted in Montana]. An agency may also acquire the right to place the minor for adoption pursuant to a court order.

Case Notes

Adoption Void When Parental Rights of Minor Without Legal Representation Relinquished: A mother was 17 years old when she sought to have her child adopted, but misrepresented herself as being 18 years old. After the adoption was completed, the mother sought to set it aside. The District Court held that because the mother was a minor when she relinquished her parental rights and was not represented by counsel as required by this section, the adoption was void. The adoptive parents appealed on various grounds, including a contention that it was in the child's best interests to be returned to them because the child had a right to permanence and stability in the adoptive placement. The Supreme Court affirmed. This section exists to protect minor parents from making legally binding direct parental placement adoptions without counsel's advice and representation, and the District Court correctly concluded that it had no authority to order relinquishment of the mother's parental rights when she had no legal representation. The adoptive parents' argument that the child should be returned based on the child's best interests also failed because the child had been returned to the mother more than 1 year earlier. WHEREAS, explicit authority for the program is necessary with the caveat that the program must be kept separate from any program for the placement of children and must be paid for by the agency with separate funds."

Case Notes

Failure to Produce Adequate Written Report — Best Interests of Child Override Procedural Error: A mother who claimed she relinquished her rights without receiving adequate counseling also challenged the Department of Public Health and Human Services' compliance in issuing a written report under this section. The mother claimed that the report, which was written in generic and formulaic terms some 18 months after her relinquishment, did not satisfy the provisions of this section. Although the Supreme Court agreed, it concluded that the procedural error did not outweigh the best interests of the children and affirmed the District Court. Determination of Whether Mother Received Relinquishment Counseling or Whether Good Cause Existed to Waive Requirement — Question for District Court: When a mother denied receiving mandatory relinquishment counseling and her affidavit of relinquishment was silent, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court for determination of whether counseling was received or whether good cause existed to waive the requirement. In re B.J.T.H., 2013 MT 366, 373 Mont. 85, 314 P.3d 911.

In a subsequent proceeding, the District Court held a hearing on whether the mother had received counseling as required under 42-2-409. Although the mother claimed that a counselor spent only 5 to 10 minutes with her, the counselor testified that she had spent at least 3 hours counseling the mother on her options, including relinquishment. The District Court concluded the mother had received the required counseling and the mother appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, noting that the District Court was in the best position to assess the credibility and weight of the conflicting evidence on the amount of counseling received by the mother and that there was substantial evidence to support the finding the mother had received adequate counseling prior to relinquishing her parental rights. Although the mother claimed that a counselor spent only 5 to 10 minutes with her, the counselor testified that she had spent at least 3 hours counseling the mother on her options, including relinquishment. The District Court concluded the mother had received the required counseling and the mother appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, noting that the District Court was in the best position to assess the credibility and weight of the conflicting evidence on the amount of counseling received by the mother and that there was substantial evidence to support the finding the mother had received adequate counseling prior to relinquishing her parental rights. In re B.J.T.H., 2015 MT 6, 378 Mont. 14, 340 P.3d 557.

Motion to Set Aside Relinquishment and Consent to Adoption Properly Denied: The guardians of adopted children moved to set aside their relinquishment and consent to the adoption on the basis that the adoptive parents had provided a fraudulent preplacement evaluation that did not comply with the Montana Adoption Act. The District Court denied the motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that because the guardians failed to establish fraud by clear and convincing evidence, no basis existed under 42-2-417 to set aside the relinquishment and consent to adoption. In re Adoption of S. R. T., 2011 MT 219, 362 Mont. 39, 260 P.3d 177.

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Jurisdiction After Child Placed for Adoption Out of State: Once a parent voluntarily signed and executed a form relinquishing parental rights to an adoption agency, the adoption agency became the "sending agency" as defined in 41-4-101, Art. II, with the power to place the child for adoption out of state. The only standing the parent then had in Montana courts was to seek a revocation of the relinquishment with the adoption agency as copetitioner. Under 40-6-135(7) (now repealed), the relinquishment became irrevocable once the child was placed for adoption out of state, and Montana lost jurisdiction. In re Male Child Born July 15, 1985, to L.C., 221 M 309, 718 P2d 660, 43 St. Rep. 835 (1986).

Violation of Interstate Compact on Placement of Children — Illegal Placement as a Result — Revocation of Parent's Consent: Failure of prospective adoptive parents to notify the appropriate public authorities in writing before bringing their prospective adoptive child into Montana violated the Interstate Compact on Placement of Children. The prospective adoptive parents' status as custodians did not prevent the operation of the Compact. By virtue of the failure of the prospective adoptive parents to comply with the Compact, the placement of the child with the prospective adoptive parents in Montana constituted illegal placement under the provisions of the Compact, and the failure to comply constitutes full and sufficient grounds for the revocation of the previously executed "parent's consent". In re the Adoption of T.M.M., 186 M 460, 608 P2d 130 (1980).

Revocation of Consent by Court — Exception: Although a Missouri court having custody of children revoked its original consent on the ground it did not have jurisdiction due to a lack of proper notice to natural parents, 40-8-112 (now repealed) made that consent irrevocable. The only exception to 40-8-112 (now repealed) is upon a finding by the court that the best interests of the child would be served by allowing revocation of consent. In re Adoption of Conley v. Walden, 171 M 58, 555 P2d 960 (1976).

Strict Compliance Required for Effective Revocation of Consent: Mother, after executing affidavit of waiver and consent to adoption, could not effectively revoke that consent by letter addressed to County Department of Public Welfare without following the procedure prescribed by 40-8-112 (now repealed). Application of Hendrickson, 159 M 217, 496 P2d 1115 (1972).

42-2-411. Conditional relinquishment and consent.

Case Notes

Conditional Relinquishment in Previously Dismissed Case — No Application in Subsequent Termination Case: The mother signed a conditional relinquishment of parental rights in an earlier abuse and neglect case that was later dismissed. Three years later, when the mother was involved in another abuse and neglect case, the Department of Public Health and Human Services asked the District Court to terminate her rights based on the earlier relinquishment, which it did. The mother appealed and argued to the Supreme Court that the relinquishment from a dismissed case could not be used against her in a subsequent case. The Supreme Court agreed, holding that the application of the relinquishment violated the mother's due process rights. Accordingly, it reversed and remanded the matter to the District Court to proceed without applying her relinquishment. In re K.B., 2019 MT 73, 395 Mont. 213, 437 P.3d 1042.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 257 in (1)(d) near middle after "adoptive parent" deleted "or the lawyer representing the prospective adoptive parent"; in (3)(b) at beginning substituted "relinquishment will result in the extinguishment of" for "adoption will extinguish"; in (3)(c)(iii) after "services" deleted "and information about adoption"; and made minor changes in style. Determination of Whether Mother Received Relinquishment Counseling or Whether Good Cause Existed to Waive Requirement — Question for District Court: When a mother denied receiving mandatory relinquishment counseling and her affidavit of relinquishment was silent, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the District Court for determination of whether counseling was received or whether good cause existed to waive the requirement. In re B.J.T.H., 2013 MT 366, 373 Mont. 85, 314 P.3d 911.

In a subsequent proceeding, the District Court held a hearing on whether the mother had received counseling as required under 42-2-409. Although the mother claimed that a counselor spent only 5 to 10 minutes with her, the counselor testified that she had spent at least 3 hours counseling the mother on her options, including relinquishment. The District Court concluded the mother had received the required counseling and the mother appealed. 42-2-413. Consequences of relinquishment and consent to adopt.

Official Comments

1994 Commissioners' Comment: This section specifies the general legal consequences of a consent or relinquishment and is consistent with the Act's intention to keep track of a minor and assign responsibility for the minor's care and support throughout the adoption process. If executed in substantial compliance with this Part, either document is final and irrevocable except under limited circumstances and entitles the prospective adoptive parents in a direct placement and the agency in an agency placement to the custody of the minor and requires them to provide support and care for the minor. The section also specifies the extent to which further notice of the adoption proceeding is or is not waived by a consent or relinquishment.

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Termination of Parental Rights When Relinquishment Form Executed: A parent argued that under the definition of "placement for adoption" in 40-8-103 (now repealed), placement was improper since the adoption agency had not secured a termination order from District Court prior to placing the child out of state. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that the definition did not require a judicial termination order but only that parental rights had been terminated. The court held that parental rights were terminated when the relinquishment form was executed. In re Male Child Born July 15, 1985, to L.C., 221 M 309, 718 P2d 660, 43 St. Rep. 835 (1986).

Duress Standard — No Wrongful Act or Threat That Overcame Parent's Free Will — Relinquishment Proper: A mother stated that the Department of Health and Human Services (DPHHS) contacted her over a dozen times to discuss relinquishment and told her that she had a better chance of being able to visit her children if she voluntarily relinquished her rights. The mother argued that due to depression caused by the DPHHS's placement of her two children far away from her without adequate visitation rights, she voluntary relinquished her parental rights as a result of duress caused by DPHHS's wrongful conduct. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the denial of the mother's motion to set aside her relinquishment of parental rights was proper because the mother did not provide clear and convincing evidence that she was subjected to a wrongful act or threat that overcame her free will or compelled her to relinquish and because she did not demonstrate that the District Court's factual determinations were clearly erroneous. DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Jurisdiction Based on Presence of Child in Montana: In a case in which the natural parents were residents of Wyoming but the child was born in Montana and present in Montana, the District Court had jurisdiction in an action to terminate parental rights under the abuse and neglect statutes, based on the presence of the child in Montana. Procedures to Be Rigorously Followed: While there is some overlap in the various statutory schemes governing the termination of parental rights and the custody of children as to general subject matter, each is used for a distinct purpose and sets forth specific procedures which must be rigorously followed before a valid judgment or order may be issued, to insure that the minors involved receive the full protection of these laws. 42-2-603. Petition for termination of parental rights.

Case Notes

Improper Termination of Parental Rights by Default Judgment — Abuse of Discretion — Action to Terminate Other Parent's Rights Inappropriate: A mother filed a petition to terminate the parental rights of her infant daughter's father, who was incarcerated at the time. Despite the father's efforts to respond timely, the District Court, without a hearing, evidence, or findings, entered default judgment. The father appealed the termination to the Supreme Court, which reversed, concluding that parental rights cannot be terminated pursuant to a default judgment. The Supreme Court also emphasized that a natural parent cannot petition to terminate the parental rights of the other natural parent except in the case of a stepparent adoption. In re K.J.B., 2014 MT 327, 377 Mont. 270, 339 P.3d 824, distinguished in In re A.M.S., 2016 MT 22, 382 Mont. 145, 364 P.3d 1261.

Stepparent Adoption Proceedings — Indigent Parent Entitled to Counsel — Improper Termination of Parental Rights: The stepmother filed a petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. At the hearing, the mother represented herself pro se because she could not afford an attorney. Ultimately, the District Court terminated the mother's parental rights and she appealed. The Supreme Court reversed, concluding that the right to equal protection requires that counsel be appointed for indigent parents in termination proceedings under the Adoption Act, and remanded the case to the District Court to appoint the mother counsel and to provide a new hearing. In re Adoption of A.W.S. and K.R.S., 2014 MT 322, 377 Mont. 234, 339 P.3d 414. However, see In re Termination of the Parental Rights & Adoption of J.W.M. & A.K.M, 2015 MT 231, 380 Mont. 282, 354 P.3d 626, holding that there was no error in termination proceedings in which a father did not indicate that he wished to have counsel appointed because he was indigent. See also In re Adoption of L.F.R., 2019 MT 2, 394 Mont. 61, 432 P.3d 1030.

Stepparent's Petition to Terminate Biological Parent's Parental Rights Granted Given Evidence of Abandonment: A custodial stepparent has standing to petition for termination of a noncustodial parent's parental rights. In this case, the custodial stepmother petitioned for and was granted termination of the noncustodial mother's rights in order to allow for adoption of the child by the stepmother. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court concluded that the mother abandoned the child and thus was an unfit parent. As evidence of abandonment, the court did not err in considering: (1) the mother's time in prison and residential drug treatment, during which she had no contact with the child; (2) during the mother's periods of absence, the mother's struggle with an abusive relationship, use of illegal drugs, and associations with known criminals; (3) the mother's failure to follow through on commitments to care for and visit the child; and (4) a lack of intent on the mother's part to resume care of the child in the future, regardless of any understanding that an initial parenting plan was temporary. Evidence of abandonment was substantial, and the District Court did not err in granting the petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. In re Adoption of K.P.M., 2009 MT 31, 349 M 170, 201 P3d 833 (2009).

Mistake of Law — Aunt and Uncle Lack Standing to Petition for Termination of Parental Rights: In a case involving termination of parental rights, the Supreme Court assumed supervisory control to determine whether G.R. and P.R., the child's aunt and uncle, had standing to bring the amended petition to terminate parental rights and for adoption. A child's aunt and uncle are not parties authorized by 42-1-107 to place a child for adoption. A child may not be placed for adoption until the parental rights of the birth parents have been terminated by a court as provided in Title 41, chapter 3, or Title 42. G.R. and P.R. did not have standing to file a petition for termination of parental rights under 42-2-603(2). Under Title 41, chapter 3, a petition for the termination of parental right based upon abuse or neglect of a child may only be brought by the County Attorney, the Attorney General, or an attorney hired by the county. Section 40-6-233 refers to the abuse of parental authority for making decisions regarding the support and education of a child and is not the basis for terminating parental rights. Therefore, G.R. and P.R. do not have standing to petition for the termination of parental rights based upon abuse or neglect. J.C. v. Eleventh Judicial District Court, 2008 MT 358, 346 M 357, 197 P3d 907 (2008).

Service by Publication in Termination Proceeding: Under 42-2-605, service by publication is proper in an adoption proceeding to terminate parental rights. However, publication must be ordered by the court and may not be ordered by the clerk of court. In addition, the publication must inform the parent that failure to appear at the termination hearing will result in termination of parental rights. Merely informing the parent that failing to appear at the hearing will result in judgment being taken against the parent by default for the relief requested in the petition is insufficient. Involuntary Termination Proceeding — No Indication of Wish for Counsel — No Error: At a termination hearing against a father whose counsel previously withdrew from the case, the father represented himself, including offering testimony and questioning witnesses. The District Court did not err in conducting the proceedings in the absence of counsel for the father, because the father did not indicate that he wished to have counsel appointed because he was indigent. DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Finding of Abuse, Neglect, or Dependency Necessary Before Consideration of Best Interests of the Child: M.G.M. was born out of wedlock and had little contact with her natural father until the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) placed M.G.M. in a foster home and terminated her mother's parental rights. The Department then sought to terminate the father's parental rights. To terminate his parental rights, the court must first find that the child is abused, neglected, or dependent. Only when such a finding has been made can the court apply the best interests of the child test. Case Notes

Refusal to Terminate Parental Rights and Grant Petition for Adoption Proper: In an adoption proceeding, the stepfather petitioned to adopt his wife's child and sought to terminate the parental rights of the natural father of the child on the sole basis that the natural father was an unfit parent because he had failed to pay child support during the year prior to the filing of the petition for adoption. The District Court refused to terminate the parental rights of the natural father based on an existing child support order that set the amount of child support due at zero. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the natural father could not be declared unfit and have his parental rights terminated and his child adopted after complying with a valid court order specifying a child support obligation, albeit one of "zero". In re Adoption of P.T.H., 2015 MT 316, 381 Mont. 373, 364 P.3d 1235.

Proper Termination of Parental Rights — Refusal to Take Drug Tests Under Interim Parenting Plan: A father's violation of an interim parenting plan by his refusal to take drug tests, his admissions of prolonged illegal drug use, his purchase of drugs in lieu of paying child support, his forgery of drug tests required under a divorce decree, his choice of drugs instead of time with his children, and his acknowledgment that he would not succeed in obtaining permanent sobriety substantially supported the District Court's determination that the father was unfit because his behavior would be detrimental to the children. Thus, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the father's parental rights. In re Termination of the Parental Rights & Adoption of J.W.M. & A.K.M, 2015 MT 231, 380 Mont. 282, 354 P.3d 626.

No Authority to Terminate Parental Rights of Putative Father When Substantial Parent-Child Relationship Established: Maternal grandparents petitioned to terminate the parental rights of the father of R.A.J., for whom they were guardians. The petition was denied, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. A District Court has authority to terminate a putative father's parental rights upon a determination under 42-2-610 that a putative father failed to establish and maintain a substantial relationship with the child or upon a determination under 42-2-608 that the putative father is unfit. Here, the grandparents made no assertion of unfitness, so the question involved only the issue of substantial relationship. When a petition prays for termination of the parental rights of a putative father, the burden is on the putative father to show that he has established a substantial relationship with the child. In this case, the father met that burden. Although the father had been stationed overseas in the military shortly after the child was born, he provided a fair and reasonable amount of support for the child, considering that the grandparents had obtained guardianship of the child without the father's knowledge and had refused to accept contributions for the child's support. The father had at least monthly contact with the child when he was not overseas, and he manifested an ability and willingness to assume legal and physical custody of the child through continuing and frequent contact, by caring for the child in his home to the extent allowed by the grandparents, and through the pursuit of paternity testing to establish his biological relationship with the child. Having determined that a substantial father-child relationship existed, the District Court correctly concluded as a matter of law that the father's parental rights could not be terminated under 42-2-607(4) or 42-2-610. In re Adoption of R.A.J., 2009 MT 22, 349 M 100, 201 P3d 787 (2009).

Adoption of Children of Parent Whose Parental Rights Terminated Affirmed: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights for nonsupport and granted the stepfather's petition to adopt the children without the father's written permission. The father appealed. Although a child generally may not be adopted without the written consent of both birth parents, written consent is not required of a parent whose parental rights have been terminated, so the Supreme Court addressed whether the termination of parental rights was proper. In this case, the father was able to provide support for his children during an aggregate 1-year period prior to the filing of the adoption petition but failed to do so, rendering him an unfit parent pursuant to 42-2-608. Thus, the District Court did not err in terminating the father's parental rights. In re Adoption of C.W.D. & C.D.D. v. P.K.D., 2005 MT 145, 327 M 301, 114 P3d 214 (2005).

Proper Termination of Parental Rights Based on Conviction for Sexual Assault of Child and Sexual Intercourse Without Consent With Child: Snyder pleaded guilty to sexual assault on a child and sexual intercourse without consent with a child based on his involvement with three young girls. His marriage was dissolved 6 months later and custody was awarded to his former wife, who remarried and then petitioned for termination of Snyder's parental rights so that their son could be adopted by her new husband. The petition was granted, and Snyder appealed. The plain language of 42-2-608 provides that the court may terminate a parent's rights and make the child available for adoption if a parent is convicted of sexual assault on a child or sexual intercourse without consent with a child. There is no statutory requirement that the sexual assault on a child or sexual intercourse without consent with a child has been committed on the adoptee. The trial court did not err when it held that clear and convincing evidence supported the termination of the father's parental rights based on his prior convictions. Case Notes

Termination of Parental Rights — Indigent Father — Waiver of Right to Counsel: The District Court terminated the father's parental rights during an adoption hearing. The indigent father was not represented by counsel at the hearing, and the District Court did not advise the father of his right to counsel during the proceeding. On appeal, the father argued that he was entitled to have an attorney appointed to represent him at the District Court. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court, holding that a parent in a termination proceeding, having received no notice of the right to counsel, does not waive the right through mere silence. The court concluded that the father had not knowingly and voluntarily waived his right to counsel. In re Adoption of L.F.R., 2019 MT 2, 394 Mont. 61, 432 P.3d 1030.

Finding Mother Unfit Supported by Record — No Error by District Court: A District Court terminated a mother's rights after it determined that the mother had had several opportunities to contribute to her children's care but failed to do so over the course of years. It also noted that the mother's husband was a registered violent offender and her oldest son was a registered sex offender and they posed a threat to the children. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that, based on the record before it, the District Court did not err in finding the mother unfit. In re Adoption of A.W.S., 2016 MT 194, 384 Mont. 278, 377 P.3d 1201.

Refusal to Terminate Parental Rights and Grant Petition for Adoption Proper: In an adoption proceeding, the stepfather petitioned to adopt his wife's child and sought to terminate the parental rights of the natural father of the child on the sole basis that the natural father was an unfit parent because he had failed to pay child support during the year prior to the filing of the petition for adoption. The District Court refused to terminate the parental rights of the natural father based on an existing child support order that set the amount of child support due at zero. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the natural father could not be declared unfit and have his parental rights terminated and his child adopted after complying with a valid court order specifying a child support obligation, albeit one of "zero". In re Adoption of P.T.H., 2015 MT 316, 381 Mont. 373, 364 P.3d 1235.

Proper Termination of Parental Rights — Refusal to Take Drug Tests Under Interim Parenting Plan: A father's violation of an interim parenting plan by his refusal to take drug tests, his admissions of prolonged illegal drug use, his purchase of drugs in lieu of paying child support, his forgery of drug tests required under a divorce decree, his choice of drugs instead of time with his children, and his acknowledgment that he would not succeed in obtaining permanent sobriety substantially supported the District Court's determination that the father was unfit because his behavior would be detrimental to the children. Thus, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in terminating the father's parental rights. In re Termination of the Parental Rights & Adoption of J.W.M. & A.K.M, 2015 MT 231, 380 Mont. 282, 354 P.3d 626.

Stepparent Adoption Proceedings — Indigent Parent Entitled to Counsel — Improper Termination of Parental Rights: The stepmother filed a petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. At the hearing, the mother represented herself pro se because she could not afford an attorney. Ultimately, the District Court terminated the mother's parental rights and she appealed. The Supreme Court reversed, concluding that the right to equal protection requires that counsel be appointed for indigent parents in termination proceedings under the Adoption Act, and remanded the case to the District Court to appoint the mother counsel and to provide a new hearing. In re Adoption of A.W.S. and K.R.S., 2014 MT 322, 377 Mont. 234, 339 P.3d 414. However, see In re Termination of the Parental Rights & Adoption of J.W.M. & A.K.M, 2015 MT 231, 380 Mont. 282, 354 P.3d 626, holding that there was no error in termination proceedings in which a father did not indicate that he wished to have counsel appointed because he was indigent. See also In re Adoption of L.F.R., 2019 MT 2, 394 Mont. 61, 432 P.3d 1030.

No Evidence of Willful Parental Abandonment — Termination of Parental Rights Not Warranted: After only sporadic contact between a father and his child over a period of several years and failure of the father to fully comply with child support obligations, the mother petitioned to terminate the father's parental rights on grounds that the father had abandoned the child. The District Court denied the petition and the mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Termination of parental rights based on abandonment of a child is not appropriate unless there is clear and convincing evidence that the child was willfully abandoned. In this case, the totality of the circumstances showed that the father's conduct was more in the character of immature, ignorant, uncertain, and lacking in diligent attention to his parenting responsibilities rather than a willful manifestation of intent to abandon the child. The mere fact that the father may have violated a court order within the meaning of 42-2-608 by failing to meet child support obligations in full did not mean that, as a matter of law, his parental rights must be terminated. Thus, although the father was not a model parent, the mother failed to meet the burden of demonstrating by clear and convincing evidence that the father was unfit. Therefore, the District Court properly applied its discretion in denying the petition. In re Stepparent Adoption of B.W.Z.-S., 2009 MT 433, 354 M 116, 222 P3d 613 (2009).

Adoption of Children of Parent Whose Parental Rights Terminated Affirmed: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights for nonsupport and granted the stepfather's petition to adopt the children without the father's written permission. The father appealed. Although a child generally may not be adopted without the written consent of both birth parents, written consent is not required of a parent whose parental rights have been terminated, so the Supreme Court addressed whether the termination of parental rights was proper. In this case, the father was able to provide support for his children during an aggregate 1-year period prior to the filing of the adoption petition but failed to do so, rendering him an unfit parent pursuant to this section. Thus, the District Court did not err in terminating the father's parental rights. In re Adoption of C.W.D. & C.D.D. v. P.K.D., 2005 MT 145, 327 M 301, 114 P3d 214 (2005).

Two-Year Wait to Assert Parental Rights — Failure to Advise Parent of Right to Counsel Harmless Error: A father who was incarcerated waited more than 2 years to file for relief following termination of his parental rights, asserting that he was denied due process by not being provided notice of the right to counsel. The Supreme Court agreed that fairness requires that a parent be represented by counsel at parental termination proceedings, but in this case, the error was harmless because the lack of notice was not prejudicial to the father. There was adequate evidence to terminate the father's parental rights, and even if he had been notified and represented by counsel, there was no way that an attorney would have made a difference under the circumstances and the result would have been the same. Denial of the motion for relief was affirmed. In re P.D.L., 2004 MT 346, 324 M 327, 102 P3d 1225 (2004).

Proper Termination of Parental Rights Based on Conviction for Sexual Assault of Child and Sexual Intercourse Without Consent With Child: Snyder pleaded guilty to sexual assault on a child and sexual intercourse without consent with a child based on his involvement with three young girls. His marriage was dissolved 6 months later and custody was awarded to his former wife, who remarried and then petitioned for termination of Snyder's parental rights so that their son could be adopted by her new husband. The petition was granted, and Snyder appealed. The plain language of this section provides that the court may terminate a parent's rights and make the child available for adoption if a parent is convicted of sexual assault on a child or sexual intercourse without consent with a child. There is no statutory requirement that the sexual assault on a child or sexual intercourse without consent with a child has been committed on the adoptee. The trial court did not err when it held that clear and convincing evidence supported the termination of the father's parental rights based on his prior convictions. In re Adoption of Snyder, 2000 MT 61, 299 M 40, 996 P2d 875, 57 St. Rep. 288 (2000), following In re J.N. & A.N., 1999 MT 64, 293 M 524, 977 P2d 317, 56 St. Rep. 269 (1999).

Factors in Whether Nonconsenting Parent Able to Contribute to Support of Child: In determining whether a parent who does not consent to adoption of a child is able to contribute to support of the child, the District Court shall consider the following factors: (1) the parent's ability to earn income; (2) the parent's willingness to earn an income and support the child; (3) the availability of employment; and (4) the parent's use of funds to provide that parent with only the bare necessities before contributing to child support. In re Adoption of C.R.N., 1999 MT 92, 294 M 202, 979 P2d 210, 56 St. Rep. 388 (1999).

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Termination of Parental Rights and Adoption Not to Be Accomplished in Same Action: The District Court entered an order terminating the mother's parental rights and allowing the adoption of her children without her consent based upon the fact that her rights had been terminated. The Supreme Court reversed on the basis that the statute allowing for adoption without a parent's consent contemplated that the parent's rights had been terminated by a separate action at some point in the past. In re Adoption of Jane, John, & Mary Doe, 277 M 251, 921 P2d 875, 53 St. Rep. 631 (1996).

Absence of Department Adoption Placement and Written Consent by Department Head — Adoption Order Improper: Under 40-8-108 (now repealed), a court is not included in the list of entities that may place a child for adoption. Therefore, it was improper for a District Court to order a child's placement in the absence of a placement for adoption by the appropriate state agency and the written consent to adoption executed by the executive head of the Department. In re F.H., 272 M 342, 901 P2d 96, 52 St. Rep. 791 (1995). See also In re Adoption of Hall, 173 M 142, 566 P2d 401 (1977).

Inability to Contribute Financial Support to Child Not Abandonment — No Prior Judicial Termination of Parental Rights — Third-Party Petition to Adopt Properly Dismissed: Parents of S.P.M. were divorced and granted joint custody of the child. After a period of time, the father took sole custody after a Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) worker filed a report concluding that the mother's new partner was abusing the child. The original joint custody decree was not modified. The father and child moved out of state for 4 years. On their return, the mother petitioned for custody and visitation. In response, the father's new wife petitioned to adopt the child. The District Court dismissed the wife's petition on the grounds that the mother's consent to adoption was required and that the mother had not abandoned the child. The 6-month requirement for abandonment in 41-3-102 applies only to the willful surrender of custody, and even though the mother had not supported the child for 4 years, this did not constitute abandonment when the mother was not capable of providing financial support. Determination of neglect necessitates a proceeding separate from a consent for adoption hearing. Issues in controversy over termination of parental rights are different from inquiry before an adoption court, and the two inquiries should not be mixed. Adoption of S.P.M., 266 M 269, 880 P2d 297, 51 St. Rep. 808 (1994).

Elements of Parent-Child Relationship in Evaluation of Best Interest of Child: A natural parent's rights cannot be terminated under 40-8-111 (now repealed) independent of the determination that adoption is appropriate. Adoption is not appropriate unless it is found to be in the child's best interest. In evaluating the child's best interest, the court should consider benefits of the child's relationship with the natural parent in addition to the benefits derived from financial support. In re Adoption of V.R.O. & V.N.O., 250 M 517, 822 P2d 83, 48 St. Rep. 946 (1991).

Findings Insufficient on Ability to Pay Support — Remand: The order granting a partial summary judgment terminating parental rights based on lack of support during the year prior to filing of the petition listed the following facts in support of the determination that the parent was able to provide support: (1) the parent owned certain assets, including real property, musical equipment, two vehicles, rifles, chain saws, and a truck topper; (2) the parent received a $24,000 lump-sum workers' compensation settlement during the time in question; and (3) the parent did not come into court to attempt to modify the payments but simply chose not to pay support. However, it was not clear whether the assets were convertible to cash that could be used to pay support or whether any of the workers' compensation settlement remained available for this use. Further, the findings did not include discussion on the parent's income or ability to earn income during the relevant period or on the cost of providing himself with the necessities of life and were therefore insufficient as to the issue of the ability to pay child support, warranting remand. In re Adoption of V.R.O. & V.N.O., 250 M 517, 822 P2d 83, 48 St. Rep. 946 (1991). See also In re Adoption of Jane, John, & Mary Doe, 277 M 251, 921 P2d 875, 53 St. Rep. 631 (1996).

De Minimis Support Payments During Year Prior to Petition for Adoption — Parental Rights Terminated: Father maintained his consent was required for adoption of his children by their stepfather because father paid $180 in support during the year preceding stepfather's petition for adoption. Father was obligated to pay $375 a month and to maintain insurance on the children during that year. The Supreme Court noted that any payment of support must first be applied to satisfy the earliest arrearage before it is applied to the support owed during the year before the filing of the petition and that payments made after the filing of the petition may not be applied to the preadoption year. Considering that father's payments were de minimis at best and that he had not maintained insurance, termination of his parental rights was proper. A challenge of the constitutionality of the termination of parental rights based on nonsupport, as authorized by 40-8-111 (now repealed), was dismissed on procedural grounds. In re Adoption of C.J.H., W.L.H., & T.A.H., 246 M 52, 803 P2d 214, 47 St. Rep. 2258 (1990).

Lack of Court Order Requiring Support — Mere Inquiry Insufficient to Toll Statute: The absence of a child support order does not absolve a parent of the legal duty to support a child, nor is mere inquiry regarding child support sufficient to toll the statutory support requirement of 40-8-111 (now repealed). In re Adoption of D.J.V., 244 M 209, 796 P2d 1076, 47 St. Rep. 1522 (1990), followed in In re Adoption of J.M.H. & S.B.H., 264 M 381, 871 P2d 1326, 51 St. Rep. 290 (1994), and In re Adoption of C.R.N., 1999 MT 92, 294 M 202, 979 P2d 210, 56 St. Rep. 388 (1999).

Caring for One of Three Children Constituting Nonsupport: The lower court terminated the natural father's parental rights without his consent on the basis that he had not paid support for more than 1 year. The Supreme Court affirmed the termination, holding that the fact that the father had cared for one of his three children did not constitute compliance with the dissolution order. In re Adoption of R.M., 241 M 111, 785 P2d 709, 47 St. Rep. 124 (1990).

Service on Party's Attorney Sufficient Notice: The trial court terminated the natural father's parental rights without his consent on the basis that he had not paid child support for a period of 1 year. The father argued that he had left the state prior to the finalization of the decree and never learned of his support obligation. The Supreme Court affirmed the termination and ruled that service on the father's attorney was sufficient notice, even though the attorney did not know of the father's whereabouts. In re Adoption of R.M., 241 M 111, 785 P2d 709, 47 St. Rep. 124 (1990), followed in In re Adoption of J.M.H. & S.B.H., 264 M 381, 871 P2d 1326, 51 St. Rep. 290 (1994), holding that natural father, who was notified of the hearing, waived due process claims by failing to attend or send a representative to the "best interest" hearing.

Court Need Find Only One Substitute for Consent to Proceed With Adoption: The Supreme Court held that the lower court had to find only one of the statutorily enumerated substitutes for consent in order to proceed with an adoption. There was clear evidence of abandonment, therefore the court did not have to consider the sufficiency of the evidence concerning nonsupport or the validity of the guardians' consent to the adoption. Adoption of C.R.D., 240 M 106, 782 P2d 1280, 46 St. Rep. 1979 (1989), followed in In re L.E.B., 259 M 492, 856 P2d 1382, 50 St. Rep. 895 (1993).

Natural Father's Consent to Adoption Not Required When Evidence Clear He Abandoned Child: The father had only visited with his daughter twice and called her on the telephone twice in 8 years and during that time never paid support. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's finding that the record contained clear and convincing evidence that the natural father had willfully abandoned his daughter, and therefore his consent to the child's adoption by her grandparents was not required. Adoption of C.R.D., 240 M 106, 782 P2d 1280, 46 St. Rep. 1979 (1989).

Question of Abandonment Not Within Subject Matter Jurisdiction Regarding Modification: Husband was served a petition for adoption of his children by wife's new husband. The petition alleged abandonment. The District Court improperly considered the question of abandonment during the postdissolution hearing, which centered around the issues of visitation and unpaid child support. The question was outside the scope of issues included within the original dissolution decree, was to be decided by the court hearing the adoption proceedings, and should have been dismissed under former Rule 12(h)(3), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded). In re Marriage of Callahan, 233 M 465, 762 P2d 205, 45 St. Rep. 1639 (1988).

Purview of Court to Evaluate Conflicting Testimony — Equitable Estoppel Not Bar to Claim of Failure to Pay Support: Father claimed he had not made support payments because mother told him she wanted to make it on her own, that she was not worried about payments while he was unemployed, that she had refused his offer of money from the sale of property, and that for these reasons she was estopped from consenting to termination of his parental rights. Mother testified she told father that support payments must be made through the Clerk of Court and that she expected payments while he was working. It was entirely within the court's purview to rely on mother's testimony, and the claim of failure to support was not barred by equitable estoppel. In re Adoption of S.E., 232 M 31, 755 P2d 27, 45 St. Rep. 843 (1988).

Standard of Proof — Clear and Convincing Evidence: The natural father erroneously characterized the determination of whether his parental rights should be terminated as a "best interest of the child" question. The "best interest" test is applied after parental rights have been terminated to determine whether the adoption should be allowed. Rather, the standard of proof under 40-8-111 (now repealed) is clear and convincing evidence. In re Adoption of S.E., 232 M 31, 755 P2d 27, 45 St. Rep. 843 (1988), followed in In re Adoption of J.B.T. & W.D.T., 250 M 205, 819 P2d 178, 48 St. Rep. 793 (1991).

Termination of Parental Rights of Joint Custody: Father argued that parental rights of a parent with joint custody could not be terminated under 40-8-111 (now repealed); however, the provisions allowing termination upon failure to support are not limited to a particular type of custodial status. Any parent who is able but does not support a child for 1 year forfeits the right to withhold consent to adoption. In re Adoption of S.E., 232 M 31, 755 P2d 27, 45 St. Rep. 843 (1988).

Adoption Proceeding Not to Be Thwarted by Refusal of Natural Parent to Consent: A putative father argued that 40-8-111 (now repealed) did not apply because it required that a petition for adoption be filed and no petition had been filed at the time he was asked for his consent. He never paid any support for the child, but contended that a formal petition would have put him on notice of the proceeding, thus allowing him to make support payments. The Supreme Court found that this argument was circuitous and that to accept it would allow any natural parent to thwart a legitimate adoption proceeding merely by refusing consent so that no valid petition for adoption could be filed. In re Adoption of R.G.C., 228 M 345, 742 P2d 471, 44 St. Rep. 1586 (1987).

Best Interest Test Properly Applied: A putative father contended that 40-6-130 (now repealed) required a finding as to his fitness as a parent before a determination could be made as to what was best for the child. While proof of abuse or neglect is required to terminate a parent's rights in a proceeding involving a youth in need of care, in adoption proceedings the standard to be applied, as outlined in 40-6-130 (now repealed), is the best interest of the child. In re Adoption of R.G.C., 228 M 345, 742 P2d 471, 44 St. Rep. 1586 (1987).

Measurement of Support Period: In adoption proceedings under 40-8-109 (now repealed), the provisions of 40-8-111 (now repealed) relating to the 1-year period of support should be measured against the commencement of the adoption proceedings rather than against the date of the petition for adoption. In re Adoption of R.G.C., 228 M 345, 742 P2d 471, 44 St. Rep. 1586 (1987).

Adoption Without Consent When No Child Support Paid — Ability to Work: Natural father contended he did not pay child support for over 1 year due to physical and psychological problems. The Supreme Court affirmed adoption without consent upon finding the natural father was able to maintain employment but did not by choice, voluntarily chose a lifestyle to avoid gainful employment while allowing others to support him, and failed to apply some proceeds of a workers' compensation settlement toward his child support obligations. Further, the District Court did not err in allowing evidence concerning events outside of the 1-year period because the events were relevant to the natural father's mental and physical condition during the subject year. In re Adoption of J.M.G., J.J.G., & C.C.G., 226 M 525, 736 P2d 967, 44 St. Rep. 869 (1987).

Best Interests of Child: If the statutory requirements for consent to adoption are met, the best interests of the child become the paramount consideration. In re Adoption of S.T.V., 226 M 18, 733 P2d 841, 44 St. Rep. 425 (1987), followed in In re Adoption of V.R.O. & V.N.O., 250 M 517, 822 P2d 83, 48 St. Rep. 946 (1991).

Providing Articles of Clothing or In-Kind Payments — Support Obligation Not Satisfied: A parent's obligation to contribute to the financial support of a child is not satisfied by provision of articles of clothing or other in-kind payments. In re Adoption of K.L.J.K., 224 M 418, 730 P2d 1135, 43 St. Rep. 2297 (1986), affirming In re Adoption of S.L.R., 196 M 411, 640 P2d 886 (1982), and followed in In re L.E.B., 259 M 492, 856 P2d 1382, 50 St. Rep. 895 (1993). Support Other Than as Required by Decree — When Valid: The father was obligated by the decree to pay $125 child support a month for each of two children. The parents later orally agreed that each would totally support one child. The father's conduct of totally supporting one child under the agreement was held to be the equivalent of providing financial support for both children, and therefore his consent was required for adoption of the other child. In re Adoption of E.S.R., 218 M 118, 706 P2d 132, 42 St. Rep. 1448 (1985).

Support During One-Year Period Before Filing Petition: W.A.S. paid child support from the time of his divorce until June 1981, which was shortly after his former spouse remarried. No support payment was made in July 1981, but a payment made in August 1981 was applied to July. No other payment was made until December 1981, when a $450 payment was made. On December 2, 1982, a petition was filed seeking the adoption of R.A.S. by his stepfather. The court determined that the December 1981 payment applied to August, September, and October 1981 and that W.A.S. did not contribute to the support of his child during a period of 1 year before the filing of the petition for adoption. Since no contribution was made, the consent of W.A.S. was not required. Finding of Abuse, Neglect, or Dependency Necessary Before Consideration of Best Interests of the Child: M.G.M. was born out of wedlock and had little contact with her natural father until the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) placed M.G.M. in a foster home and terminated her mother's parental rights. The Department then sought to terminate the father's parental rights. To terminate his parental rights, the court must first find that the child is abused, neglected, or dependent. Only when such a finding has been made can the court apply the best interests of the child test. In re M.G.M., 201

M 400, 654 P2d 994, 39 St. Rep. 2191 (1982), followed in In re J.B., 278 M 160, 923 P2d 1096, 53 St. Rep. 901 (1996).

Determination of Neglect at Custody Hearing Not Sufficient: After the death of the custodial mother, the maternal grandmother took the children into her home. The natural father petitioned to have the children restored to his custody. The grandmother requested custody and filed a petition for adoption. In a proceeding pursuant to 40-4-221, the grandmother was granted custody because the father had failed to make child support payments for more than a year and had generally neglected the children. The trial court properly dismissed the grandmother's petition for adoption for lack of jurisdiction. The determination of neglect needed to excuse the need for the father's consent to adoption under 40-8-111 (now repealed) must be made in a separate proceeding pursuant to Title 41, ch. 3, part 6. Brost v. Glasgow, 200 M 194, 651 P2d 32, 39 St. Rep. 1679 (1982).

Termination of Parent's Parental Rights for Failure to Support Child: Mother filed petition for termination of father's parental rights and replacement of him as the children's father with her second husband. Father had for the 2 years prior to the petition failed to make court-ordered child support payments, although financially able to do so. Father made two lump-sum payments after filing of the petition but was still several thousand dollars in arrears. Mother's testimony indicated she had received only $670 from father, who was supposed to make the support payments to the court. Father's testimony indicated, at best, that he contributed $2,725 to the children's support during the 2-year period, several thousand dollars less than that due. The District Court erroneously failed to terminate father's parental rights, which were terminated by Supreme Court on appeal by mother. In re Marriage of Burns, 198 M 365, 646 P2d 530, 39 St. Rep. 1059 (1982).

"If Able to Support" — Voluntary Change in Lifestyle: The nonsupporting parent was mentally and physically capable of obtaining full-time employment but refused to do so. His voluntary choice of a lifestyle was inconsistent with his responsibility to contribute to the child's support, and for the purposes of 40-8-111 (now repealed), he was able to support the child. A parent should not be able to enjoy the benefits of parental rights while voluntarily shunning the burden of parental obligation. In re the Adoption of S.L.R., 196 M 411, 640 P2d 886, 39 St. Rep. 156 (1982), followed in In re Adoption of B.L.P., 224 M 182, 728 P2d 803, 43 St. Rep. 2116 (1986), In re Adoption of K.L.J.K., 224 M 418, 730 P2d 1135, 43 St. Rep. 2297 (1986), and in In re Adoption of J.M.H. & S.B.H., 264 M 381, 871 P2d 1326, 51 St. Rep. 290 (1994). See also In re Adoption of J.B.T. & W.D.T., 250 M 205, 819 P2d 178, 48 St. Rep. 793 (1991).

Proof of Nonsupport, Abandonment, Cruelty, and Neglect Insufficient to Excuse Consent of Natural Father: Where the stepfather of two children petitioned the court to adopt those children and the children's natural father filed an objection to the petition, the District Court did not err in its refusal to excuse the requirement that consent of the natural father be obtained. The evidence submitted by the stepfather to prove nonsupport, abandonment, cruelty, and neglect of the children failed to meet the burden of proof required by 40-8-111 (now repealed), and the District Court therefore properly dismissed the petition for adoption for lack of parental consent. Other grounds for excusing consent and allegations of error were not reviewed by the Supreme Court, as they were raised for the first time on appeal. In re the Adoption of T.G.K. & J.P.K., 193 M 139, 630 P2d 740, 38 St. Rep. 1030 (1981).

Absence of Abuse or Neglect: Judgment was reversed and custody of two children taken from their maternal aunt and returned to the natural father since there was no showing that the children were abused or neglected. The District Court improperly deprived the father of custody by means of the subterfuge of a guardianship that had outlived the purpose for which it was created. In re Guardianship of Doney, 174 M 282, 570 P2d 575 (1977).

Invalid Adoption Decree: An adoption decree was invalid for lack of notice to the natural parents and the absence of consent by abandonment since only 24 days elapsed from birth to filing of the adoption petition. That being so, laches and estoppel could not save the nonexistent decree but the best interests of the child justified a permanent custody award to the defendants. In re Adoption of Hall, 173 M 142, 566 P2d 401 (1977).

Burden of Proving That Consent Not Required: When petitioner relies upon the statutory exception to consent based on failure to support, he bears the burden of proving that the parent was able to give support in addition to showing failure to contribute; the court will not waive the consent requirement if the petitioner is attempting to argue abandonment because such allegation was not contained in the petition. In re Adoption of Challeen, 172 M 362, 563 P2d 1120 (1977).

Support as Financial Support: Section 40-8-111 (now repealed) clearly means financial support where it refers to "support". In re Adoption of Smigaj, 171 M 531, 560 P2d 141 (1977), followed by In re the Adoption of S.L.R., 196 M 411, 640 P2d 886, 39 St. Rep. 156 (1982).

Collateral Attack on Adoption Decree — Res Judicata: The res judicata doctrine bars an action to void an adoption decree when the issue of the best interests of the children and the validity of the decree were litigated in a prior habeas corpus action. In re Adoption of Conley v. Walden, 171 M 58, 555 P2d 960 (1976).

In Habeas Corpus Proceeding Welfare of Child as Paramount Factor: Habeas corpus proceeding seeking custody of children is an equitable proceeding, and whether the action is treated as habeas corpus or a petition to set aside an adoption, the welfare of the child is the paramount factor. Application of Conley v. Walden, 166 M 369, 533 P2d 955 (1975).

Reliance Upon Judicial Ruling of Other States: In granting petition for adoption without consent of parents, Montana court was entitled to rely on ruling of Missouri court depriving parents of custody, and even though parents, 5 years later, persuaded the Missouri court to set aside its ruling, the Montana adoption was made in the best interest of the children and would not be set aside. Application of Conley v. Walden, 166 M 369, 533 P2d 955 (1975).

Mother to Consent Lacking Evidence of Her Ability and Failure to Support: Minor child supported during preceding 4 years by its father and aunt and uncle did not warrant order authorizing adoption of child by aunt and uncle after father's death where mother did not give consent and there was no evidence mother was able and failed to give support during that period. In re Adoption of Biery, 164 M 353, 522 P2d 1377 (1974).

Noncompliance With Procedure: Mother, after executing affidavit of waiver and consent to adoption, could not effectively revoke that consent by letter addressed to County Department of Public Welfare without following the procedure prescribed by 40-8-111 (now repealed). Application of Hendrickson, 159 M 217, 496 P2d 1115 (1972).

Estoppel: Where mother of child born out of wedlock joined in and agreed to petition allowing natural father and his wife to adopt child, mother was estopped from attacking the resulting decree of adoption 2 years later. In re Adoption of Curtis, 143 M 330, 390 P2d 209 (1964).

Case Notes

No Authority to Terminate Parental Rights of Putative Father When Substantial Parent-Child Relationship Established: Maternal grandparents petitioned to terminate the parental rights of the father of R.A.J., for whom they were guardians. The petition was denied, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. A District Court has authority to terminate a putative father's parental rights upon a determination under 42-2-610 that a putative father failed to establish and maintain a substantial relationship with the child or upon a determination under 42-2-608 that the putative father is unfit. Here, the grandparents made no assertion of unfitness, so the question involved only the issue of substantial relationship. When a petition prays for termination of the parental rights of a putative father, the burden is on the putative father to show that he has established a substantial relationship with the child. In this case, the father met that burden. Although the father had been stationed overseas in the military shortly after the child was born, he provided a fair and reasonable amount of support for the child, considering that the grandparents had obtained guardianship of the child without the father's knowledge and had refused to accept contributions for the child's support. The father had at least monthly contact with the child when he was not overseas, and he manifested an ability and willingness to assume legal and physical custody of the child through continuing and frequent contact, by caring for the child in his home to the extent allowed by the grandparents, and through the pursuit of paternity testing to establish his biological relationship with the child. Having determined that a substantial father-child relationship existed, the District Court correctly concluded as a matter of law that the father's parental rights could not be terminated under 42-2-607(4) or 42-2-610. Time Limit for Appeal of Termination of Parental Rights Running From Service of Notice of Entry of Judgment — Laches Inapplicable: The District Court determined that a mother abandoned her children and terminated the mother's parental rights; however, the mother was never served with notice of entry of judgment regarding the termination. The mother moved to vacate or void the order and requested a hearing on the termination, but the motion was denied. The state contended that further consideration of the issue was barred by this section or by laches. The Supreme Court disagreed that the mother's appeal was barred by this section because the statute does not alter the filing period for timely appeals but merely sets a 6-month time limit on all other challenges to orders terminating parental rights. Rather, former Rule 77(d), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), applied. The rule requires service of notice of entry of judgment, and former Rule 5, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), provided that the 60-day time limit for appeals did not apply until service of notice of entry of judgment, but the mother was never served. The equitable doctrine of laches also did not apply because the state failed to discharge its simple affirmative duty to notify the mother of entry of judgment. Thus, the mother's appeal was timely. Motion for Relief From Termination of Parental Rights Filed Two Years After Termination Untimely as Matter of Law: Both parents were charged in Idaho with sexual abuse crimes against their children, but the parents eluded authorities for several years. P.D.L. was born while the parents were fugitives. Both parents were eventually captured and convicted, and the father was incarcerated for a 17-year term in Idaho. Following service of a petition in prison, the father's parental rights were terminated. More than 2 years later, the father filed a motion for relief from the termination order under former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted the finality provision in this section, which attempts to provide finality to parental rights termination proceedings so that a child may be safely adopted without the threat of the adoption being set aside at some future date. The termination order was immune from collateral attack 6 months after it was entered, and the father's motion for relief filed more than 2 years later was untimely as a matter of law. In re P.D.L., 2004 MT 346, 324 M 327, 102 P3d 1225 (2004).

Criteria for Intervention in Adoption Proceeding — Unfounded and Untimely Motion to Intervene Properly Denied: Couple A adopted a child through a judicial decree in the District Court of the Twenty-First Judicial District. Couple B also wanted to adopt the child and filed a motion, in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District where they lived, to intervene and set aside the final decree of adoption, despite the fact that some 6 months had passed since the final adoption decree was issued. Initially, neither District Court was aware of the competing adoption petitions. The Department of Public Health and Human Services had been reviewing both couples as potential adoptive resources at the same time and ultimately determined that because the child had formed a strong bond during placement with couple A for nearly 2 years, it would be in the child's best interests to be adopted by couple A. Couple B contended that the child was a member of their extended family and that the Department should have given them priority as adoptive parents. The Twenty-First District Court held that couple B had no standing to intervene as a matter of right pursuant to former Rule 24(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), and that permissive intervention under former Rule 24(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), was untimely and would undermine the purpose of adoption to the detriment of the child. Couple B's motion to set aside the final decree pursuant to former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), was also denied on grounds that as nonparties to couple A's adoption petition, couple B had no standing to make the motion and that, in any case, it was untimely because it was made more than 180 days after the final decree. Couple B appealed the denial of both motions, arguing first that they had a legal interest by virtue of the family placement preference in the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) and legislative and Departmental policies favoring adoptive placement with extended family members. The Supreme Court noted that a mere claim of interest is insufficient to support intervention as a matter of right and that a party seeking intervention must make a prima facie showing of a direct, substantial, legally protectable interest in the proceedings. No such showing was made here because the child was not Indian and therefore not subject to the ICWA, nor did the relationship of second cousins meet the definition of extended family member. Couple B next argued that they should have been allowed to intervene under the permissive standard of former Rule 24(b), M.R.Civ.P., because the competing adoption petitions had common issues of law and fact. Couple B contended that their delay should be excused by their reliance on misrepresentations made by the Department. The Supreme Court agreed that the Department could have taken a more forthright approach and saved all the parties considerable time and expense, but couple B bore the responsibility for ensuring the timely filing of the motion to intervene. The Supreme Court noted that timeliness is a threshold issue when intervention is sought and that, although none of the factors are dispositive, most courts look to four factors in considering whether a motion to intervene is timely filed: (1) the length of time that the intervenor knew or should have known of its interest in the case before moving to intervene; (2) prejudice to the original parties, if intervention is granted, resulting from the intervenor's delay; (3) prejudice to the intervenor if the motion is denied; and (4) any unusual circumstances mitigating for or against a determination that the application is timely. The Supreme Court considered each factor in detail. Although the third factor weighed in favor of couple B, because denial of the motion to intervene effectively precluded any hope of their adoption of the child, the other factors weighed strongly against them. The District Court made a reasoned analysis when it determined that the motion to intervene was untimely and did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion. Last, because couple B did not address the threshold issues of former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P., on appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that denial of the motion to set aside the final adoption decree on grounds of standing and timeliness was proper. Part 1
Duty of Placing Party to Disclose Information

42-3-101. Duty to disclose information — form — availability — filing.

Case Notes

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Full and Accurate Disclosure of Adoption Information Required: The Jacksons' adoptive son required extensive medical and psychological therapy. The Jacksons sued the state, contending that the state had a legal duty to inform them of the boy's condition and of his parents' medical backgrounds and that failure to do so constituted negligent misrepresentation, negligent nondisclosure, negligence based on lack of informed consent, and negligent supervision. The state contended that the imposition of a common-law or statutory duty to disclose the background information would conflict with its duty to maintain confidentiality of the birth parents' medical records. The District Court dismissed the claims, concluding that the state owed the Jacksons no duty of care upon which the negligence claims could be premised. Citing the opinions of several courts of other states, the Supreme Court held that recognizing a cause of action for negligent misrepresentation in the adoption context would promote public policy and ensure that adoptive parents would assume parenting responsibilities in an informed manner. Anything less than the exercise of due care in the dissemination of information to prospective adoptive parents is unacceptable. Although a slight burden is imposed on the state in providing the information, that burden is justified in light of the compelling need for adoptive parents to receive all available information regarding a child who might soon be a permanent member of the family. Full disclosure of a child's medical and familial background is warranted not only to enable adoptive parents to obtain timely and appropriate medical care for the child but also to enable them to make an intelligent and informed decision to adopt. Summary judgment was reversed. (Note: See this section wherein the 1997 Legislature enacted a statutory requirement that social and medical histories of the birth families must be provided to a prospective adoptive parent.) Part 2
Requirements of Prospective Adoptive Parents

Part Case Notes

Motion to Set Aside Relinquishment and Consent to Adoption Properly Denied: The guardians of adopted children moved to set aside their relinquishment and consent to the adoption on the basis that the adoptive parents had provided a fraudulent preplacement evaluation that did not comply with the Montana Adoption Act. The District Court denied the motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that because the guardians failed to establish fraud by clear and convincing evidence, no basis existed under 42-2-417 to set aside the relinquishment and consent to adoption. 42-3-205. Recommendation.

Official Comments

1994 Commissioners' Comment: This section establishes the minimum requirements for a favorable evaluation. It focuses on factors that may warrant a determination that an individual is not suitable to become an adoptive parent — specific concerns that pose significant risks of harm to the physical or psychological well-being of a minor. A finding of unsuitability has to be supported by a written explanation of precisely how each specific concern poses a risk of harm to the minor. For example, an individual should not be disqualified solely because of low income, or because he or she lives in a small house or apartment, unless the individual's financial status or residence is so inadequate for the needs of a child that it poses a threat to the child's well-being

These provisions are not intended to preclude an agency or an independent evaluator from asking additional questions intended to gauge an individual's capacity to adopt different kinds of children. Nor are evaluators or agencies precluded from offering pre-adoption counseling to prospective adoptive parents. This section should be read in conjunction with other provisions of the Act — e.g., Sections 1-102, 2-104, 2-206 [not enacted in Montana] — that are intended to protect individuals who seek to adopt from being unreasonably or categorically excluded from consideration.

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Postadoption Visitation Agreement — District Court Responsibilities: The District Court did not err when it modified sua sponte the parties' postadoption visitation agreement to provide weekend visitation and weekly telephone contact with the birth mother because the modification was determined to be in the best interests of the child. The finding was supported by substantial evidence, and the court did not misapprehend the effect of the evidence. Adoptive parents do not have sole discretion in deciding whether a postadoption visitation agreement should be enforced. Rather, the adoptive parents' wishes are but one factor among many to be considered in determining the child's best interests under 40-4-212. Groves v. Clark, 1999 MT 117, 294 M 417, 982 P2d 446, 56 St. Rep. 490 (1999).

Sua Sponte Modification of Postadoption Visitation Agreement Within Discretion of District Court: The rule that in the context of separation agreements made between spouses, parties cannot make binding agreements concerning the support, custody, or visitation of children applies equally to postadoption agreements made between an adopted child's birth parents and adoptive parents. The best interests of the child are paramount, and sua sponte modification of an original visitation agreement in this case was within the discretion of the District Court after determining the best interests of the adopted child. DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Postadoption Visitation Agreement Between Natural Mother and Adoptive Parents — Responsibilities of District Court: Groves consented to the adoption of her child by the Clarks on the condition that the Clarks sign a visitation agreement allowing Groves to have specified contact with her daughter. After the document was signed and the adoption completed, the Clarks tried to terminate Groves' contact with her daughter. Groves brought an action for specific performance of the visitation agreement, but the District Court held that the agreement was void from its inception under 40-8-125 (now repealed). The Supreme Court reversed, holding that In re C.P., 221 M 180, 717 P2d 1093 (1986), was distinguishable and that the Legislature would not have enacted 40-8-136 (now repealed) if 40-8-125 (now repealed) terminated the interests of the natural parent altogether. The Supreme Court also noted that 40-8-136 (now repealed) also places a burden upon the adoptive parents and, in this case, upon the adoption agency that acted as Groves' agent, to make sure that the visitation agreement was filed in accordance with that statute. The Supreme Court also concluded that under 40-8-114 (now repealed), the District Court has a responsibility to make sure that the enforcement is in the best interests of the child. Groves v. Clark, 277 M 179, 920 P2d 981, 53 St. Rep. 703 (1996).

Adoption Petition Not Brought in Bad Faith: The mother of a child petitioned to have her child adopted by her ex-husband. The child's father, also an ex-husband of the mother, had the petition dismissed because he had not voluntarily relinquished his parental rights. The biological father asked for sanctions against the mother and her attorney, arguing that the petition had been brought in bad faith and for an improper purpose. He argued that even a cursory reading of 40-8-109 (now repealed) would have shown that the petition could not be properly filed and that the action had only been undertaken to interfere with his visitation rights. The Supreme Court refused to impose sanctions, holding that to avoid sanctions under former Rule 11, M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), it is not necessary that a party be correct in his view of the law, only that he make a good faith argument in support of his view. Case Notes

Lack of "Venue Jurisdiction" — Petition Dismissed in Error: Shortly after her child was born in Montana, a mother signed an affidavit relinquishing her parental rights and signed a power of attorney allowing the petitioners to make parenting decisions in her stead. The petitioners moved with the child out of state and subsequently filed a consolidated and uncontested petition to terminate the mother's parental rights and to adopt the child in a Montana court. The District Court dismissed the petition because, it concluded, the court lacked "venue jurisdiction" because the child lived out of state. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded, holding that the District Court had jurisdiction and that, moreover, 42-4-110 implies that a petition to terminate parental rights and a petition to adopt should be filed in the same District Court. Placement Not Prerequisite to Court Determination of Merits of Adoption Petition: Because placement of a child by the Department of Family Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services), by a licensed child-placing agency, or by the child's parents is not a prerequisite to the filing of a petition for adoption, the District Court has authority to review the merits of a petition for adoption without evidence of placement. Part 3

Stepparent Adoption

Part Case Notes

Grandfather Considered "Stepparent" in Adoption Proceeding: Following an adoption proceeding in which the District Court granted a mother's and maternal grandfather's joint petition to terminate the father's parental rights and allow the grandfather to adopt the children, the father appealed, arguing that the grandfather was not a stepparent who may bring a petition for termination of parental rights in conjunction with a petition for adoption. Although the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case back to the District Court on the basis that the father was not properly served by publication, the Supreme Court instructed the District Court that the petition could proceed if the District Court determines that there is good cause for the grandfather to be treated as a stepparent under 42-4-302 and that he meets the qualifications set forth in 42-1-106. 42-4-302. Standing to adopt stepchild.

Official Comments

1994 Commissioners' Comment: In addition to permitting individuals who are within the formal definition of "stepparent" to adopt a minor stepchild under this Article, Section 4-102 [42-4-302] allows an individual who is a de facto stepparent, but is not, or is no longer, married to the custodial parent, to adopt as if he or she were a de jure stepparent. To file a petition under this Article, the de facto stepparent or "second parent" has to have the consent of the court and the custodial parent, whose parental rights will not be terminated by an adoption under this Article. In addition, for the court to grant the petition, the other requirements of this Article have to be met, including the court's determination that the adoption is in the minor adoptee's best interests. See, e.g., Adoption of B.L.V.B., 628 A.2d 1271 (Vt. 1993) (de facto stepmother allowed to adopt her unmarried partner's biological children because it "serves no legitimate state interest" to deny the children "the security of a legally recognized relationship with their second parent"). See similar analysis in Matter of Evan, 153 Misc.2d 844, 583 N.Y.S.2d 997 (Surr. 1992).

If a stepchild's noncustodial parent refuses to consent to the proposed stepparent adoption or cannot be located, an adoption petition under this Article may be joined with a petition under Article 3, Part 5 [not enacted in Montana], to terminate the parent-child relationship with the noncustodial parent. In most cases, the termination petition will allege that the noncustodial parent has failed to support and visit or communicate with the child for at least six months before the stepparent files the adoption petition, Section 3-504(c)(2) [not enacted in Montana], or that, even if the noncustodial parent had a compelling reason for failing to pay support and visit in the past, he is unlikely to perform these duties in the future, Section 3-504(d)(2) [not enacted in Montana]. Of course, the stepparent and the custodial parent may also seek to prove any of the other grounds stated in Section 3-504 [not enacted in Montana] for terminating the noncustodial parent's rights.

Stepparent's Petition to Terminate Biological Parent's Parental Rights Granted Given Evidence of Abandonment: A custodial stepparent has standing to petition for termination of a noncustodial parent's parental rights. In this case, the custodial stepmother petitioned for and was granted termination of the noncustodial mother's rights in order to allow for adoption of the child by the stepmother. The mother appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court concluded that the mother abandoned the child and thus was an unfit parent. As evidence of abandonment, the court did not err in considering: (1) the mother's time in prison and residential drug treatment, during which she had no contact with the child; (2) during the mother's periods of absence, the mother's struggle with an abusive relationship, use of illegal drugs, and associations with known criminals; (3) the mother's failure to follow through on commitments to care for and visit the child; and (4) a lack of intent on the mother's part to resume care of the child in the future, regardless of any understanding that an initial parenting plan was temporary. Evidence of abandonment was substantial, and the District Court did not err in granting the petition to terminate the mother's parental rights. Pierce never formally adopted the child, but argued that an equitable adoption existed giving him standing to seek custody. Pierce had no standing to contest the custody of the child, nor had he any obligation to that child. Pierce v. Pierce, 198 M 255, 645 P2d 1353, 39 St. Rep. 914 (1982).

Official Comments

1994 Commissioners' Comment: The provisions in this and the next two sections pertaining to the consent of the stepchild's custodial parent (i.e., the stepparent's spouse) and the noncustodial parent are similar to the requirements for consent in a direct placement adoption, Article 2, Part 4 [not enacted in Montana], but are specifically tailored to the context of an adoption by a stepparent.

Changes From 1994 Uniform Act: In (1) substituted "signed in the presence of an individual authorized to take acknowledgments" for "signed or confirmed in the presence of an individual specified in Section 2-405" (not enacted in Montana); in (2) near beginning after "writing" omitted requirement that statement contain statements required in Section 2-406(a)(1) through (3) and (d)(3) through (6) of 1994 Uniform Adoption Act and may contain optional statements described in Section 2-406(f) (not enacted in Montana); in (2)(c)(ii) after "approved by the court" omitted "pursuant to Section 4-113" (not enacted in Montana) and at end omitted "the other parent remains liable for arrearages of child support unless released from that obligation by the parent executing the consent and by a government entity providing public assistance to the minor" and omitted final subsection that provided "A consent may not waive further notice of the proceedings for adoption of the minor by the stepparent"; and made minor changes in style.

The "next two sections" referred to in the 1994 Commissioners' comment are Sections 4-106, similar to 42-4-305 (now repealed), and 4-107. Section 4-107, specifying the form for a consent executed by other persons, has not been enacted in Montana.

42-4-311. Legal consequences of adoption of stepchild.

Official Comments

1994 Commissioners' Comment: Although the legal consequences of an adoption of a stepchild are generally the same as under Sections 1-104 through 1-106 [not enacted in Montana], this section provides that the rights and duties of the adoptive parent's spouse — i.e., the child's custodial parent — are not terminated by the adoption. The child remains in all respects the child of the adoptive parent's spouse, even if the spouse is deceased, and becomes in all respects the child of the adoptive stepparent. The adopted child, the custodial parent, and the adoptive parent have rights to inheritance and intestate succession by, through, and from each other.

By contrast, except for child support arrearages, the rights and duties of the child's former noncustodial parent are terminated, including the former parent's right to inheritance or intestate succession through or from the adopted child. Nonetheless, the adopted child and the child's descendants retain the right to inheritance or intestate succession through or from the former noncustodial parent. In this respect, the Act is consistent with the provisions of the Uniform Probate Code (UPC) [Title 72, ch. 1 through 5, and ch. 16, part 6] which apply to stepparent adoptions.

Case Notes

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Criteria for Intervention in Adoption Proceeding — Unfounded and Untimely Motion to Intervene Properly Denied: Couple A adopted a child through a judicial decree in the District Court of the Twenty-First Judicial District. Couple B also wanted to adopt the child and filed a motion, in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District where they lived, to intervene and set aside the final decree of adoption, despite the fact that some 6 months had passed since the final adoption decree was issued. Initially, neither District Court was aware of the competing adoption petitions. The Department of Public Health and Human Services had been reviewing both couples as potential adoptive resources at the same time and ultimately determined that because the child had formed a strong bond during placement with couple A for nearly 2 years, it would be in the child's best interests to be adopted by couple A. Couple B contended that the child was a member of their extended family and that the Department should have given them priority as adoptive parents. The Twenty-First District Court held that couple B had no standing to intervene as a matter of right pursuant to former Rule 24(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), and that permissive intervention under former Rule 24(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), was untimely and would undermine the purpose of adoption to the detriment of the child. Couple B's motion to set aside the final decree pursuant to former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), was also denied on grounds that as nonparties to couple A's adoption petition, couple B had no standing to make the motion and that, in any case, it was untimely because it was made more than 180 days after the final decree. Couple B appealed the denial of both motions, arguing first that they had a legal interest by virtue of the family placement preference in the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) and legislative and Departmental policies favoring adoptive placement with extended family members. The Supreme Court noted that a mere claim of interest is insufficient to support intervention as a matter of right and that a party seeking intervention must make a prima facie showing of a direct, substantial, legally protectable interest in the proceedings. No such showing was made here because the child was not Indian and therefore not subject to the ICWA, nor did the relationship of second cousins meet the definition of extended family member. Couple B next argued that they should have been allowed to intervene under the permissive standard of former Rule 24(b), M.R.Civ.P., because the competing adoption petitions had common issues of law and fact. Couple B contended that their delay should be excused by their reliance on misrepresentations made by the Department. The Supreme Court agreed that the Department could have taken a more forthright approach and saved all the parties considerable time and expense, but couple B bore the responsibility for ensuring the timely filing of the motion to intervene. The Supreme Court noted that timeliness is a threshold issue when intervention is sought and that, although none of the factors are dispositive, most courts look to four factors in considering whether a motion to intervene is timely filed: (1) the length of time that the intervenor knew or should have known of its interest in the case before moving to intervene; (2) prejudice to the original parties, if intervention is granted, resulting from the intervenor's delay; (3) prejudice to the intervenor if the motion is denied; and (4) any unusual circumstances mitigating for or against a determination that the application is timely. The Supreme Court considered each factor in detail. Although the third factor weighed in favor of couple B, because denial of the motion to intervene effectively precluded any hope of their adoption of the child, the other factors weighed strongly against them. The District Court made a reasoned analysis when it determined that the motion to intervene was untimely and did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion. Last, because couple B did not address the threshold issues of former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P., on appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that denial of the motion to set aside the final adoption decree on grounds of standing and timeliness was proper. In re Adoption of C.C.L.B., 2001 MT 66, 305 M 22, 22 P3d 646 (2001).

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Right to Intervene in Adoption of Indian Child — State Commitment to Indian Child Welfare Act: Prior to birth, Nellie Silk, paternal aunt of M.E.M., expressed an interest in caring for the child because she was aware of the parents' problems with parenting; however, after the child was born he was placed in foster care by the Hill County Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (SRS). Upon learning of the placement, Silk wrote to SRS requesting custody. SRS responded that placement with Silk would be inappropriate because of SRS efforts to reintegrate the family, but that Silk would be considered if adoption were to occur. After parental rights were terminated (see In re M.E.M., 209 M 192, 679 P2d 1241, 41 St. Rep. 636 (1984)), Silk was not informed of the proceedings, of M.E.M.'s availability for adoption, or of M.E.M.'s preadoptive placement with a non-Indian family. Silk's subsequent petition for adoption and motion to intervene were denied by the District Court. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that Silk had an interest in adoption stemming from the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (ICWA), 25 U.S.C. 1901, et seq., and that the state had a strong and independent commitment to the principles embodied in the ICWA. Silk also had a right to intervene under former Rule 24(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), and although the District Court had ruled that her motion was not timely, the Supreme Court held that the motion must be granted in light of the fact that she was kept in ignorance and could not have been more diligent or earlier in her petition or motion. Competing Petitions for Adoption: The court did not abuse its discretion by delaying determination of a jurisdictionally perfected adoption petition ready for hearing to consider subsequent petitions since the court cannot be compelled to fragment the case because of different filings and readiness for hearing of competing petitions. The best interest of the child is the paramount consideration. In re Adoption of Redcrow, 172 M 366, 563 P2d 1121 (1977).

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Invalid Adoption Decree: An adoption decree was invalid for lack of notice to the natural parents and the absence of consent by abandonment since only 24 days elapsed from birth to filing of the adoption petition. That being so, laches and estoppel could not save the nonexistent decree but the best interests of the child justified a permanent custody award to the defendants. In re Adoption of Hall, 173 M 142, 566 P2d 401 (1977).

Service of Process — Waiver: No service of process need be made on parents who have abandoned their children, failed to support them, or lost them to the custody of state agencies through neglect or cruelty. In re Adoption of Conley v. Walden, 171 M 58, 555 P2d 960 (1976).

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 716, L. 2023, provided: "WHEREAS, there is, at the present time, a court case before the United States Supreme Court known as Haaland v. Brackeen, No. 21-376, that has the potential to overturn or modify the Indian Child Welfare Act in its current form, and the Legislature seeks to provide guidance for Indian child protection cases in the interim as this case is decided. The Legislature does not expect this to be the final word on how we deal with Indian child welfare issues or how we seek to provide for all of Montana's children within the child protection system."

DECISIONS AFTER 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Criteria for Intervention in Adoption Proceeding — Unfounded and Untimely Motion to Intervene Properly Denied: Couple A adopted a child through a judicial decree in the District Court of the Twenty-First Judicial District. Couple B also wanted to adopt the child and filed a motion, in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District where they lived, to intervene and set aside the final decree of adoption, despite the fact that some 6 months had passed since the final adoption decree was issued. Initially, neither District Court was aware of the competing adoption petitions. The Department of Public Health and Human Services had been reviewing both couples as potential adoptive resources at the same time and ultimately determined that because the child had formed a strong bond during placement with couple A for nearly 2 years, it would be in the child's best interests to be adopted by couple A. Couple B contended that the child was a member of their extended family and that the Department should have given them priority as adoptive parents. The Twenty-First District Court held that couple B had no standing to intervene as a matter of right pursuant to former Rule 24(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), and that permissive intervention under former Rule 24(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), was untimely and would undermine the purpose of adoption to the detriment of the child. Couple B's motion to set aside the final decree pursuant to former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), was also denied on grounds that as nonparties to couple A's adoption petition, couple B had no standing to make the motion and that, in any case, it was untimely because it was made more than 180 days after the final decree. Couple B appealed the denial of both motions, arguing first that they had a legal interest by virtue of the family placement preference in the Indian Child Welfare Act (ICWA) and legislative and Departmental policies favoring adoptive placement with extended family members. The Supreme Court noted that a mere claim of interest is insufficient to support intervention as a matter of right and that a party seeking intervention must make a prima facie showing of a direct, substantial, legally protectable interest in the proceedings. No such showing was made here because the child was not Indian and therefore not subject to the ICWA, nor did the relationship of second cousins meet the definition of extended family member. Couple B next argued that they should have been allowed to intervene under the permissive standard of former Rule 24(b), M.R.Civ.P., because the competing adoption petitions had common issues of law and fact. Couple B contended that their delay should be excused by their reliance on misrepresentations made by the Department. The Supreme Court agreed that the Department could have taken a more forthright approach and saved all the parties considerable time and expense, but couple B bore the responsibility for ensuring the timely filing of the motion to intervene. The Supreme Court noted that timeliness is a threshold issue when intervention is sought and that, although none of the factors are dispositive, most courts look to four factors in considering whether a motion to intervene is timely filed: (1) the length of time that the intervenor knew or should have known of its interest in the case before moving to intervene; (2) prejudice to the original parties, if intervention is granted, resulting from the intervenor's delay; (3) prejudice to the intervenor if the motion is denied; and (4) any unusual circumstances mitigating for or against a determination that the application is timely. The Supreme Court considered each factor in detail. Although the third factor weighed in favor of couple B, because denial of the motion to intervene effectively precluded any hope of their adoption of the child, the other factors weighed strongly against them. The District Court made a reasoned analysis when it determined that the motion to intervene was untimely and did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion. Last, because couple B did not address the threshold issues of former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P., on appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that denial of the motion to set aside the final adoption decree on grounds of standing and timeliness was proper. In re Adoption of C.C.L.B., 2001 MT 66, 305 M 22, 22 P3d 646 (2001).

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Elements of Parent-Child Relationship in Evaluation of Best Interest of Child: A natural parent's rights cannot be terminated under 40-8-111 (now repealed) independent of the determination that adoption is appropriate. Adoption is not appropriate unless it is found to be in the child's best interest. In evaluating the child's best interest, the court should consider benefits of the child's relationship with the natural parent in addition to the benefits derived from financial support. In re Adoption of V.R.O. & V.N.O., 250 M 517, 822 P2d 83, 48 St. Rep. 946 (1991).

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1997 GENERAL REVISION

Postadoption Visitation Agreement Between Natural Mother and Adoptive Parents — Responsibilities of District Court: Groves consented to the adoption of her child by the Clarks on the condition that the Clarks sign a visitation agreement allowing Groves to have specified contact with her daughter. After the document was signed and the adoption completed, the Clarks tried to terminate Groves' contact with her daughter. Groves brought an action for specific performance of the visitation agreement, but the District Court held that the agreement was void from its inception under 40-8-125 (now repealed). The Supreme Court reversed, holding that In re C.P., 221 M 180, 717 P2d 1093 (1986), was distinguishable and that the Legislature would not have enacted 40-8-136 (now repealed) if 40-8-125 (now repealed) terminated the interests of the natural parent altogether. The Supreme Court also noted that 40-8-136 (now repealed) also places a burden upon the adoptive parents and, in this case, upon the adoption agency that acted as Groves' agent, to make sure that the visitation agreement was filed in accordance with that statute. The Supreme Court also concluded that under 40-8-114 (now repealed), the District Court has a responsibility to make sure that the enforcement is in the best interests of the child. Groves v. Clark, 277 M 179, 920 P2d 981, 53 St. Rep. 703 (1996).

Adoption by Stepparent — No Mandatory Termination of Grandparents' Visitation: There is no clear legislative intent or public policy that mandates termination of visitation for natural grandparents when a grandchild is adopted by a stepparent. Kanvick v. Reilly, 233 M 324, 760 P2d 743, 45 St. Rep. 1524 (1988).

Termination of Parental Rights While Maintaining Possibility of Parental Contact — Adoption Exception: There is no apparent conflict in terminating parental rights while simultaneously maintaining the possibility of parental contact. It was within the trial judge's discretion to terminate the mother's parental rights, due to her recurring mental problems, while allowing contact with the children if the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) determined it was in the children's best interests, since the children had a psychological attachment to their mother. However, when parental rights are terminated, continuing contact is allowable only in exceptional cases. In the event of adoption, continuing contact cannot be court-ordered even with Department approval. In re Declaring V.B., T.B., D.B., & B.B. Youths in Need of Care, 229 M 133, 744 P2d 1248, 44 St. Rep. 1838 (1987).

Parents to Have No Visitation Rights After Termination of Parental Rights Proceeding: Neither 40-8-125 (now repealed) nor 41-3-611 provides for a retention of visitation rights by the natural parent in the event of termination of parental rights and later adoption. In re C.P., 221 M 180, 717 P2d 1093, 43 St. Rep. 728 (1986).

Alternative Methods of Inheritance: Where claimant sought distribution of decedent's estate, claiming an acknowledgment in writing as required by section 91-404, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), and an adoption as provided under section 61-136, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), and offered proof of her right to inherit under both statutes, the claimant was not precluded from prevailing on the ground that she availed herself of both statutes and that they were alternate methods by which a person may become an heir. In re Glick's Estate, 136 M 176, 346 P2d 987 (1959).

Effect of Subsequent Will's Definition of "Issue" on Earlier Trust: Where testatrix included adopted grandchild in her will and therein expressly defined "issue" to include adopted children, this indicated clear intent to include adopted grandchild as "issue" in trust instrument created earlier by testatrix. Holter v. First Nat'l Bank & Trust Co. of Helena, 135 M 27, 336 P2d 701 (1959).

Adopted Child's Right to Inherit From Natural Parent Under Former Law: Adoption of child did not destroy his status as one of the issue of his natural ancestors, nor did adopted child lose his right to inherit from his natural parent. In re Kay's Estate, 127 M 172, 260 P2d 391 (1953).

Stranger Estopped to Collaterally Attack Adoption: Where all parties to adoption proceeding for many years considered it valid and acted on belief that valid adoption had taken place, evidence of such fact was properly admitted on collateral attack by stranger to proceedings who sought to revoke letters of administration granted to deceased's adopted son, and a party thereto or one claiming under him was estopped from attacking the order collaterally some 30 years after it was made. In re Hoermann's Estate, 108 M 386, 91 P2d 394 (1939).

Inheritance Through Adoptive Parents: As against collateral heirs, an adopted child, in absence of a will, succeeds to all the estate of the person adopting. In re Pepin's Estate, 53 M 240, 163 P 104 (1917).

1995 Amendment: Chapter 546 in (2) and in (3), in two places, substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of social and rehabilitation services". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

1991 Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Ch. 274, L. 1991, provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill because [section 7(3)] [42-10-127(3)] grants rulemaking authority to the department of social and rehabilitation services [now department of public health and human services] for the purpose of establishing procedures for continuing state medical assistance benefits in addition to federally aided benefits in certain cases. The legislature intends, as a matter of policy, that when the state provides medical assistance benefits in addition to the federal benefits available under an adoption assistance agreement, the benefits must continue when a child relocates to a state that has agreed under a compact to reciprocate by providing additional nonfederal coverage to children moving to Montana. It is intended that the medicaid card may be used as the identification for these services as well as for the true "medicaid" elements of the state program. It is intended that [section 7(3)] [42-10-127(3)] provide a means of improving, as far as possible, the chances for handicapped and other "hard-to-place" children to gain family settings for their development. It is intended that in those instances in which the plan for a particular child is adoption (with assistance) by parents who already live in another state or move there, the department of social and rehabilitation services [now department of public health and human services] may provide the full measure of its services to these special-needs children. It is intended that out-of-state adoptions be an additional resource for Montana children that would not be available if the department of family services [now department of public health and human services] had to rely on finding families for special-needs children on an entirely local basis."
